PREFACE

The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion, envisioned as a companion volume to The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, is designed to be a scholarly, accessible reference to the whole of Jewish religion. The more than three-millennium history of the Jewish people and Jewish religious thought has undoubtedly made a unique contribution to Western civilization and thus warrants the special attention that this volume gives to the subject.

CONCEPT

As editors in chief, we have carefully chosen the term Jewish religion rather than Judaism for the title of this work. Though the two terms are often used interchangeably, Judaism implies a more secular focus and a broad sociocultural approach to the subject; the scope of this dictionary is the Jewish "religion" per se. Despite the absence of consensus on the nature of religion and the lack of a widely accepted definition of the term, writers, editors, and readers seem to share a general, though at times vague, notion of what is meant by it: a combination of attitudes, beliefs (often systematized by theology), and practices ranging from prayer and/or meditation to prescribed codes of conduct (frequently codified in law books) that shape individual lives as well as social structures.

The decision to call this work a dictionary of the "Jewish religion" is not without its problems. There are many dictionaries and encyclopedias of religion(s), varying in size, content, and orientation. Both the word religion and its semantic spectrum are part of the history of Western culture, shaped as it is by Christianity. The term has percolated, for better or worse, from the West to other cultural traditions and (in translation) to other languages. Although there is general agreement that because of its Western origins the use of religion preempts discourse on many issues that are conceived differently in various cultures, the term is, nevertheless, widely established. The use of the word therefore must take into account cultural specificities.

The Hebrew language originally had no equivalent to religion. Torah (teaching), the accumulated corpus of divine scriptural revelation—especially in the Pentateuch—and oral revelation, with its divinely sanctioned modes of interpretation, perhaps comes closest to it. (When a word for religion became necessary, a loan word derived from Persian, dat, came into use.) Torah (as well as its analogues in other traditions) is so all-encompassing in both its individual and social aspects that some authors have preferred to define it as a "way of life" rather than a "religion."

Any work on the Jewish religion, because of its all-encompassing character, must incorporate subjects that would be considered irrelevant or even extraneous in dictionaries of some other religions. The most striking example is the field of law (Heb. halakhah), with its roots in biblical legislation, later developed and refined throughout the ages as administered by rabbinic courts. The teachers of Jewish religion were legal scholars rather than theologians; hence, also the prima facie unexpected inclusion in the present work of entries on such topics as insurance, barter, and alimony. At the same time, systematic theology, which only arrived some twenty centuries after the time of Moses, has to be fully represented.

Another specific character of the Jewish religion, "chosenness," requires mention, especially in a world in which religions are generally thought of as universal. Nonuniversal religions practiced in antiquity or tribal societies tend to be considered obsolete. But the Jewish religion, alongside its universalistic elements, sees itself essentially as the religion of one particular people or nation, bound to God by a special covenantal relationship that also implies a special bond to a particular land, Erets Yisra'el.

Almost all religions have a concept and doctrine of the religious community (e.g., church, ummah, saṅgha), but in this case, the community that perceives itself as the bearer of the divine charge and promise is a historical, concrete, and nonmetaphorical "people of God." This gives the Jewish religion an ethnonational quality that is not found in most current religious systems; this quality is reflected in this dictionary.

For most of its history, especially after the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, the Jewish religion was basically monolithic. Two centuries ago, the Emancipation brought in its wake Reform Judaism, subsequently supplemented by Conservative Judaism and Reconstructionism. Historical differences and contemporary pluralism mean that on many issues there is no single voice. Though limitations of scope make it impossible to provide exhaustive coverage in this dictionary, every attempt has been made—with the assistance of special consultants—to state all views and varying practices, including recent developments. However, since many views and practices are still evolving, they do not lend themselves to the definitive treatment that can be given, for example, to rabbinics or medieval philosophy. As editors in chief, we have made every effort to achieve balance and to present content that is descriptive and informative and in which ideology is reported but does not affect the subject matter.

DEVELOPMENT

One of the results of the Holocaust tragedy was the destruction of the great centers of Jewish scholarship in Europe. Fortunately, two other centers were in the process of emerging—in Israel and the United States—and these have taken over unquestioned leadership in the field. Most of our contributors were drawn from these two centers, and this bipolarity was assisted coincidentally by the fact that we are from Jerusalem while the Oxford University Press administrative team was working out of New York.

In 1966 we served as editors for the single-volume Encyclopedia of the Jewish Religion, published by Massada Press in Jerusalem but allowed to go out of print within four or five years. In 1992 Itzhak J. Carmin Karpman, a New York publishers' agent who had an interest in the work, approached Oxford University Press with a proposal to reprint it for an American audience. Claude Conyers, editorial director of scholarly reference works at Oxford, responded immediately and enthusiastically with the suggestion that the work be used instead as a basis for a new, updated, and considerably expanded work, provided the original editors could be engaged. His was the vision of an Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion, and he has since played a central role in the development of the concept and its execution.

Much has changed since the publication of our earlier work, and consequently this volume is very different from its predecessor. Developments in scholarship and practice as well as the much larger compass of the dictionary meant that more than half the entries had to be newly commissioned. Although we found some of the articles to be basically adequate, all have been thoroughly rewritten. Because the earlier work contained no bibliographies, the entire bibliographical apparatus, seen as a crucial element in this dictionary, has been newly added. All the new entries are signed by their contributors' names, while those derived from the former volume, as well as new entries written by the two of us, are unsigned.

The work has been conceived to present, in a single volume, as much information as possible about the Jewish religion; the additional tool of the bibliographies opens each topic to further research. Thus, it is directed to both the scholar and the layperson seeking a reference book that is concise but not abbreviated, authoritative but not overly technical, in which they can follow the entire variegated kaleidoscope of subjects embraced under the term Jewish religion.

This is not the first single-volume work on the Jewish religion, but it has set itself especially high scholarly standards. This is reflected in the incorporation of bibliographies; in bibliographical information contained in the body of the entries (notably dates and places of the editio princeps); and in the liberal use of Hebrew terminology, following trends in recent Jewish scholarship. Thus the festivals, fast days, and prayers are named in transliterated Hebrew. English forms are used as entry terms when they easily reflect a Hebrew term ("Sick, Visiting the" instead of Biqqur Holim), but Hebrew terms are used when the English form is almost meaningless when encountered out of context (e.g., Kil'ayim rather than "Mixed Species"). In each such case, the English equivalent is given as a blind entry, from which the reader unfamiliar with Hebrew terminology is directed to the article.

Because this work is not a general Jewish encyclopedia, but a dictionary focused on Jewish religion, our criteria for choosing subjects of entries were fairly clear. There is no entry summarizing the general history of the Jews, for example, and entries on such important historical topics as the Holocaust and the State of Israel confine themselves to religious angles. As in any reference book, however, subjectivity in the selection of entries eventually must emerge. Although consensus reigns on the selection of subjects of most major entries, when it comes to determining which individuals are to be included—be they biblical figures, rabbinic authors, or modern scholars—a dividing line has to be drawn. Inevitably, disagreements arise as to whether certain figures lie above or below that line. In this case, on the basis of our experience with reference works, we drew up an initial list of proposed subjects of entries and of people we judged to have made a contribution specifically to the Jewish religion, independent of people famous in Jewish history for other reasons. This list was then organized into categories and sent for approval to our advisory editors, a panel of distinguished scholars in various fields, for their review, emendment, and approval. The advisory editors also worked with us in suggesting contributors for entries.

Considerable leeway was left to the contributors. They were given general guidelines but within these parameters were free to write their entries as they saw fit. Thanks to the judicious selection of contributors, virtually all presented an objective assessment of their subjects and avoided imposing their own theories or viewpoints. Every effort has been made to ensure that all sides are represented in cases of differences of opinion between various trends and in conflicting scholarly theories. All entries were reviewed by one or both of us and on occasions submitted to the advisory editors for additional input.

EDITORIAL PRACTICES

Entries are in alphabetical order, arranged strictly letter by letter. In a work of this nature, the treatment of each entry is necessarily concise; however, extensive cross-referencing provides a guide to complementary entries containing additional relevant information. Cross-references are indicated in two ways: by the use of an asterisk before a word, directing the reader to the entry beginning with that word, and by "see" cross-references, both in the body of an entry and at its conclusion. Bibliographies also direct the reader to further sources of information.

Exact references are provided to biblical and rabbinical sources. The main source for biblical quotations is the Jewish Publication Society of America's Tanakh (Philadelphia, 1985), but contributors have been allowed to use other translations of their choice. References to the Talmud Yerushalmi are preceded by Y.; to the Tosefta, by T. References to the Mishnah and the Talmud Bavli are unmarked.

Transliteration from the Hebrew poses problems for all works of Jewish scholarship. The sixteen-volume Encyclopaedia Judaica (1971) uses no less than three systems! We adopted one that generally allows for transliteration back into Hebrew—including the differentiation between h for he and ḥ for het and the use of ' for alef and ' for ayin. However, to avoid the use of diacritics as much as possible, no differentiation is made between sin and samekh or tet and taf. Letters with a Dagesh Forte are doubled except in the case of letters transliterated by two English letters (viz. ts for tsadiq and sh for shin). Transliterations of Hebrew words are based on spellings in Avraham Even-Shoshan's Ha-Millon ha-Ḥadash (7 vols., Jerusalem, 1979). The system of transliteration is found on page xiii.

Exceptions to our transliteration system have been made for personal and place names from biblical and apocryphal literature. These names are used in the familiar forms found in the Revised Standard Version of the Bible. Hebrew and Yiddish personal names from later periods are transliterated (e.g., Shelomoh, not Solomon) unless the person in question wrote his name in Latin characters. For surnames, we have used the Library of Congress Name Authorities on CD-ROM (CDMARC Names; published and distributed by the U.S. Library of Congress). On occasion, this system follows different rules of transliteration from those of the dictionary, leading in some instances to orthographies different from those otherwise used in this volume. Despite the discrepancy, we felt it advisable to conform to an accepted authority so as to facilitate the search for persons whose names would be spelled in alternative forms in other works as well as to ease research in reference libraries and on-line catalogs. In most cases in which the orthographic discrepancy is significant, the spelling according to our transliteration system has been included as a blind entry referring the reader to the form in which it appears in the dictionary. Entry terms begin with the elements ben and ibn only when they constitute a commonly used part of a surname, such as Ibn Ezra.

The bibliographies, found at the end of each article, give priority to recent English-language research but also incorporate classic studies and important works in other languages, mainly Hebrew. The spellings of author's names and book titles were determined by the form used in the sources consulted. Although we made no restrictions on the publication dates of books cited in the bibliographies, only journal articles published since 1980 are included.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The entire work was processed at the New York offices of Oxford University Press under the expert and devoted coordination of Scott Lenz. We are deeply grateful to Claude Conyers, Scott Lenz, Catherine Guldner, Sarah Schwarz, and the rest of the staff at Oxford University Press for their contributions in bringing this work to fruition. We also express our appreciation of the initiative of Itzhak Karpman, who unfortunately did not live to see its completion. We owe much to our advisory editors, Joseph Dan, Edward Fram, Martha Himelfarb, Lawrence A. Hoffman, Shalom Paul, Aviezer Ravitsky, Robert M. Seltzer, Shmuel Shilo, and Daniel Sperber, and to our consultants, Elliot N. Dorff, Arthur Green, and Kerry M. Olitzky. Three of our advisers, Robert M. Seltzer, Shalom Paul, and Edward Fram, provided steady support and special assistance, for which we are particularly grateful.

AARON (Heb. Aharon), first *high priest; great-grandson of Levi; elder brother of *Moses and his spokesman before Pharaoh. While articles of law are normally introduced in the Torah by the formula, "the Lord spoke unto Moses, saying . . .," in Leviticus 10.8, Aaron is the exclusive vehicle for the revelation of God-given instructions. Numerous passages—some assigned by Bible critics to the Yahvist source (Ex. 6.13, 7.8, 9.8), and some assigned to the Priestly source (e.g., Ex. 12.1; Lv. 11.1, 13.1, 14.33, 15.1)—depict Moses and Aaron as partners in the mediation of God's revealed instructions: "And the Lord spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying . . ." Aaron was responsible for making the *golden calf and summoning the Israelites to worship it as the deity who brought them out of Egypt (Ex. 32). Refusing to take responsibility for his actions, he claimed that the calf was not his doing but rather, "I threw it [the gold] into the fire, and this calf emerged [of itself miraculously]" (Ex. 32.24). The Lord was angry enough with Aaron to have destroyed him (Dt. 9.20), but Aaron was spared by virtue of Moses' prayer on his behalf. According to Numbers 12.2, Miriam and Aaron challenged Moses' privileged status with the rhetorical question, "Has the Lord spoken only through Moses; has he not spoken also through us?" The Lord responded to this question by explaining that because the communication between him and Moses represented a unique level of intimacy, Aaron and Miriam should both be careful not to speak against Moses (Nm. 12.8). Aaron and his descendants were selected to serve as priests; together with his sons, he was duly anointed by Moses upon the completion of the Tabernacle. Aaron officiated in the Holy of Holies for almost forty years until his death in the wilderness. Other descendants of the tribe of Levi were appointed to perform various services in the Tabernacle (and later in the Temple), but to Aaron and his descendants (see AARONIDES)—the kohanim (priests)—was reserved the direct and immediate contact with the sanctuary and altar. This was their inheritance; they received no inheritance of land in Canaan (Nm. 18.20). Aaron is frequently mentioned as a symbol of the priesthood in general, and in rabbinic literature his name was a byword for piety and the pursuit of peace (cf. Avot 1.12). The rabbis also extolled the bond of brotherly love between Moses and Aaron.

AARONIDES, priests descended from *Aaron, brother of Moses and Miriam. They are referred to in Hebrew as "sons of Aaron" (Lv. 3.8, 21.1; Nm. 10.8; Jos. 21.4; Neh. 12.47; 1 Chr. 24.1). According to 1 Chronicles 6.34, 23.13, and 24.19, and 2 Chronicles 26.16–21, members of this family of priests received the exclusive prerogatives of burning incense, ministering, and blessing.

ABARBANEL. See ABRAVANEL FAMILY.

ABBA' (Aram.; אבא; father; corresponding to the Hebrew av), honorary title conferred on some of the tanna'im and amora'im (for example, Abba' Guryon and Abba' Sha'ul). According to Maimonides, it was synonymous with rabbi. The title passed into Christian usage to denote high ecclesiastical office, as in medieval Latin, abbas; Italian, abbate; German, abt; French, abbé; and English, abbot.

ABBA' (3d–4th cent.), Babylonian and Palestinian amora'. He studied in Babylonia with R. Huna' and R. Yehudah bar Yehezqel, and in Erets Yisra'el (where he eventually settled, in spite of R. Yehudah's objections; Ber. 24b) with R. Abbahu in Caesarea and with Reish Laqish and R. El'azar ben Pedat in Tiberias. After R. El'azar's death, he was both a colleague and student of R. Ammi and R. Assi, the new Tiberias academy heads. He was a wealthy silk trader (B. Q. 117b), able to support lavish preparations for the Sabbath (Shab. 119a). He frequently traveled between Erets Yisra'el and Babylonia, where he was called "our teacher in Erets Yisra'el" (San. 17b). In this capacity, he served as a conduit of the traditions developed in the schools of the two countries, although when eulogizing R. Huna', he claimed that the shekhinah would have rested on him had he not resided in Babylonia (Mo'ed Q. 25a). He is frequently cited in both halakhah and aggadah in the Talmuds and midrashim and was known for his generous and sensitive spirit (cf. Ket. 67b; Qid. 59a; Yoma' 87a).

ABBA' ARIKHA'. See RAV.

ABBAHU (died 309), Palestinian amora'; one of the main disciples of R. Yohanan and head of the rabbinical academy at Caesarea. A distinguished preacher, he was noted for his modesty and humanity; his better-known sayings include, "Where a repentant sinner stands, even a completely righteous man may not stand" (Ber. 34a) and "The world exists through the man who effaces himself" (Hul. 89a). Fluent in Greek (4. Yev. 4.2), handsome (B. M. 84a), and wealthy (Shab. 119a, in Rashi), he enjoyed high respect among the Roman representatives, which added to his stature among his colleagues (Y., Meg. 3.2). Abbahu sharply opposed sectarians and Christians, and his scriptural expositions were often directed to polemical ends. He decreed that the Samaritans should be regarded as gentiles. Abbahu probably headed the group of rabbis of Caesarea credited with redacting the juridical section of the Talmud Yerushalmi. Legend has it that when he died the columns of Caesarea wept; scholars have related this to a historical event recorded by the church fathers in 309.

ABBA' MARI BEN MOSHEH HA-YARḤI (13th–14th cent.), Provençal scholar. He was instrumental in getting R. Shelomoh ben Avraham *Adret (Rashba') to issue in Barcelona a ban on the study of philosophy for students younger than twenty-five years of age and then influenced many communities in southern France to accept the ban. In Montpellier, where he was residing at the time (1305), opposition and counterbans were issued against him and his faction. The controversy came to an abrupt end with the expulsion of the Jews from Languedoc in 1306. In his Minḥat Qena'ot (Pressburg, 1838), he collected the various letters and pamphlets concerning this affair, a eulogy for Menahem *Me'iri, and his essay "Sefer ha-Yareah," in which he accepted some of Maimonides' principles of faith: the existence, unity, and incorporeality of God; creation of the world by God; and God's special providence. Abba' Mari corresponded with Adret, and a number of his responsa have been published in She'elot Teshuvot ha-Rashba' (Rome, c.1480); he also wrote religious poetry. ABBA' SHA'UL (2d cent. CE), Palestinian tanna'. The Talmud singles him out, with evident exaggeration, as the tallest man in his (and thereby each succeeding) generation (Nid. 24b–25a). He described himself as a gravedigger (Nid. 24b), although the Talmud refers to an Abba' Sha'ul who was the baker for the household of R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi' (Pes. 34a). A colleague of R. *Yehudah bar Il'ai and R. *Me'ir, R. Abba' Sha'ul often employed both his own terminology and different versions of tannaitic sources from that of his contemporaries (cf. Git. 5.4), prompting some scholars to speak of a "mishnah of Abba' Sha'ul." He transmitted traditions on the services and utensils of the Second Temple (e.g. Pes. 57a–b), on the development of the fetus (Y., Nid. 3.3, 50d), and on burial customs (e.g., Nid. 61a), and he excluded from the world to come any Jew who pronounced the Tetragrammaton (San. 10.1; see GOD, NAMES OF). He taught that men should emulate the gracious character of God (Shab. 133b to Ex. 15.2) and that prayer from a prepared heart was efficacious (Ber. 31a to Ps. 10.17).

ABBAYEI (c.278–338), Babylonian amora'; his real name was Nahmani. An orphan, Abbayeï was raised by his uncle *Rabbah bar Nahmani. A poor man, Abbayeï emphasized the importance of physical labor, and in order to be free to study and teach during the day, he cultivated his small landholding at night. Later in life, however, he appears to have grown richer and acquired many properties (Hul. 105a), which he leased out to tenant farmers (Ket. 60a), who employed many workers (Ber. 45b). In his early childhood and youth he studied with his colleague *Rava' in *Pumbedita under Rabbah and R. Yosef ben Ḥiyya', and in later life—when Abbayeï was head of the academy at Pumbedita and Rava' at Maḥoza—they argued over many points of law (with six exceptions, the decisions of Rava' were accepted as the norm). Their wide-ranging legal discussions became a byword for acumen and keen argument and are regarded as among the finest examples of Talmudic dialectics. Abbayeï was among the first to distinguish between the literal (peshat) and exegetical (derash*) interpretation of biblical text. He had the deepest regard for the amora'im in Palestine, saying that "one of them is worth two of us" (Ket. 75a). He studied the Palestinian legal tradition (San. 44b), and Palestinian colleagues who came to Babylonia were permitted to follow their own customs, even when those customs were more lenient than those of Babylonia (Pes. 51a). His famous dicta included: "The whole [point] of the Torah is to propagate peace" (Git. 59a); "There is no real poverty except in knowledge" (Ned. 41a); "And thou shalt love the Lord thy God [Dt. 6.5]—[means] that you shall cause the name of Heaven to be loved" (Yoma' 86a).

On his death the Pumbedita academy was closed, and Rava' was recognized as head of all the Babylonian Talmudic academies.

ABBREVIATIONS (Heb. ra'shei tevot [beginnings of words]). Contractions of single words or groups of words have been used in Hebrew since at least the second century BCE, when they appeared on Maccabean coins. The Talmud as well as all subsequent rabbinic writings make extensive use of a system of word abbreviations: dots, strokes, or double strokes over the first, second, or third letter of a word indicate that the remaining letters of the word are eliminated; also common is the practice of substituting a stroke for the last one of two letters of a word (especially for plurals). Where the initials of several words are contracted to form a single element, the abbreviation is indicated by one or two strokes over the line between the last two letters. The habit of abbreviating groups of words to one word (such as UNESCO and similar formations in modern English usage) is very old in Hebrew, in which such abbreviations for certain books (e.g., Tanakh for Bible from Torah, Nevi'im, Ketuvim [Torah, Prophets, Hagiographa], the three components of the Jewish Bible; or Shas from shishah sederim, the six orders that make up the Mishnah and by extension the Talmud), names (Rashi for R. Shelomoh Yitshaqi; Rambam for R. Mosheh ben Maimon), concepts (Taryag, the Hebrew numerological equivalent of the number 613, for the total number of commandments in the Torah), and titles (admor for adonenu, morenu ve-rebbenu [our master, our teacher, our rabbi], the title generally accorded to a Hasidic rabbi) became words in their own right. Abbreviations were often used as mnemonic devices, one of the best known being the *acrostic quoted in the Pesah Haggadah for the Hebrew names of the Ten Plagues (detsakh, 'adash, be'ahav). Abbreviations were, and are, commonly used by pious Jews in writing or printing God's name, or words whose last letters form God's name (e.g., words ending with the Hebrew letters yud and heh, which together spell out the word Yah, one of God's names). Such abbreviations are commonly used in writing God's name on any paper or document that might ultimately be thrown away, as opposed to religious works, which are customarily buried after they are no longer usable. Even religious works often do not contain the Tetragrammaton, the holiest, four-letter, name of God; instead, the word is abbreviated by two yuds. Another abbreviation, found in certain old religious works, is the merging of two Hebrew letters into a single letter symbol. The most common occurrence of this was a combined letter representing the alef-lamed combination, a construct that appears in many Hebrew words, the two-letter combination itself forming one of God's names. On occasion, authors employed numerous abbreviations in their works to cut down the number of pages—and hence the cost—of publication of their works. Various family names are derived from abbreviations; for example, Katz (kohen tsedek [righteous priest]) and Segal (segan leviyyah [Levitical aide]). Abbreviations also played a role in rabbinic and mystical exegesis (see NOTARIQON); for example, for the purposes of gimatriyyah*, and especially in magic.

ABIATHAR (Heb. Evyatar), priest of the family of *Eli and son of Ahimelech. Chief priest at the sanctuary of Nob, Abiathar was the sole survivor of Saul's massacre of the priests of that city for the assistance they had afforded David on his flight from Saul. Abiathar thereupon joined David's party, accompanying him on his wanderings and serving him as keeper of the priestly *ephod. He was appointed chief priest when David ascended the throne and was one of the king's closest advisers. Because of his support for the succession of Adonijah rather than Solomon to the kingship upon the death of King David, he was banished by Solomon to his native Anathoth, was deprived of the privilege of acting as high priest, and was replaced by Zadok (1 Kgs. 2.26–35). Solomon, however, showed Abiathar mercy for two reasons: his faithful service during the reign of David; and his having suffered along with David while he was being persecuted by Saul. According to the narrative in 1 Kings 2.27, Solomon's removal of Abiathar from the priesthood was meant to fulfill the anonymous prophecy in 1 Samuel 2.27–36 that the corrupt priests of the house of Eli would be replaced by "a faithful priest who will continually walk before my king." It is widely surmised that Jeremiah's origin "from among the priests who were at Anathoth" (Jer. 1.1) indicates that he was a descendant of Abiathar.

ABIB. See AVIV.

ABI-HASIRA, YA'AQOV (1807–1880), Moroccan rabbinical authority, born in Tafilalet. Although he wrote chiefly about the halakhah, the Bible, and ethics, he was revered by his contemporaries and later generations as "the famous saint, the divine kabbalist, the wonderworker, the holy candle." His descendants collected the legends woven around him in a work entitled Ma'aseh Nissim (Jerusalem, 1968), which belongs to the genre of hagiographic accounts of the lives of Yitshaq *Luria or Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov. Abi-Hasira established a yeshivah in his home that attracted many students, particularly from among the poor, and to support them, he traveled around the region to collect funds. He was also involved in communal affairs, represented the Jews before the authorities, and participated in disputations with Muslim clerics. His teachings combined kabbalistic thought and social conservatism, but his influence was less through his writings than his pious and ascetic way of life. He longed to settle in Erets Yisra'el but died in Damanhūr, near Alexandria, on his way there. Most of his works were published in Jerusalem.

ABIMELECH, the name of two biblical figures.

Abimelech, king of Gerar, is mentioned in Genesis 20 and 21 in relation to Abraham and in Genesis 26 in relation to Isaac. In Genesis 20 and 26 Abimelech is reported as taking Sarah and Rebekah, respectively, into his palace after their husbands, Abraham and Isaac, respectively, present their wives as their sisters in order to save their own lives. In both instances the scheme is uncovered before Abimelech actually cohabits with them. Since he was completely innocent and unaware of the subterfuge, he is righteously indignant and escapes punishment. These two narratives are variants on a single tradition. In Genesis 21.25, and in Genesis 26.15–16 and 26.18–21, Abimelech is involved in a dispute with Abraham and Isaac, respectively, over wells. In both cases he is accompanied by his military commander, Phicol (Gn. 21.22, 32, 26.26), and both stories conclude with treaties between him and the patriarchs (Gn. 21.27–32, 26.28–31). These stories also represent two versions of a single tradition.

Abimelech, son of Gideon (Jgs. 8.31), though not reckoned among the judges, became the ruler of Shechem for three years, when, with the aid of "worthless and reckless men," he murdered all, save one (Jotham), of the seventy sons of *Gideon, thereby eliminating all possible contenders. Later on there arose a dispute between Abimelech and the "lords of Shechem" (his original supporters), who conspired with Gaal, son of Ebed, and his army to depose him. Abimelech and his men attacked Gaal, drove him from the city, and went on to slaughter the inhabitants of Shechem, destroying the city and sowing it with salt. In the course of a subsequent battle, Abimelech was mortally wounded by a millstone thrown down upon him from a tower by a woman. So as not to suffer the ignominy of being slain by a woman, he commanded his armorbearer to kill him (Jgs. 9.54).

ABITUR, YOSEF BEN YITSHAQ IBN (c.940–1024), Spanish rabbinic authority and liturgical poet; also known as Ibn Shatanash. He studied with *Mosheh ben Hanokh in Cordova. When Abitur's hopes of heading the Cordova Yeshivah were frustrated by his opponents, he moved east in 987 and settled in Egypt, living mostly in Fostat. He was highly respected and corresponded with the Babylonian ge'onim Sherira' ben Hanina' and Ha'i. Abitur wrote responsa noted for their moderate innovativeness. Abitur's extensive sacred poetry (three hundred of his piyyutim have been preserved) was in the Spanish tradition. He also wrote secular poetry, including poems both of friendship and of condemnation of his opponents. Some of his poems have been printed, but most are to be found still scattered in hundreds of manuscripts.

ABLUTION, washing or cleansing the body, generally for a religious purpose. Jewish law deals with both total and partial ablution. The biblical statement "he shall bathe his flesh in water" (Lv. 15.16) refers to total immersion of the body in a ritual bath (miqveh*) or flowing river water. Before immersion, the body must already be scrupulously clean so that nothing can interpose between flesh and water; even finger- and toenails are pared to ensure that no dirt remains beneath them. Immersion (tevilah) is a religious act specifically undertaken to achieve the ritual purity (see IMPURITY) required for participation in certain religious ceremonies. Thus, not only did the high priest immerse himself before conducting the service on Yom Kippur, but each priest who participated in the Temple service was also required to undergo immersion besides washing his hands and feet at the Laver (Ex. 30.18–21). The Torah also requires full immersion for women after their menstrual flow and for men after a sexual emission (Lv. 15.16–33). The Mishnah attributes to Ezra a decree that each male should immerse himself before reciting the morning prayer or studying. Matutinal immersion was practiced by the *Hemerobaptists and by ascetics, mystics, and Hasidim of later times (see BAPTISM). There are two kinds of partial ablution: the washing of the hands and feet as prescribed by the Bible for priests ministering in the Temple (in the synagogue, kohanim about to recite the Birkat ha-Kohanim have their hands washed by Levites in the congregation); and the washing of hands (netilat yadayim) prescribed by the rabbis for various occasions (e.g., before partaking of bread, after leaving a bathroom, on waking from sleep, and on leaving a cemetery [Shulhan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Ḥayyim 4.18]). In these cases, the hands are regarded as having contracted a limited form of impurity that does not apply to the entire body; hence, it is sufficient to clean them alone. The rabbis paid particular attention to the washing of hands: R. 'Aqiva' used the little water allowed him during his imprisonment by the Romans for washing rather than drinking ('Eruv. 21b); and the sage Eli'ezer ben Hanokh was excommunicated for doubting the need to wash one's hands ('Eduy. 65a). In modern Orthodox and Conservative practice, the only mandatory bodily immersion is that of the menstruating woman (niddah), the woman who has recently given birth, and the proselyte (see PROSELYTE). Pious custom among some Orthodox requires immersion by males prior to the onset of festivals. Bodily immersion is also used for the process of conversion by men and women. Some non-Orthodox women follow the traditional practice of immersion after the menstrual cycle; non-Orthodox men, for spiritual purification.

ject matter. The work achieved widespread popularity; was translated into Yiddish, Spanish, Judeo-Spanish, and German; and contributed to the dissemination of rabbinic ethics among medieval Jews.

ABOAB DA FONSECA, YITSHAQ (1605–1693), rabbi. At the age of twenty-one, he was appointed haham in Amsterdam. In 1642 he journeyed to Brazil with Amsterdam Jews of Portuguese origin and officiated at Recife as the first rabbi; he was the first Jewish author in the Western Hemisphere. After the Portuguese reconquest of Brazil in 1654, he returned to Amsterdam, where he headed a rabbinical academy. He was a member of the rabbinical tribunal that excommunicated Baruch *Spinoza. ABOMINATION, a term used to call attention to an action or type of behavior, only occasionally an object (e.g., a graven image in Dt. 7.26; a forbidden food in Dt. 14.3) and never a person, considered repulsive by either God or man. Deuteronomy outlaws practices that are “abhorrent to the Lord” and accuses the Canaanite peoples of being guilty of them all (Dt. 12.31). Among these are child sacrifice (Dt. 12.31), recourse to magic and divination (Dt. 18.12), the bringing of a harlot's hire or the price of a dog in payment of a vow (Dt. 23.19), and the use of false weights and measures (Dt. 25.16). Paganism is intrinsically abhorrent (Dt. 7.25–26), and its practitioners are called “nations of abominations” (Ezr. 9.14). Israel's abominations, that is, the foreign gods she repeatedly worships, enrage God (Dt. 32.16); the prophet Ezekiel attributes God's decision to bring about the destruction of Jerusalem to Israel's contamination of the pure and exclusive worship of the Lord (Ez. 5.9, 11, 6.9, 8.6–13). Sexual crimes are referred to as abominations in Leviticus 18.6–30. It is said that Erets Yisra'el itself will “vomit out” any nation—Canaanite or Israelite—guilty of such practices, and that the individual practitioner is doomed to divine punishment.

ABORTION. The killing of a fetus does not carry the death penalty in Jewish law, since a fetus is only considered a person in criminal cases once its major part has emerged from its mother's body. This is derived from the Bible, which provides that the penalty for assaulting a pregnant woman and causing her to miscarry is financial compensation to her husband. The biblical rule governing homicide, that is, “a life for a life,” only applies if the woman also dies as a result of the assault (Ex. 21.22–23). The Mishnah permits the killing of a fetus, even during childbirth, in order to save the mother's life (Ohal. 7.6). There is, however, a clear distinction between not providing a criminal sanction for feticide and permitting it outright; hence, many rabbinic authorities maintain that nontherapeutic abortion is indeed forbidden by rabbinic law. The scope of therapeutic abortion is not a narrowly defined one, and there are many ongoing debates in this area of halakhah. Maimonides seemed to confine therapeutic abortion to cases in which the fetus poses a direct and immediate threat to the physical and mental health of the mother. Abortions of pregnancies resulting from rape or which would result in the mother's loss of sight or hearing have also been considered justified in Jewish law. Opinions are divided regarding the abortion of the fetus of a mother who contracted rubella during pregnancy and in relation to severe disorders that may be detected by genetic analysis during the early part of pregnancy; for example, Tay-Sachs disease and Down's syndrome. With regard to the abortion of defective fetuses, the lenient school permits abortion until the seventh month. The issues of fetal reduction in artificial reproductive procedures and of the use of fetal tissue for research and therapeutic purposes have generally been treated in a permissive fashion in Jewish law. In general, Reform Judaism supports choice in the area of abortion.

ABRAHAM (Heb. Avraham), father and founder of the Hebrew people; the first of the *patriarchs. The story of Abraham's life as recorded in Genesis 11.27–25.18 is a combination of several traditions. Scholars are divided as to the time in which Abraham lived, dating him anywhere between 2000 and 1400, but most place him in the eighteenth century BCE. According to biblical tradition, though Abraham's ancestors (including his father, Terah) worshiped many gods (see Jos. 24.2), he was the first to worship only one and is considered the founder of the monotheist tradition and the first Hebrew (or Israelite or Jew). More accurately, however, Abraham's own religion can be labeled monolatry (the worship of one deity, without denying the existence of other gods), which only later evolved into monotheism (the belief in one deity).

The biblical account begins with God speaking to Abraham (first called Abram [Gn. 11.27–17.5], then a dialectal variant, Abraham, interpreted in Gn. 17.5 as “Father of a multitude of nations”) and commanding him to leave his native Mesopotamia, where he was born in the vicinity of Ur of the Chaldees, and to go to the land of Canaan (Gn. 12). Abraham, at the age of seventy-five, and his wife *Sarah (Sarai) immigrated to Canaan and there lived in various cities, notably Hebron. God promised Abraham offspring who would develop into a great nation and possession of the land of Canaan (the “promised land”). The ensuing narrative revolves around the fulfillment of this promise. His son *Ishmael was born to a secondary wife, Hagar, and at Sarah’s insistence they were driven away. Sarah miraculously gave birth to a son in old age, Isaac (Gn. 21), who was to be the heir of the covenantal promise. A dramatic crisis, endangering this promise, occurred when God commanded Abraham to sacrifice Isaac (the aqedah; Gn. 22). Abraham passed this supreme test of his faith in God by his readiness to obey, but God prevented the consummation of the sacrifice. The *covenant established between God and Abraham (Gn. 15) forms the basis of biblical religion: God will be the God of Abraham and his descendants, and Abraham and his descendants will be the people of God. The binding symbol of the covenant is circumcision. The story of the aqedah is followed by the account of Sarah’s death (including Abraham’s purchase of the cave of *Machpelah in Hebron for a burial site; Gn. 23) and the procurement of a bride, *Rebekah, for Isaac (Gn. 24). The Bible notes that, in addition to Hagar and Sarah, Abraham had a third wife, Keturah, whom he married after Sarah’s death, and through her six additional children were born (Gn. 25.1–6). When Abraham died, his sons Isaac and Ishmael buried him next to Sarah in the cave of Machpelah (Gn. 25.7–10).

The Midrash tells many stories about Abraham, for example, his smashing of Terah’s idols while still a youth and his institution of morning prayers. He is the symbol of *hospitality (Gn. 18) and the first of the guests welcomed in the *Ushpizin ceremony in the sukkah during Sukkot. Abraham plays an important role in Islam, since Muslims view Abraham as the founder of their religion as well, with descent passing from Abraham through Ishmael to later historical Arabs, and the Qur’an includes many stories of Abraham derived from both biblical and Midrashic sources.

ABRAMSKY, YEHEZQEL (1886–1976), rabbi and scholar. He was born in Lithuania and studied at the yeshivot of Tels, Mir, and Slobodka. He was also a student of R. Hayyim Soloveichik of Brisk and of R. Hayyim ‘Ozer Grodzenski of Vilna. After World War I, Abramsky became rabbi of Slutsk and later of Smolensk. In 1928 he was permitted by the Soviet authorities to publish a journal (which he edited with S. Y. Zevin), Yagdil Torah, on halakhic issues. However, in 1930 he was sentenced to hard labor for his efforts to strengthen Judaism in the Soviet Union. Released in 1932 after international appeals for clemency, he immigrated to London, where he worked to strengthen traditional Jewish life in England, becoming rabbi of the Maḥzike ha-Das synagogue and dayyan (judge) of the London beit din (rabbinic court). In 1951 he retired and moved to Jerusalem. In Israel, he was appointed a member of Agudat Israel’s Mo’etset Gedolei ha-Torah (rabbinic leadership council) and became a significant and influential figure in Israeli Orthodox circles. He was also president of the Va’ad ha-Yeshivot (Council of Yeshivot).

Abramsky wrote extensively on Talmudic and halakhic subjects; most of his books bear the title Hazon Yehezqel. His most prominent work is a commentary on Tosefta’ (Tosefta’ Hazon Yehezqel, 19 vols. [1925–1967]). He also wrote Qovets Ma’amarim Dinei Mammonot (1979) and Peninei Rabbenu Yehezqel le-Sheqidat ha-Torah ule-Yir’ah (1983).

ABRAVANEL FAMILY, influential Spanish, Portuguese, and Italian scholars.

Yitsḥaq Abravanel (1437–1508), Bible commentator, philosopher, statesman, and communal leader. He succeeded his father as treasurer to King Alfonso V of Portugal. Because he was believed to be involved in a plot against King João II, Yitsḥaq was sentenced to death in absentia but managed to flee to Castile. In 1492, however, although an influential minister at the court of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, he failed to dissuade them from executing the expulsion of Spanish Jewry. He himself fled to Naples and then to Venice, where his talents as financial adviser to the monarch soon brought him into the forefront of public activity.

His literary productions cover many subjects in the realm of biblical exegesis, philosophy, and theology. Abravanel’s political experience is much in evidence in his diffuse biblical commentary dealing with the entire Bible (except the Hagiographa). For example, in his commentary on 1 Samuel 8 (the institutions of monarchy) he praises the constitution of Venice as the best form of government. He compared the social institutions of biblical times with those of his own day, which he was in a unique position to observe through his long diplomatic experience. While drawing heavily on his forerunners, he did so with a keen critical sense and oc-asionally accepted the opinions of Christian scholars when they did not conflict with the Jewish faith.

Compared to the classical medieval exegesis, his treatment of the Bible is copious and discursive yet lucid and popular. Instead of commenting on individual verses, he divided the Pentateuch into thematic sections, prefacing each by a number of varied queries, the answers to which constituted the bulk of his commentary. Often sermonistic in character, the commentary is largely philosophical and eschews philological or kabbalistic explanations of the text. Nevertheless, though rejecting philosophical allegory, Abravanel held that the Bible contained an esoteric as well as a literal meaning. A rationalist by training as well as by inclination, his position remained strictly traditional, and though much absorbed in philosophy, he maintained that it must take second place to religion. He also opposed the tendency to sum up the totality of Judaism in a given set of dogmatic principles and held that all elements of the Torah equally shared divine authority and significance. His original view of messianism is expressed, for example, in his commentary on the Book of Daniel, in which he also attacks Christian scholars for manipulating the biblical text in order to suit their own particular views. In some of his commentaries, he affirms belief in the coming Messiah, who he thought would appear in the year 1503 and whose advent would be preceded by the resurrection of the dead; the tribulations associated with the expulsion from Spain were thus regarded as the period of trial before the coming of the Messiah.

Abravanel's philosophy is neither original nor free from internal contradictions. His main purpose was to liberate Jewish philosophy—especially that of Maimonides—from those elements that detract from complete faith. Thus, one of his disciples reports that after expounding the views of Maimonides in a lecture, he concluded, "Thus the opinion of our master, Mosheh son of Maimon, but not that of our master, Mosheh son of Amram" (i.e., the biblical Moses). He argued that it was through prophecy that God communicated his truth to humanity, and he attacked any naturalistic explanation of biblical phenomenon. He differed from Maimonides in his conception of the source of prophecy, which he held lay not in the active intellect but in God himself. Abravanel believed that Israel is the recipient of special divine providence, whereas other nations receive providence only indirectly through the working of natural law. Yitshaq's works, which include commentaries on Avot, the Pesah Haggadah, and Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed, were eagerly read by the Spanish exiles, and their forecast of an imminent messianic era helped pave the way for the initial success of David *Re'uveni and Shelomoh *Molkho. Yitshaq's philosophical speculations, however—the last link in the chain of medieval Jewish philosophy—exercised little future influence, partly because of the growing counterattraction of kabbalistic thought. His biblical commentaries were not studied long by Jews, but in Latin translations they influenced Christian scholars from the sixteenth through the eighteenth century.

His writings included commentaries on the Pentateuch (Venice, 1579) and the Prophets (Pesaro, 1511–1512 and 1520); the messianic work Ma'eyenei ha-Yeshu'ah (Ferrara, 1551); and the philosophical works 'Ateret Zeqenim (Sabionetta, 1557) and Ro'sh Amanah (Constantinople, 1508).

Yehudah Abravanel (c.1460–1521), Italian philosopher, poet, and physician; son of Yitshaq Abravanel; also known as Leone Ebreo or Leo Hebraeus. Yehudah Abravanel's infant son was forcibly baptized in Portugal; he laments this event in his poem "Telunah 'al Zeman." A practicing physician in Naples, Yehudah also published four poems in memory of his father. His Latin work De coeli harmonia has not survived, and his reputation rests on his posthumously published Dialoghi d'amore, one of the first philosophical works written in Italian.

Modeled on the Platonic dialogue, Dialoghi d'amore examines the nature of spiritual and intellectual love, which is regarded by Abravanel as the principle dominating all existence and reaching its apotheosis in the love of God (amore intellectivo di Dio). This love, according to Abravanel, permeates the entire universe, and through it all creatures attain their perfection. God is identified with love; hence, the soul reaches God by loving him. The mutual love that exists between God and the universe creates a powerful circle of love, turning on every section of the cosmos from the highest celestial sphere to the lowest earthly stone. The goal of individual love lies in the joy of the lover in union with the beloved, who embodies all that is good and beautiful. Ultimate love involves the same union of God the creator with his creation. From this central theory derives a wealth of reflections on religion, metaphysics, mysticism, ethics, esthetics, logic, psychology, cosmology, mythology, astrology, and astronomy. Abravanel's humanist thought is influenced both by the Neoplatonist philosophy cultivated in the fifteenth-century Platonic academy of Florence and by the works of Maimonides and Ibn Gabirol. This typically Renaissance work exerted a considerable influence on sixteenth-century European thought and lyric poetry (e.g., Michelangelo, Tasso, Camoëns, Montaigne, Bruno, Spinoza) and was followed by a large number of imitative treatises, although by the end of the sixteenth century it was virtually forgotten. It was not widely known in Jewish circles. Dialoghi d'amore was first published in Rome in 1535 and within twenty years had at least five editions. The book was twice translated into Spanish and three times into French. A facsimile, Leone Ebreo, edited by C. Gebhardt (with introduction and bibliography), appeared in Bibliotheca Spinozana (vol. 3 [Heidelberg, 1929]) and in an English translation, Leo Hebraeus, by F. Friedeberg-Seeley and J. H. Barnes (1937).

ABROGATION OF LAWS. The abrogation of Torah law (biblical commandments) by the sages falls into three distinctly different categories: temporary abrogation, permanent abrogation, and incidental abrogation. Each of these three broad categories can be understood separately.

Temporary Abrogation. Jewish law recognizes the authority of the sages of every generation to suspend Torah laws on a case-by-case basis when the continued enforcement will be profoundly deleterious to the needs of the Jewish people. As Maimonides states (Hilkhot Mamrim 2.4) “just as a doctor may amputate a hand or a foot to save the patient’s life, so too, a beit din may decree, in proper circumstances, a temporary violation of the mitsvot to preserve all of them.” However, these suspensions—derived from the conduct of Elijah on Mount Carmel, which violated Jewish law (1 Kgs. 18, 19–26)—may not be of any significant duration. One, and perhaps the only, exception to the temporary nature of the abrogation, is in the area of criminal law, where the Talmud notes that local courts have the authority to punish criminals if the court feels that without such punishment society might deteriorate into lawlessness. The court-ordered killing of a person in a situation where Jewish law would not normally sanction this person’s death is considered a temporary suspension of the prohibition to kill.

Permanent Abrogation. Jewish law recognized the right of the Talmudic sages, whose ordination was considered part of the unbroken chain from Moses, to suspend permanently the fulfillment of any given commandment when such suspension could be done through inactivity rather than activity. Thus, the Talmudic sages decreed that one may not blow the shofar on Ro’sh ha-Shanah when it falls on the Sabbath, and that one may not use a lulav on the first day of Sukkot when that date falls on the Sabbath. Both of these decrees were permanent even though the effect of these Talmudic rulings was to abrogate the fulfillment of the biblical directive. A minority of later scholars limits this authority to cases where the Bible did not explicitly permit the activity that the sages sought to curtail. Although *Rava’ and *Hisa’d dispute as to whether the sages have the authority to prevent the fulfillment of a biblical obligation even through affirmative action (Yev. 89a–b), the normative decision is that the active permanent abrogation of Jewish law is a power not granted even to the Talmudic sages.

Incidental Abrogation. The sages developed a number of incidental techniques that had the effect of increasing the number of cases where they could abrogate the effect of an action, including a mitsvah. Since the Talmudic sages had the authority to make ownerless a person’s property (hefker beit din hefker), they also had the authority to reverse the effect of those actions done by a person that are predicated on their ownership of particular items. Thus, Sheqalim 1.2 tells that the illicit hybrid plants grown by violators of Jewish law were declared ownerless so as to punish those who violate Jewish law, and later authorities applied this principle to justify a variety of communal decrees.

Finally, and quite separately, there were a limited number of cases where, out of mercy to ‘agunot’ (see ‘AGUNAH), the sages of Talmudic times appear to have abrogated a number of the classical rules relating to the ending of marriages. There remains to this day a dispute among the decisors concerning the exact rationale for these decrees and whether they really involved the abrogation of any Torah commandment.

ABSALOM (Heb. Avshalom), the third of the six sons born to King *David during the seven years he was enthroned at Hebron, capital of Judah. Absalom’s mother was Maacah, daughter of King Talmi of Geshur (1 Chr. 3.1–4). The statement in 2 Samuel 14.27 that “Absalom had three sons and a daughter whose name was Tamar; she was a beautiful woman” is a notable exception to the general rule that biblical genealogies name only the husbands and sons, while the wives and daughters are nameless. Perhaps this later Tamar was named for Absalom’s beautiful sister (2 Sm. 13.10ff.), who was raped by Amnon, their paternal half brother. Absalom, in turn, avenged her violation by having Amnon executed while the latter was drunk (2 Sm. 13.28–29), after which Absalom took refuge in the palace of his maternal grandfather for three years (2 Sm. 13.37). At the end of that time, Joab sent the wise woman of Tekoa to convince David to allow Absalom to return unharmed to Jerusalem. The king agreed but refused to meet him face to face for another two years. Later, Absalom organized a populist rebellion against David (2 Sm. 15), and Absalom had to flee Jerusalem and take refuge at Mahanaim. In the course of the civil war that ensued, Absalom was caught in a terebinth (2 Sam. 18.9) by his long hair (see 1 Sm. 14.25–26). Defying David’s orders to spare his beloved son, his general Joab drove three darts into Absalom’s chest and then had his arms-bearers beat Absalom to death. In response to King David’s inconsolable grief at the loss of his son, “the victory that day was turned into mourning for all the troops,” who “stole into town that day like troops ashamed after running away in battle” (2 Sm. 19.3–4).

ABUDARHAM, DAVID BEN YOSEF (14th cent.), Spanish author of a commentary on the liturgy, the encyclopedic Sefer Abudarham. The book draws on a vast range of sources (the Talmud, the ge'onim, and later commentators), many of which are otherwise unknown. Abudarham fully expounded the prayer book, piyyutim, and the Haggadah, described divergences in local customs, explained the calendar, and elucidated rabbinical regulations governing prayer and benedictions. Sefer Abudarham was first published in Lisbon in 1490 and frequently reprinted. A scholarly edition by S. A. Wertheimer appeared in Jerusalem in 1959 and 1963.

ABUḤATSEIRA', YA'AQOV. See ABI-ḤASIRA, YA'AQOV.

ABU 'ISSA AL-ISFAHANI (8th cent.), founder of the first Jewish sect to emerge under Islam. His original name was Yitshaq ben Ya'aqov, but he became known in Hebrew as 'Ovadyah (Servant of the Lord). The Iranian plateau was fertile ground for Islamic as well as Jewish sectarianism in the eighth century. Abu 'Issa did not claim to be the Messiah but rather the last of five messengers (Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Muḥammad) who were forerunners of the Messiah. Many Persian Jews accepted his claim, and some ten thousand joined him in rebellion against the Abbasid rulers during the turbulent first half of the eighth century. After several years, the revolt was put down, and Abu 'Issa was killed in the fighting. His followers invested him with supernatural powers and believed that he had not been killed but was hidden and would soon reappear to lead them to Erets Yisra'el. His followers, particularly Yudghan and Mushka, adhered to distinctive practices (e.g., seven daily prayers instead of three, a prohibition against divorce, a ban on the consumption of meat and wine), which combined aspects of Judaism with asceticism. Since the Isawites (or Isunians), as Abu 'Issa's followers were known, did not diverge from normative Judaism in their observance of holidays or in the basic teachings and practices of Judaism, rabbinical authorities permitted marriage with them. The Isawites continued on the margins of an ever stronger rabbinic community, nurtured by Muslim mystical movements and expectations of the return of their leader. A handful of Isawites still existed in Damascus in the tenth century.

ABULAFIA, AVRAHAM BEN SHEMU'EL (13th cent.), Spanish mystic. Moved by what he called "the spirit of prophecy," Abulafia went to Rome to convert Pope Nicholas III to Judaism and was saved from being burned at the stake only by the pope's sudden death. His predictions of the imminent end of the world led to the charge of messianic pretension, for which he was persecuted by the rabbis, notably Shelomoh ben Avraham *Adret. Abulafia founded a new school of mysticism that taught methods of inducing states of illumination and mystical ecstasy through contemplation of the letters of the Hebrew *alphabet. Since these letters were the constituent elements of God's name, the path to the highest stage of illumination lay in meditation upon these coded divine names, by means of the science of letter combination (ḥokhmat ha-tseruf). Abulafia emphasized ecstatic experience rather than theosophical doctrines; hence, he called his method "The Path of the Names," in contrast to the path of the sefirot. Abulafia regarded his system as a continuation of the teaching of Maimonides, whom he admired as a kabbalist and on whose Guide of the Perplexed he wrote a commentary. Since Maimonides equated the highest stage of spiritual contemplation with prophecy, Abulafia also named his system "Prophetic [ecstatic] Kabbalah." Although Abulafia's work was not widely known and little of it appeared in print, his teaching greatly influenced later kabbalistic practice, especially in sixteenth-century Safed.

ABULAFIA FAMILY, a family of Castilian Talmudists.

Me'ir ben Todros ha-Levi Abulafia (c.1170–1244), Castilian Talmudist who lived most of his life in Toledo, playing a significant role in the organizational life of his community and of Spanish Jewry as a whole. He was the first European scholar to attack Moses *Maimonides for his theory of resurrection (which Abulafia believed would be corporeal) and other doctrines, thus precipitating the bitter thirty-year *Maimonidean Controversy. Abulafia was regarded as the leading contemporary Castilian rabbinic authority, and many scholars, including Nahmanides, submitted their halakhic queries for his decision. Abulafia's main work is the Aramaic Peratei Peratim, which consisted of novellae on most of the Talmud; only the sections on Bava' Batra' (Salonika, 1790) and Sanhedrin (Salonika, 1798) have survived. Writing at great length, Abulafia carefully analyzed all possible applications of the law; he explained difficult words by reference to Arabic. He also studied *Masorah, on which he wrote Masoret Seyag la-Torah (Florence, 1750), and wrote poems that throw an interesting light on his period.

Todros ben Yosef Abulafia (c.1220–1298), Spanish kabbalist and chief rabbi of Castile; nephew of Me'ir ben Todros ha-Levi Abulafia. Though he was close to the court, the asceticism that he practiced as well as preached was in sharp contrast to the general licentiousness of contemporary Jewish courtiers. He denounced the laxity of the Jews of Castile and demanded high standards of morality and religious observance. Abulafia's mystical teachings stressed the gnostic elements of Kabbalah. His Otsar ha-Kavod (1879), a mystical commentary on Talmudic legends, is a difficult work replete with esoteric references.

ACADEMIES, seats of higher rabbinic learning in Talmudic times until the end of the geonic period. The Hebrew term for an academy was yeshivah* (sitting), derived from the fixed seating arrangements for the rabbis and their pupils. The Aramaic equivalent, metivta', was used in Babylonia. The first academies were in Palestine (Erets Yisra'el) and Babylonia.

Institutions for the study of both the written and oral law were held by the ancient rabbis to be so essential a feature of Jewish life that they could not conceive of a time when academies did not exist. The aggadah* is replete with stories of the patriarchs*—especially Jacob—studying at the famous academy of Shem and Eber (cf. Gn. Rab. 68.11). The idealization of the academy is such that R. Hama' bar Hanina'* states, "Academies never ceased to exist in the history of our forefathers" (Yoma' 28b). According to rabbinic tradition, the chief exponents of the law were carried away into the Babylonian exile together with King Jehoiachin (Git. 88a). The main point of this assertion is to support the claim of the Babylonian academies that they preserved the authentic sacred tradition, since they did not suffer the trauma of the destruction of the Second Temple and the oppression and decline experienced by the Palestinian academies. In any case, Babylonia became a great center of Jewish learning; so much so that Hillel*, who moved from Babylonia to Palestine, is generally thought to have taken with him the rich heritage of Babylonian scholarship. There are references to an academy on the Temple mount in Jerusalem, during the Second Temple period (Suk. 53a; T., San. 7.1).

After the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, the academy no less than the local synagogue replaced it as the center of Jewish religion and Jewish nationhood. The basic character of rabbinic Judaism was forged in the academy set up at Yavneh*, but there soon grew up other centers of Jewish learning. These centers usually constituted major courts of law (battei din) as well as places of study. Several outstanding pupils of R. Yohanan ben Zakk'ai* established academies at Lydda, Peqi'in, Sikhnin, Bene Beraq, and elsewhere in Palestine. But it was at Yavneh that the great work of establishing the definite form of prayer, of determining the biblical canon, and of codifying the oral law was begun.

The period of the Bar Kokhba' Revolt* (131–135) was one of great crisis for the Palestinian academies, and many scholars left for Babylonia, Rome, and elsewhere. After the rebellion, Jewish learning in Palestine was able to recover only in Galilee, where the official academies of the patriarchs were set up, first at Usha', then Sepphoris, Beit She'arim*, and Tiberias*. It was here, under the leadership of R. Shim'on ben Gamli'el* and R. Yehudah ha-Nasi', that the Mishnah underwent its final redaction and was put into written form.

The completion of Mishnah and Tosefta'* brought an end to the period of the tanna'im (see TANNA'). Henceforth, the work of the academies was to interpret the Mishnah and its parallel literature. This began the period of the amora'im (see AMORA'), which lasted in Palestine until the completion of the Talmud Yerushalmi*, in the academy of Tiberias at the end of the fourth century. Apart from Tiberias, the academy of R. Abbahu* in Caesarea contributed much to the Talmud Yerushalmi, and there were other centers at Sepphoris and Lydda. In the early fifth century, as a result of Byzantine oppression, the academies of Palestine began to decline, and many scholars left for Babylonia. Not until the Arab conquest in the seventh century were they to recover in any measure, but it was already too late to overtake the firmly established hegemony of the Babylonian schools.

The history of academies in Babylonia before the period of the Bar Kokhba' Revolt can only be conjectured. Definite historical information becomes available only with the Bar Kokhba' period. The students of R. Aqiva'* fled abroad—R. Yosei ben Halafta'* to Cappadocia, R. Me'ir* to Asia Minor, R. El'azar ben Shammu'a* and R. Yohanan ha-Sandalar* to Nisibis, and R. Nehemiah to Babylonia. The students of R. Yishma'el, R. Yonatan and R. Josiah went to Hutsal. They either established their own temporary schools or joined the few already existing ones. Of the latter, the most famous were those of Yehudah ben Bathyra, in existence before the destruction of the Second Temple, and of Hananyah, nephew of R. Yehoshu'a, at Nehar Pekod, established around the end of the first century. Hananyah had attempted to usurp the leadership of the Palestinian academies after the Bar Kokhba' Revolt by assuming their prerogatives of establishing the dates for the festivals, intercalating the years, and so forth. Only after a struggle did the students of R. 'Aqiva', who reassembled in Usha' in Palestine after the end of the persecutions, succeed in forcing Hananyah to relinquish this usurped authority. The students of R. Yishma'el, however, did not return to Palestine. Remaining in Hutsal-Nehardea in Babylonia, and at Nisibis, they provided a strong stimulus to Babylonian study. During the patriarchate of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' in Palestine, Abba' bar Abba' was spiritual head of the Babylonian community in Nehardea. There were frequent exchanges in questions of halakhah between him and the scholars of Palestine. His son Shemu'el inherited this leadership and was the recognized head of the first generation of amora'im in Babylonia. Shemu'el's distinguished colleague R. Abba' Arikha', known as Rav*, returned from Palestine and established the great academy at Sura* in south Babylonia. At this time, the number of students at the academies was at its maximum. In addition to the twelve hundred regular students at the academy of Rav (Ket. 106a), who probably received most of their material support from the resources of the academy, there assembled twice a year in the months of Adar and Elul (see KALLAH MONTHS) students from all parts of Babylonia to hear lectures on the particular tractate assigned each half year for home study. The institution of the kallah months was also taken over by the academy at Pumbedita*, which had replaced the one at Nehardea*, destroyed in 259. The Pumbedita academy was removed by *Rava' to his native Maḥoza, where it was augmented by many pupils fleeing Roman persecution in Palestine. His successor *Naḥman ben Yitshaq returned to Pumbedita, while his contemporary *Papa' located his academy at Naresh, near Sura. During this period, the editing of the Talmud Bavli, according to the varying traditions of Pumbedita and Naresh, may be seriously considered to have begun. The close of the Talmud marks the end of the amoraic period. The savora'im (see SAVORA') continued the work of the academy, but probably limited themselves to adding explanatory notes to the Talmud and to publishing it. With the Arab conquest, the geonic period, marked by a revival of the academy of Pumbedita and Sura, was inaugurated.

As to the structure of the academy, it was headed by a ro'sh yeshivah*, or (in Aramaic) resh metivta' (head of the academy), who would sit and expound to his audience through a meturgeman* (interpreter), who was also called an amora' (Ber. 27b). Since not all of the students would immediately grasp what had been said, leading disciples would repeat and explain the lesson (B. Q. 117a). The students would then repeat the lesson orally ('Eruv. 54b). These leading disciples were sometimes called reshei kallah (leaders of the rows), possibly because they sat in the front row of the academy. The students were arranged according to knowledge and seniority, the more advanced students in the front rows and the junior ones in the back rows. Different academies had different numbers of rows. Palestinian academies appear to have had three semicircular rows, patterning themselves on the Sanhedrin, while sources tell of Babylonian academies with seven or even twenty-four rows. The ro'sh yeshivah was generally appointed by the sages of the academy, and on occasion, several candidates would compete for the position; the ability to make an irrefutable statement appears to have been the criterion for election (Hor. 14a). Ultimately, the aim of the academies was to produce scholars who were conversant in all fields of oral law and who could derive from existing halakhah laws applicable to new situations (Hul. 9a). In most cases, they specialized in law, but there also appear to have been academies where the emphasis was on ag-gadah.

The nature of rabbinic instruction in Babylonia during the period of the amora'im, and in particular the existence of organized rabbinic academies at this time, are the subject of much scholarly controversy. Information on these questions comes primarily from two types of sources: hints and assertions within the Talmud Bavli, and statements in geonic literature, especially in the Epistle of *Sherira' Ga'on. The reliability of these sources has, in recent years, been questioned on various grounds; in particular, some have argued that the ge'onim projected back to the amoraic period institutions with which they were familiar themselves, which had actually originated only in this later period.

During most of the geonic period, there were two leading academies: those of Sura and Pumbedita; both of these relocated to Baghdad at about the end of the ninth century but retained their names. At times, one or the other academy was temporarily split into two, when its scholars were unable to agree on the appointment of a ga'on; the academy of Sura was closed throughout most of the second half of the tenth century. A third academy was officially headed by the *exilarch; it had close ties with the academy of Sura, and it appears that when geonic sources refer to "the two academies," it is these two institutions to which they are referring.

In striking contrast to the situation during the Talmudic period, the geonic academies were well-organized institutions dominated by a small number of scholarly families. Although it was almost unheard of for a son to succeed his father as ga'on (the only exception being that of *Ha'i Ga'on, at the end of the period), many ge'onim were the sons, grandsons or other relatives of previous ge'onim. The ge'onim were generally appointed at an advanced age and served for only a few years each, presumably until they died or became unable to fulfill their duties. The selection of a ga'on was apparently left in most cases to the scholars of the academy, but the exilarch sometimes took an active role in this process, even bringing scholars from one academy to head the other in certain cases.

Each academy had a number of leading officials, beginning with the ga'on at its head and his second-in-command, the av beit din, or dayyana' be-bava'. Below these were seven scholars, each of whom was known as an alluf or resh kallah, and who were considered responsible for ten scholars apiece among the inner core of seventy, which was viewed as a continuation of the ancient *Sanhedrin. These scholars were expected to be in constant attendance at the academy and were supported by stipends, while larger numbers of students and scholars joined the academy on a temporary and less formal basis, especially in the kallah months. The scribe of the academy, who conducted its correspondence, was an important figure; this position was sometimes a stepping-stone to the gaonate itself.

The academies had two main sources of income: donations, which were often sent together with questions addressed to the ga'on; and taxes imposed on the Jewish communities of particular territories, which were considered to be subject to their authority. In these territories the academies exercised very considerable power, including the appointment of judges and other local officials. Elsewhere their authority was based on a voluntary relationship, founded on the widespread recognition of their preeminence as interpreters of the Talmud and its application to practical life. This found expression in the custom of addressing queries on Talmudic and legal matters to the academies; the answers (responsa*) were dictated by the ga'on, on behalf of and with the participation of other leading members of the academy. These responsa are the characteristic literary vehicle of the period, and they had a major impact on later rabbinic literature.

The curriculum of the academies was based on the Talmud Bavli, although not all of its tractates were studied regularly. Normally two tractates were studied in any given year, one in each "semester," which consisted of five months during which most of the students studied a selected tractate at their homes, followed by a kallah month during which they gathered at the academy for communal review, discussion, and examinations. The Talmud was transmitted primarily by oral recitation, although use was sometimes made of written texts as well. In addition to the canonical Talmudic text, there were extra-Talmudic halakhic traditions which were transmitted orally in fixed formulations in the circles of the academies; these constitute one of the sources of works produced in the early geonic period: She'iltot*, Halakhot Pesuqot*, and Halakhot Gedolot*.

From about the middle of the fourth century until the ninth whatever rabbinic academies may have operated in Palestine have left almost no direct traces in the available sources. This period was less of a wilderness than it once appeared, as information is now available on intellectual and literary activity on an impressive scale in various fields, but there is almost no evidence concerning an institutional site for these activities. There are some indications that Tiberias, which had been the home of the leading Palestinian academy in the amoraic period, continued to play a central role in the ninth century, although the sources do not speak unequivocally of a functioning academy.

Relatively abundant documentation concerning a central Palestinian academy becomes available only in the tenth and eleventh centuries, thanks to the material preserved in the Cairo Genizah*, which includes hundreds of documentary items bearing on that academy in this period. When viewed from the perspective of approximately contemporaneous Babylonian institutions, the Palestinian academy may be said to have combined the functions of the two leading Babylonian academies (Sura and Pumbedita) with those of the exilarchate. The head of the Palestinian academy was recognized by the Muslim authorities as the official representative of the Jewish community in the area known as the reshut, comprising Palestine, Lebanon, Syria, and Egypt, in temporal as well as in religious matters. In the surviving documents relating to this institution, it is the political and administrative dimensions of the academy that figure most prominently. Intellectual discussions of the sort that predominate in the writings of the Babylonian ge'onim are few and far between, although some scholars have suggested that the Genizah finds may present a misleading picture in this respect. In general, the intellectual culture of Palestine in this period presents a different picture from that of Babylonia: while the intellectual elite of Babylonia traditionally concentrated almost exclusively on the study of the Talmud and its practical application in matters of halakhah, literary creativity in Palestine was much more varied, encompassing such fields as midrash*, piyyut*, and Masoretic and related studies, in addition to halakhic and Talmudic literature.

In its internal organization, the Palestinian academy, even more than the comparable Babylonian institutions, was dominated by a small number of families (two of which were of priestly origin); it was not unusual for several members of the same immediate family to hold leading positions, simultaneously, or for a son to inherit his father's place at the head of the academy. The Palestinian academy shared with its Babylonian counterparts the titles of the two highest-ranking officials: ga'on and av beit din. The next five scholars in the academic hierarchy received numerical titles: The Third (in the academy), The Fourth, and so on. Another important title, with which religious or communal leaders from outside the academy were dignified, was haver (comparable to the Babylonian titles of alluf and resh kallah).

The granting of honorary titles to outsiders was one aspect of a complex web of relationships that linked the academy with a far-flung Diaspora, including not only the reshut, which was officially subject to the Palestinian center, but also other territories (such as Sicily and parts of Italy) that had been included in the Byzantine empire. The heads of the academy were consulted on communal as well as legal issues and appointed religious functionaries for the communities of the reshut. In contrast, the academy was largely dependent on the financial support and political connections of Jewish communities outside Palestine. The most important of these was the community of Egypt.

The history of the Palestinian academy is marked by a series of struggles between factions and contenders for leadership, both within the academy itself and in the larger Jewish community; this can be interpreted in large part as reflecting the rise and decline of competing Jewish centers. The rise of the Jewish communities of the Maghreb brought into prominence families of North Africa, and they contended for the leadership of the Palestinian academy from about the 980s, producing many of its ge'onim in the eleventh century. In the course of this century, there was increasing competition from the Egyptian center, which came to a head during the tenure of Evyatar ben Eliyyahu ha-Kohen*. As a result of political and economic vicissitudes, the academy, which had operated for hundreds of years in Jerusalem and other Palestinian cities (notably Ramleh), had to move to Tyre and thence to Damascus, a step that seriously weakened its remaining claim to legitimate authority and strengthened the relative position of other contenders. By the early twelfth century the academy had moved to Fustat, where it was absorbed into the Egyptian Jewish community.

ACADEMY ON HIGH (Heb. yeshivah shel ma'lah), heavenly academy. In what is possibly its oldest attestation, Sifrei on Numbers 92, the Hebrew term refers to the tribunal that is the heavenly counterpart of the earthly *Sanhedrin. Such an understanding of yeshivah shel ma'lah is reflected also in the formula permitting sinners to join in the *Kol Nidrei service, introduced into the Ashkenazi ritual by R. *Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg in the thirteenth century, and in the prayer for adding a new name to a person who is critically ill. A heavenly court of law composed of angels is referred to in the Talmud Yerushalmi as beit din shel ma'lah. The scholar David M. Goodblatt has demonstrated that in most amoraic sources, yeshivah generally means law court rather than academy. Since, however, the earthly beit din or Sanhedrin in tannaitic and amoraic sources not only combined executive, legislative, and judicial functions but also performed the functions of a faculty of law (San. 4.3–4), yeshivah shel ma'lah and its Aramaic equivalent metivta' di-rqi'a (heavenly metivta') frequently refer to a heavenly college of rabbinic studies, admission to which is rewarded to the souls of those who on earth were teachers, scholars, or persons who provided financial support to Torah scholars (Pes. 53b; B. M. 85b–86a). Origen's (185–253 CE) notion of a heavenly academy lends support to the latter view of the yeshivah shel ma'lah, which is reflected also in the Zohar and cognate literature. Kabbalistic sources distinguish between the metivta' di-rqi'a, presided over by *Metatron, and the Academy on High, presided over by God. According to these sources the heavenly academy is subdivided into academic departments, such as the Academy of Moses, the Academy of Aaron, and the Academy of Love. In the Zoharic scheme only the souls of males are admitted to these departments, while women assemble on the eves of Sabbaths and festivals for classes in the knowledge of God taught by Miriam (Zohar, "Shelah Lekhah," p. 163a).

ACCENTS, signs employed in the biblical text to mark the cantillation for the public reading of the Torah, haftarah, and Five Scrolls; in Hebrew, ta'amei ha-miqra', ([signs indicating] the sense of the reading) or neginot ([signs of] the melodies); in popular (Yiddish) terminology, trop* signs. Like the vowel signs (see ALPHABET, HEBREW; MASORAH; VOCALIZATION), accents were introduced by the Masoretes in the eighth and ninth centuries CE. However, they were not an innovation; their purpose was to represent graphically, and to fix permanently, a tradition that had existed orally for many centuries, references to which are found throughout Talmudic literature. The accents exist in three different systems: Babylonian, Palestinian, and Tiberian; less developed systems exist among the Samaritans. The Tiberian system is the most elaborate and, as in all matters of Masorah, became authoritative; it has been used exclusively since the early medieval period. The accent signs are found in all printed Bibles, and in manuscripts they are placed both above and below the letters of the text, alongside the vowel signs. Torah scrolls, however, have neither vowel nor accent signs; the reader is required to learn the correct pronunciation and cantillation in advance of the public reading in the synagogue.

The cantillation of the Bible according to the masoretic accents is primarily a system of correctly dividing the text into its constituent parts, so that the content, as understood by the tradition, is accurately transmitted. Each sign represents a fixed melody that the listener comes to recognize as pausal or connective. Thus, every verse of the Bible, whatever its content, has the same musical theme; the variations are a result of length, sentence structure, and internal division.

The Tiberian system has two sets of signs, one for the strictly poetic books (Psalms, Proverbs, and the poetic portions of Job), and one for the remaining prose books. The prose-book accents are still used in the public chanting in the synagogue, and precise musical values for each sign are preserved by Jewish communities throughout the world. In the elaborate Ashkenazi tradition, different musical modes exist for Torah, haftarah, Esther, Lamentations, festival scrolls, and High Holy Day readings, even though all of these belong to the same prose-book system of accent signs. The musical traditions of the poetic books have fallen into disuse.

Each set of accents consists of disjunctives and conjunctives, referred to figuratively as masters and servants. The disjunctives, which include the verse-end mark (sof pasuq or silluq), indicate the divisions. They are traditionally known by terms such as emperors, kings, dukes, and counts. They occur according to a precise binary system of continuous dichotomy. Each verse is divided into two parts wherever its content best allows. The two parts may be of unequal length: the system is not quantitative but literary. Each of the two parts is, if long enough, subdivided, in turn, into two; and so on, until there remain no word groups long enough to subdivide. The concluding word of each division is marked with a disjunctive accent, in descending hierarchical order. The sections obtained by the first dichotomy conclude with the two emperors, etnahta' and sof pasuq, respectively; each of the emperors, if the section it concludes subdivides again, shares its domain with one or more kings; each king shares its section with one or more dukes; and so on. The remaining words, which mark no divisions, are given conjunctive accents; these, too, occur in precise order, each master having his own fixed servants. Thus, every word has a musical notation, with the exception of hyphenated words, which make up a single musical unit. The disjunctives mark both verse division and musical intonation, while the conjunctives are of musical importance only. None of the accent signs is equivalent to any of the modern punctuation marks (period, comma, semicolon, etc.); each one varies in syntactical significance from one verse to the next.

The accents serve another purpose as well. They are intoned on the syllable that receives the stress, thus preserving correct pronunciation and meaning. For historical reasons, however, some of the signs are not actually written (or printed) on the stressed consonant, and the reader must employ other rules to determine which syllable is to receive the musical accentuation. The rabbis of the Talmud, as well as many of the traditional commentators, attach significance to the verse division as represented by the accents, although only in recent times has the system begun to be understood in all its fine detail. Avraham ibn Ezra admonished the student to pay no heed to any interpretation that is not in accord with the accents, and as a general rule this warning was observed. Yet Ibn Ezra himself, as well as most other commentators, both ancient and modern, occasionally explained the text in a manner contrary to the accent signs.

ACCULTURATION. See ASSIMILATION.

ACHAN, member of the tribe of Judah during the period of Joshua's conquest of Canaan (also called Achar in 1 Chronicles 2.7). After the men of Ai unexpectedly routed the Israelites on the battlefield (Jos. 7.2–5), God informed Joshua that an Israelite had stolen from the herem (the proscribed spoil) from the conquest of Jericho and that he, the Lord, would not return to be with Israel until they had purged from their midst the perpetrator of this sin (Jos. 7.10–15). Lots were then cast, and Achan finally confessed to having stolen “a fine Shinar mantle, two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold weighing fifty shekels” (Jos. 7.16–21). He and his entire immediate family were then taken together with the forbidden booty to a valley, where they were burned and stoned by all Israel (Jos. 7.22–25). God's anger was then appeased, but the resulting huge mound of stones used in Achan's stoning remained as a landmark for this place, which was named the Valley of Achor (Jos. 7.26). The story is a powerful example of the doctrine of communal retribution—an individual commits a sin and all Israel is punished—and offers an etiological explanation for the name of the Valley of Achor.

ACOSTA, URIEL (1585–1640), religious skeptic born in Portugal of *Marrano parents. His study of the Hebrew Bible led him to doubt Christianity; to live openly as a Jew, he escaped with his family to Amsterdam, where he discovered, however, that the Judaism to which he had converted was different from the idea he had formed of it during his studies. Finding many of the rituals unbearable and recognizing only his literal understanding of the Hebrew Bible as Jewish, he attacked orally and in print (Examen dos tradiçoens phariseas conferidas con a ley escrita [1624]) both the general rabbinic tradition and the particular doctrines of immortality and resurrection. The communal authorities found his attacks intolerable not only as heresy but also as endangering the Jews' recently legitimized status in Dutch society. As a result he was excommunicated from Judaism. Poverty and isolation forced him to recant (1633), but he soon repeated his attacks on rabbinic Judaism, called himself a deist who followed a natural law, and was again put under ban. In 1640 he recanted once more but was required to subject himself to flogging (the usual penitential precondition for the lifting of the ban) and public penance. Having undergone the ordeal, he wrote a short autobiography (English translation in L. Schwartz, Memories of My People [1963], pp. 84–94) and then committed suicide. His tragic fate and abortive spiritual odyssey have inspired several novels and dramas by modern Jewish authors.

ACQUISITION. The methods of acquiring property, known in Hebrew as qinyan, lie at the heart of both proprietary and contractual rights in Jewish civil law. A formal qinyan is necessary in order to effect the transfer of ownership of both movable and immovable property. Among the methods of acquiring movable property is lifting (hagbahah) or pulling (meshikhah) the object that is being acquired. Pulling is used when very heavy objects or livestock are involved (B. M. 8b; B. B. 86a). Grasping an object (mesirah) is a valid form of qinyan when it is done at the behest of the transferor (B. B. 75b). These methods are derived from the concept of “acquisition through one's courtyard” (qinyan hatser), according to which any object that comes into a person's possession and control is legally acquired by that individual. The same rule applies to property within a radius of four cubits around a person, provided that the person is capable of exercising control over the object in question (B. M. 11a). Buried treasure, therefore, belongs to the finder, since the owner of the courtyard does not know of its existence and does not, therefore, have any control over it (B. M. 25b). Immovable property is acquired by an act of ownership (hazaqah), such as fencing a field, locking a house, or making improvements to the property (B. B. 42a; Maimonides, Hilkhot Mekhirah 1.8). There are other methods that do not effect the legal transfer of property but simply indicate the intention of the parties to conclude a transaction. These methods include acquisition by money; deed (shetar); barter (halifin); the symbolic exchange of property (qinyan sudar); the acquisition of movables incidental to land (qinyan agav qarqa); and a handshake and the transfer of a key.

In principle, Jewish law does not recognize a simple parol contract; hence, contractual obligations can only be created using the same method by which ownership rights in property are acquired, namely, qinyan. The transition from the classical forms of tangible qinyan to more abstract methods probably reflects the need to solve the problem of the legal, as opposed to the ethical (B. M. 49a), non recognition of purely oral undertakings in Jewish law.

ACRONYMS. Though there may be a few isolated and dubious instances of acronyms in the Bible (for example, the use of the Hebrew letter yud to represent the name of God), acronyms were commonly employed in Talmudic literature as an exegetical tool in expounding the aggadah, although they are referred to by name only once in the Mishnah, in Shabbat 12.5. The use of acronyms is the thirtieth of Eli'ezer ben Yosei ha-Galili's thirty-two hermeneutic rules. In Genesis 41.43, when the people cry out the word avrek before Joseph, it is interpreted as "av be-ḥokhmah rakh be-shanim" (father in wisdom [though] tender in years; Sifrei on Dt. 1). Acronyms are used extensively as a tool in the interpretation of dreams (Ber. 57a) and analogously in Hellenistic writings. They also appear frequently in kabbalistic literature. From the medieval period on, acronyms commonly were used to indicate personal names, such as Rashi for Rabbi Shelomoh ben Yitshaq and Rambam for Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon. They are now employed in Modern Hebrew, from slang to technical and scientific terms. See also NOTARIQON.

ACROSTICS, literary devices, employed especially in verse. Alphabetic acrostics are found in the Bible (e.g., Ps. 34; Ps. 119; Prv. 31.10–31; Lam. 1–4). Acrostics appeared frequently in Hebrew literature from the Byzantine period on, especially in the liturgy (e.g., Ein Ke'loheinu, An'im Zemirot, the selihot prayers), where this device facilitated the memorization of prayers and the organization of piyyutim (particularly important before the invention of the printing press). From the sixth century on, acrostics were often based on the author's name (e.g., Lekhah Dodi) or, less frequently, on a biblical quotation. Some translations, especially of the alphabetic confessional litanies in the modern liberal prayer books, replicate an acrostic construction in English.

ACTS OF ALEXANDRIAN MARTYRS, a group of disparate texts, written between the first and the early third century CE, and known solely from papyri fragments found in Egypt. The texts usually take the form of a protocol of a conversation that supposedly took place between an Alexandrian patriot and a hostile Roman emperor, a conversation that often ends with the former's execution. In addition to their strong anti-Roman tendencies, some of these texts also display distinctly anti-Jewish sentiments. One text contains a description, from an Alexandrian point of view, of a dispute between a Jewish embassy, headed by *Agrippa I, and an Alexandrian embassy in front of Emperor Claudius (41–54), a dispute also described from the Jewish point of view by *Philo. In another text an Alexandrian leader accuses Trajan of having a council "full of impious Jews." While the historicity of some of the incidents described in these texts is less than certain and the claims voiced by their protagonists can never be taken at face value, the Acts supply important data on the Jews' life in Roman Alexandria, and especially on the anti-Jewish feelings common in at least some Greco-Egyptian circles in that city.

ADADI, AVRAHAM (1800–1874), North African rabbinical authority born in Tripoli, Libya, where he helped devise a comprehensive system of popular education for the young. To support this, he and the other rabbinical authorities issued the gabella taqqanah, an ordinance requiring all Jews in the community to contribute 3/1,000th of their income. He moved to Erets Yisra'el and was one of the rabbis sent abroad as an emissary by the Jews of Safed to collect money from the Jews of Egypt, Iraq, Persia, Damascus, and Morocco. A member of the Safed beit din from 1838 to 1874, Adadi was a noted Talmudist, expert not only in the text but also in the historical differences between the tanna'im and amora'im. He also wrote on the customs of the Jews of Tripoli. His responsa, Va-Yiqra' Avraham (Leghorn, 1864), used the works of two noted scholars—Yehudah *Ayash of Algiers and Hayyim Yosef David *Azulai—who also investigated local customs. He paid special attention to questions of divorce, although his Ha-Shomer Emet (printed with Va-Yiqra' Avraham [Livorno, 1848; repr. Brooklyn, N.Y., 1992]) was largely devoted to the writing of Torah scrolls. Ha-Shomer Emet also contains an autobiography of Adadi on pages 5–10.

ADAM (אָדָם; human), biblical designation of the first human in Genesis 1–5, 1 Chronicles 1.1, and possibly Job 28; progenitor of the human species; also a collective reference to humankind (Gn. 1.27) and to each and every person individually (e.g., Lv. 1.2). In Hebrew, the term never appears in the plural; the word people, both male and female, is frequently expressed by benei adam (the sons of Adam; e.g., Ps. 36.8). In Genesis 6, benot ha-adam (the daughters of the human) designates women. In Phoenician, on the other hand, the masculine plural adamim (men) is contrasted with ashot (woman).

Adam's origin is related in two distinct biblical accounts. Genesis 1.26–30 is a brief narrative. Both male and female humans were created in the divine image by God on the sixth day of Creation; they were to multiply and rule over all life. The biblical account in Genesis 2–3 is more comprehensive. God fashioned man out of earth, breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and charged him with tending and keeping the garden of *Eden. *Eve, Adam's helpmeet, was created from his rib. Succumbing to temptation, they ate of Eden's forbidden *tree of knowledge of good and evil, for which they were expelled and punished. Critical scholarship recognizes here the narratives of two different authors, possibly two ancient Israelite epic tales. The narratives are projected from two different points of view. The first portrays humanity against the background of universal creation, while the second evaluates the universe from the viewpoint of man. Both, however, are alike in presenting humans as Godlike, and both are purely monotheistic in conception. There are certain affinities with Mesopotamian and Egyptian tales, but the biblical story is unique in the grandeur of its ethical concept.

In Leviticus and other Pentateuchal texts assigned by the documentary hypothesis to the Priestly source and holiness codes, the term adam is frequently used to refer to a person of either sex in regard to obligations that apply equally to men and women (Lv. 24.17; Nm. 5.6).

Some readers interpret the statement that woman was created from the rib of Adam (Gn. 2.22) as a suggestion that womankind is subordinate or was an afterthought in the scheme of creation. S. N. Kramer, however, sees in the assertion that the woman who is called Eve (Havvah [She Who Makes Live]) was created from the rib of Adam a reflection of the pun found in the Sumerian myth of Enki and Ninhursag. The goddess created for the healing of Enki's rib is Nintu, which means "lady of the rib" and "lady who makes life." Rashi follows various midrashim in construing the Hebrew tsela' in Genesis 2.22 not as rib but as side and sees in the apparent contradiction between Genesis 1.27, in which adam is created "male and female," and Genesis 2, in which woman is created from the side of Adam, reference to humankind having been created in two phases. In the first phase, man and woman were joined together like Siamese twins; while in the second phase, they were separated into two sides. This accounts for the urge of persons of both sexes to form lifelong attachments with members of the opposite sex, thereby reuniting with their missing sides (Gn. 2.24).

Elaborations of the Adam story are found in the post-biblical Apocrypha and pseudepigrapha. Patristic writings stress Adam's fall and original sin. Talmudic treatment, some of it also reflected in the Qur'an, discusses God's purpose in creating man and also man's relations to the heavenly hosts as well as to lower forms of creation. Kabbalists maintained that Adam received a revelation from God, the secrets of which were preserved by the mystics, and thus they speak of a mystical Adam, the *Adam Qadmon.

ADAM QADMON (אָדָם קַדְמוֹן; Primordial Man), kabbalistic symbol of the world of the sefirot*, wherein the divine macrocosm is pictured in the image of the human microcosm, just as the material form of man, the creature, is held to reflect the spiritual form of existence of God, the creator. The notion of a mystical Primordial Man seems to reflect earlier, gnostic types of speculation. The term adam qadmon is found in the tiqqunim of the Zohar, whereas the Zohar itself uses the term adam dele-ela' (celestial man). According to Yitsḥaq *Luria, who developed this symbol in an original way, Adam Qadmon is the first configuration of the divine light flowing from God, the Ein Sof, into the primordial space made possible by tsimtsum (i.e., the withdrawing of the creator within himself). Adam Qadmon is thus the highest form of the manifestation of the divinity after the process of tsimtsum. The sefirot come into existence as divine lights breaking out from the eyes, ears, nose, and mouth of Adam Qadmon. The Lurianic doctrine of tiqqun* is based upon the analogy between the biblical Adam, on the anthropological plane, and Adam Qadmon, on the ontological plane. Thus man before his fall is a kind of cosmic being reflecting the divine totality as symbolized in Adam Qadmon.

ADAR (אָדָר), name of Assyrian-Babylonian origin for the twelfth month of the religious year, sixth of the civil year. Its zodiacal sign is Pisces. The feast of *Purim, which falls on 14 Adar (and Shushan Purim, which falls on 15 Adar), imparts a festive character to the entire month: "When Adar enters, joy increases" (Ta'an. 29a). The Second Temple was dedicated on 3 Adar (Ezr. 6.14–16). According to rabbinical tradition, 7 Adar is the anniversary of both the birth and the death of Moses (Meg. 13b) and was a date for rejoicing—or alternatively fasting—among various Jewish communities (the fast day was observed in 17th-cent. Turkey, Italy, and northern Europe, and the custom spread to Hasidic circles). Nine Adar was said to be the date of the split between the school of Hillel and the school of Shamm'ai and was decreed a fast day. Thirteen Adar was called Nicanor Day to mark the anniversary of *Judah the Maccabee's defeat of Syrian general Nicanor in 161 BCE; originally it was observed as a festival but later became the Fast of Esther (see TA'ANIT ESTER). Sixteen Adar was designated a feast day; according to tradition, Nehemiah recommenced the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem on that day. Twenty Adar, the date of *Honi ha-Me'aggel's miraculous invocation of rain, was observed at one time as a feast day. In leap years, Adar Sheni (second month of Adar, also called Ve-Adar) is inserted after the month of Adar (which in this case is called Adar Ri'shon, first month of Adar; see CALENDAR). During such years, most observances (including bar and bat mitsvah) normally held in Adar are moved to Adar Sheni. When a death occurs in Adar in an ordinary year, the yortsayt* is observed in the first month of Adar even in a leap year. Adar Sheni is intercalated seven times in a nineteen-year lunar cycle in order to bring the Hebrew calendar into line with the general solar calendar. Adar is twenty-nine days in length in an ordinary year, thirty days in a leap year. Adar Sheni always has twenty-nine days.

ADASS JISROEL (Congregation of Israel) or Adass Jeshurun, names chosen by strictly Orthodox German congregations that left Reform-dominated communities to become independent separatist congregations (Austrittsgemeinden). Samson Raphael *Hirsch took the lead in Frankfurt, renaming his congregation Adass Jeschurun (1851), and this example was followed in Cologne (1867). New York City's Kahal Adath Jeshurun (the "Breuer Shul," in Manhattan's Washington Heights neighborhood) is a direct successor. Most of these breakaway synagogues preferred the name Adass Jisroel or Adass Jeshurun as an expression of their concept of "authentic [Torah-true] Judaism." They were established in Berlin (1869), Vienna (1897), London (1911), Königsberg (1913), and other Jewish centers, but they represented only a small segment of the Neo-Orthodox movement (see NEO-ORTHODOXY).

ADDA' BAR AHAVAH (3d cent.), Babylonian amora', to be distinguished from the fourth century Babylonian amora' of the same name (cf. B. B. 22a-b). He was reputedly born on the day of the death of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' (Qid. 72a-b), and it was claimed that his son was born circumcised (Shab. 135a). His piety and his miraculous powers (e.g., Y., Ta'an. 3.11, 67a) were legendary; it was even believed that his very presence could prevent calamity (cf. Ta'an. 20b). He was a student of Rav at Sura (Y., Shab. 1.2, 3a) and was known there especially for his halakhic rulings. The Baraita' de-Rav Adda', a work on intercalation (cited as late as the 14th cent., but now lost), is attributed to him. He believed his longevity to be the fruit of his lifelong godly habits, which included religious zeal, discipline, respect, kindness, social grace, and self-control (Y., Ta'an. 3.13, 67a).

ADDIR BI-MELUKHAH (אָדיר בּמִלּוּכָה; Mighty in Kingship), eight-stanza, alphabetical acrostic hymn listing divine epithets and based on a legend in Genesis Rabbah 6.2. It was introduced by Ashkenazim into the Pesah Haggadah in the Middle Ages. Addir bi-Melukhah was probably written in France or Germany, although the date is obscure. It is also known from its refrain as Ki Lo Na'e'h (For to Him, Praise Is Due). See also ADDIR HU'.

ADDIR HU' (אָדיר הוּ; Mighty Is He), alphabetic acrostic hymn containing a prayer for the speedy rebuilding of the Temple. In the Avignon rite it was recited on all festivals; it was adopted into the Haggadah of Pesah in fifteenth-century Germany. Originally Addir Hu' was sung only on the second Seder night and *Addir bi-Melukhah on the first, but since the eighteenth century both hymns have been sung on both nights, especially in the Ashkenazi tradition.

ADENI, SHELOMOH (1567-1626), commentator on the *Mishnah. He was born in Sanaa, Yemen, but as a young child went with his family to Safed in Erets Yisra'el. Subsequently he and his family moved to Jerusalem. He studied Kabbalah with R. Hayyim *Vital and halakhah with R. Betsal'el Ashkenazi. In 1592 Adeni settled in Hebron, where he earned his livelihood teaching children. He is best known for his commentary on the Mishnah, Melekheth Shelomoh (Vilna, 1905), to which he brings an extensive knowledge of both Talmuds, the Midrash, and later rabbinical authorities. Especially important was his determination of the Mishnah text based on old manuscripts preserved in Erets Yisra'el. He began his work on the Mishnah when he was twenty-two and continued until his death. He also wrote sacred poetry.

ADIABENE, a small kingdom in northern Mesopotamia (roughly the region of the Little Zab and Great Zab rivers in present-day Iraq), whose ruler Izates, along with his mother, Helena, and his brother, Monobaz, converted to Judaism in approximately 45 CE. Their conversion and subsequent attachment to the Jewish people are described in great detail by Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 20.2–4) and are also mentioned several times in rabbinic literature (e.g., Naz. 3.6; T., Suk. 1.1; Gn. Rab. 46.11). According to Josephus, Helena and Izates learned from itinerant Jews how to worship God in the Jewish manner, and Izates even underwent circumcision, in spite of his mother's fear that his subjects would object to their king's involvement in foreign rites. Helena subsequently went to Jerusalem, where her generosity and royal wealth helped alleviate a severe famine and earned her the gratitude of the Jewish masses (cf. T., Pe'ah 4.18). Following Izates' death, Helena returned to Adiabene. When she, too, died, Monobaz, Izates' successor to the throne, sent Izates' and Helena's bones to be buried in a royal sepulcher she had prepared in Jerusalem, known today as the Tomb of Kings, north of the Old City of Jerusalem.

'ADLAYADA' (Aram.; אַדְלַיָאָדָא), Purim carnival. This name is derived from the rabbinic remark that on Purim a man should revel until he does not know ('ad de-la' yada') to distinguish between "blessed be Mordecai" and "cursed be Haman" (Meg. 7.2). The name is given to Purim-carnival processions held in Israel.

ADLER, FELIX (1851–1933), social, educational, and religious reformer. Adler was born in Alzey, Germany, and immigrated to the United States at age six, when his father, R. Samuel Adler, accepted the pulpit of New York's prestigious Reform Temple Emanu-El. Having graduated from Columbia University in 1870, Adler returned to Germany to study at the Universities of Berlin and Heidelberg from 1870 to 1873. Under the impact of historicism, evolution, Bible criticism, and Neo-Kantianism, he broke intellectually with theism and Judaism. He formulated a belief in moral law independent of a personal deity, which he insisted had to find expression in activist social reform.

Following a brief tenure at Cornell University from 1873 to 1876, Adler established the New York Society for Ethical Culture in 1876. Under his leadership and fired by his commitment to applied social ethics, the society pioneered such ventures as a free kindergarten, a free district nursing program, a workingman's lyceum, and a workingman's school (the Ethical Culture School). Adler served as a mentor for mostly non-Jewish leaders, who established other societies across the country, resulting in a national and ultimately international Ethical Cultural movement, dedicated to alleviating the problems of industrialization and urbanization.

Perceived as a renegade by the Jewish establishment in the early decades, Adler was admired by many Jews. He chaired the National Child Labor Committee from 1904 to 1921, founded the International Journal of Ethics in 1920, and was appointed professor of political and social ethics at Columbia University in 1902. However, Adler's departure from Judaism rankled, even as he spoke out forcefully against antisemitism. In particular, his opposition to Jewish nationalism led to tensions with Zionists.

His main works are Creed and Deed (New York, 1877), The Religion of Duty (New York, 1905), An Ethical Philosophy of Life (New York, 1918), and The Reconstruction of the Spiritual Ideal (New York, 1918).

ADLER, NATAN (1741–1800), German rabbi and kabbalist. A recognized scholar at the age of twenty, he founded a yeshivah in his native Frankfurt am Main, which attracted many pupils. While engaged in several branches of Torah studies, his particular leaning was toward Kabbalah. He and a group of his followers conducted prayer services in his home using a different rite (the prayer book of Yitsḥaq Luria, recited in a Sephardi pronunciation) from that accepted in German communities. This aroused the anger of the community heads, and in 1782 a ban was placed on the minyān and sanctions were placed on Adler. After spending three years in Boskovic, Moravia (1782–1785), he returned to Frankfurt, reopened his yeshivah, and restarted his minyān, which led to a renewal of the ban, but this was lifted during his last fatal illness. He never published any works, but the notes he wrote in the margins of his Mishnah volumes were later published as Mishnat Rabbi Natan (Frankfurt am Main, 1862). The Ḥatam Sofer (see SOFER FAMILY) was his pupil.

ADLER FAMILY, a family of British rabbis.

Nathan Marcus Adler (1803–1890) became chief rabbi of the British empire in 1845. He was born and officiated in Hanover until moving to England. Thanks to his firm leadership, nationwide pastoral tours, and enlightened Orthodoxy, Anglo-Jewry remained traditional in outlook. He established Jews' College for the training of ministers (1855) and helped plan London's United Synagogue (1870).

Hermann Adler (1839–1911), who succeeded his father, Nathan, as chief rabbi in 1891, also came from Hanover and possessed a German doctorate. He enhanced the prestige of the chief rabbinate, which he regarded as parallel to the authority of the leadership of the Christian churches. More amenable to change than his father, he copied the clothing style of the Anglican clergy for himself and for the Anglo-Jewish ministry and sanctioned choirs composed of both men and women. He denounced political Zionism and often clashed with Orthodox immigrant leaders.

ADONAI BE-QOL SHOFAR (אֲדֹנָי בְּקוֹל שׁוֹפָר; The Lord [Ascends] Amid the Blasts of the Shofar); pizmon (piyyut* with a refrain) chanted in the Sephardi Ro'sh ha-Shanah liturgy after the Torah and haftarah readings and before the sounding of the shofar, when the holiday falls on a weekday. Each of the four stanzas begins with the latter half of Psalms 49.6 and ends with the opening half of the verse. The piyyut implores God to sound the shofar of redemption soon. ADON 'OLAM (אֲדֹנָי עוֹלָם; Eternal Lord), dogmatic hymn of unknown authorship probably dating from the geonic period (although it has also been ascribed to Shelomoh *ibn Gabirol). It extols in poetic form the unity, timelessness, and providence of God, in whom it also expresses faith and trust. Adon 'Olam is generally recited at the beginning of the Shaḥarit service in the Ashkenazi rite and in many rites at the conclusion of the Musaf service. In some rites it is sung after the Ma'ariv service on Sabbaths and festivals. Many Jews recite Adon 'Olam before falling asleep (which may have been the original intention of its author), and it is also customary to say it on a deathbed. In Morocco, it was recited while the bride was led under the bridal canopy.

ADOPTION. The creation of a parent and child relationship solely by virtue of a legal act is unknown to Jewish law. The halakhah recognizes only natural familial bonds for the purposes of establishing personal status. It is, however, a mitsvah to bring up an *orphan in one's home, and there is no objection to adoptive parents and adopted children referring to each other as if they were members of a natural family unit (2 Sm. 21.8; San. 19b). An adoptive father does not fulfill the halakhic obligation to procreate, and an adoptive mother is still liable to undergo halitsah in the case of her husband's death. If an adoptive parent dies intestate, then the adopted children have no claim to the estate under Jewish law. A secular form of adoption exists in Israeli law under the Adoption of Children Law of 1960, but its scope is limited to matters outside the realm of personal status.

ADOSHEM. See GOD, NAMES OF.

'ADOT HA-MIZRAH (עֲדוֹת הַמִּזְרָח; communities of the East), also known as Oriental Jews. The term denotes Jews from Asia and Africa, numbering approximately one million, nearly all of whom went to Israel after 1948. They comprised ancient, deeply rooted Jewish communities whose origins date back to remote antiquity, in some cases to the first dispersion of Jews in 597 BCE. The largest of these communities was the Jewish community of Morocco, numbering approximately 285,000 before its departure. In Israel, they are often included, inaccurately, under the classification "Sephardi" and for religious purposes are under the competence of the Sephardi chief rabbi. However, they constitute a third grouping; they are neither Sephardi nor Ashkenazi, having had no Spanish or central European experience in their history but having for the most part remained in the Middle East and Muslim lands.

The Jews from Muslim lands shared a basically religious outlook toward life. Their expression of Judaism was traditional and familial. They did not experience the movements of Haskalah and reform that led to the emergence of denominationalism among Jews in Europe and America. As Middle Eastern Jews settled in new urban and rural settlements in Israel, their family loyalties, settlement patterns, occupational distribution, and ethnic residential concentration shaped the persistence of ethnic-group identification. Their ethnic origin also tended to correlate with social inequality in Israel.

The term 'Adot ha-Mizrah is frequently regarded as a pejorative term by those it is intended to describe. Technically, Jews from Middle Eastern countries are not "Oriental," nor are they necessarily "Eastern." The term arose in the 1950s as social workers and anthropologists sought to integrate immigrants from Islamic countries into Israeli society. The working assumption of these communal workers was that the traditional cultures of the "Eastern" Jews should be discarded. In many cases, the ancient mores that the immigrants had treasured were reluctantly relinquished.

During the 1970s, a new sense of ethnic pride and the revival and legitimization of minority cultures globally led to a new appreciation of the "communities" and their diverse heritages in Israel. The customs, stories, and folkways of the communities from Muslim lands were collected and integrated into the Israeli school curriculum. At the same time, Jews from the Near East became a social and political force to reckon with, and the term 'Adot ha-Mizrah, or simply "the 'Adot," lost some of its negative connotations. Constituting the majority of the Jewish population of Israel, their interests could no longer be ignored. Such indigenous customs as the veneration of "saintly" rabbis and the visitation of their gravesites reemerged. Ancient popular festivals, such as the Mimunah* of the Moroccan Jews, the Rus-el-Begh of the Kurdish Jews, and the Zaharani of the Persian Jews, were revived. While Jews from Muslim lands are quite similar to Jews from Christian countries in most respects, they exhibit distinctive food habits, musical traditions, and some expressions of popular religious culture, reflective of the general Jewish pattern of appropriating and adapting the customs and traditions of the dominant culture of the environment in which they live for long periods of time. Fundamental similarities between Jews of Muslim lands and Jews of Europe outweigh the differences among the communities.

ADRET, SHELOMOH BEN AVRAHAM (c.1235-1310), Spanish rabbinical authority; known by the acronym Rashba'. For over forty years he was a rabbi in Barcelona and was regarded as the outstanding spiritual leader of Spanish Jewry of his time. His thousands of halakhic responsa are outstanding for their clear exposition; they also contain valuable historical and cultural information. He deals with all facets of religious, family, and civil law, and his decisions laid the foundation for Ya'aqov ben Asher's Arba'ah Turim* and Yosef Caro's Shulhan 'Arukh. Adret wrote novellae on the Talmud, only a section of which (on 15 tractates) has been published, combining the erudite traditions of French and Spanish rabbinical scholarship. In the novellae Adret keenly analyzes selected portions of the Talmud, reconciling apparent contradictions. His other works include a commentary on rabbinical legends and writings on home rituals and the laws of the Sabbath and festivals. Adret studied philosophy and defended Maimonides in the revived Maimonidean Controversy; he opposed both rationalistic allegory and excessive mysticism. He did not object to scientific or philosophical pursuits but opposed concentrating on these fields to the detriment of Torah study. While refusing to ban secular studies outright, he forbade them to students under the age of twenty-five. Adret also engaged in polemics and replied to the Dominican Raymond Martini's Pugio fidei with a work setting out to prove the eternity of the Torah and the importance of the practical commandments.

ADULT. Nowhere in the Bible is there any clear indication of the age at which a minor attains majority. The only relevant statements are that an able-bodied male was liable for military service from the age of twenty (Nm. 1.3) and that the Levite entered into the service of the sanctuary at the age of twenty-five (Nm. 8.24) or thirty (Nm. 4.3). Rabbinic law, however, established the appearance of the first signs of puberty as the onset of majority, generally the age of twelve years and one day in the case of females, and thirteen years and one day in the case of males (Nid. 52a). Upon attaining the age of twelve years and a day, a female ceased to be a minor and entered the category of na'arah (girl), in which she remained for six months until she became fully adult. The attainment of such majority did not, however, come automatically to a boy or girl with age. The ages were selected as the normal period during which the first signs of puberty (two pubic hairs called simanim [signs]) appear. Where no such signs are evident, minority could extend to the age of twenty, and in some cases even thirty-five. Naturally, maternity or childbearing would establish adulthood in a female even in the absence of other signs. A person who attains his majority is responsible for all religious and ritual matters. In the Mishnah, thirteen is described as the age "for the fulfillment of commandments" (Avot 5.23), although persons under twenty were not held liable for those sins punishable "at the hands of heaven" (Shab. 89b). The desirability of a hazzan having a beard established the minimum age for a regular officiant at eighteen or twenty. In Israel, the age of consent for marriage is seventeen, but permission to marry earlier may be given by a secular court. See also BAR MITZVAH; BAT MITZVAH.

ADULTERY (Heb. ni'uf). The prohibition on adultery is contained in the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20.13; Dt. 5.17). It, together with incest, is one of the three cardinal offenses (the other two being idolatry and bloodshed) that may not be perpetrated even if the alternative is death (San. 74a). Under biblical law, adultery was a capital crime and both the adulterer and the adulteress were to be executed (Lv. 20.10). It was not a criminal offense for a married man to have sexual relations with an unmarried woman since polygamy was permitted in Jewish law.

In the light of the generally secret nature of adultery, the Bible provides that a husband who suspected his wife of this offense could force her to undergo the ordeal of the "waters of bitterness" (Nm. 5.12-31). If the suspected wife (sotah*) were guilty, she would suffer in those organs of the body with which she had sinned (Sot.

1.7). This *ordeal of jealousy was abolished at the time of the Mishnah (Sot. 9.9).

Adultery by a husband, however, became grounds for divorce (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 154.1). No marriage is permitted between an adulteress and her lover (Sot. 25a). The husband of an adulterous woman must divorce her, and any product of the forbidden union is a *mamzer.

AFENDOPOLO, KALEV (c.1464–1525), *Karaites scholar and poet. He was probably born in Adrianople and lived most of his life in the village of Kramariya on the outskirts of Constantinople, where he served as head of the Karaite community. He also spent some years in Belgorod-Dnestrovski. He studied Karaite law under his brother-in-law, Eliyahu ben Mosheh *Bashyazi, while the Rabbanite scholar Mordekhai Comtino taught him mathematics, geometry, astronomy, and Greco-Arabic philosophical literature. Afendopolo was thoroughly familiar with and influenced by the philosophical works of Moses Maimonides, whom he refers to as "the divine sage." Even though he had close friendships with a number of Rabbanite scholars, he retained a traditional Karaite ideology.

Afendopolo wrote at least twenty-four different works in the areas of religious law, philosophy, mathematics, and belles-lettres, as well as numerous liturgical poems, most of which are still in manuscript or have been lost. In his books, he tended to collect citations of earlier scholars, but he frequently then interpreted these in an original fashion.

His major works of religious law include an incomplete supplement to Eliyahu Bashyazi's Adderet Eliyahu; Iggeret ha-Maspeqqet, on the laws of slaughtering and forbidden foods; and Patshegen Ketav ha-Dat, concerning the weekly Torah readings, haftarot, and blessings. His major works in philosophy are 'Asarah Ma'marot (sermons; extracts of this work were printed in the book Dod Mordekhai) and indices to Aharon ben Eliyahu's 'Ets Hayyim and Yehudah ben Eliyahu Hadassi's Eshkol ha-Kofer. Major scientific works include Mikhlo'el Yofi, on astronomical calendrical calculations, and a commentary on Nicomachean arithmetic. Afendopolo's poetic works include Avner ben Ner, an ethical work in the form of biblical rhymed prose, and Gan ha-Melekh, aphorisms and riddles.

AFIQOMAN (אִפְיוֹמָן), name given to the piece taken from the middle of the three unleavened breads on the Seder table on Pesah eve and eaten at the conclusion of the meal by all present. The paschal meal in the Temple ended with the tasting of the paschal lamb, and the afiqoman symbolizes this custom. The tradition is for the celebrant to hide half of the middle piece of matsah before reciting the *Haggadah of Pesah; this is meant to arouse the curiosity of the younger participants, and the custom has developed, especially in Ashkenazi communities, for children to remove the afiqoman, hide it elsewhere, and refuse to reveal its whereabouts until it has been "ransomed" by the promise of a gift. In Eastern communities it became a custom to keep a piece of the afiqoman during the ensuing year as a charm against the so-called *evil eye.

The origin of the word (first found in the Mishnah) is disputed, and various etymologies have been suggested.

AFTERLIFE. The biblical conception of what occurs after the death of the body appears to be that the individual's vital principle descends to the she'ol, a Hades-like underworld, where it leads a kind of shadow existence. "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence" (Ps. 115.17). When *Saul, in his anguished last night, sought to communicate with the deceased *Samuel, the necromancer at En-dor brought Samuel up from the underworld, not down from heaven (1 Sam. 28). Later, various new concepts developed in response to intellectual influences from Persia and Greece. Whereas there is no differentiation between the righteous and the wicked in the she'ol, the problem of theodicy (see GOOD AND EVIL), and of *reward and punishment after death, gained in importance during the Second Temple period. One possible solution to the problem of individual eschatology was to posit the existence of a spiritual *soul that, as the core of the human personality, survived, and possibly also preceded, its connection with a body. This view was indebted to Greek influences, both Platonic and Neoplatonic. The idea that a future afterlife involved a bodily *resurrection was espoused by the *Pharisees (and also held by *Jesus), in contrast to the *Sadducees, who opposed that idea as a nonscriptural innovation. This was one of the few Pharisaic dogmas deemed important enough to be explicitly affirmed in the daily liturgy; it is the subject of the third benediction of the *Amidah. The various positions were reconciled in the proposition that individual souls were provisionally judged after death, going first temporarily to hell, to expiate their sins, and then to heaven ("paradise"). From this discarnate state they will ultimately be called to the resurrection and final judgment. This solution is expressed in the daily morning prayer: "O my God, the soul which you have given me is pure. You did breathe it into me . . . and you will take it from me [at death] but will restore it to me hereafter [at the resurrection]."

The soul to which the prayer refers is considered to be immortal, though created. Most of these beliefs began to crystallize in the period of persecutions immediately preceding the Maccabean Revolt (see DANIEL) and, subsequently, became an accepted part of the tradition, though different authors maintained different emphases. For some, the belief in the afterlife of a spiritual soul implied an otherworldly orientation: "This world is like a vestibule to the world to come. Prepare yourself in the vestibule so that you may enter the banquet hall" (Avot 4.21; see 'OLAM HA-ZEH AND 'OLAM HA-BA'). Compared to this view, the belief in a bodily resurrection appeared to be grossly material. As a philosopher, *Maimonides found difficulties with this dogma and had to defend himself against the accusation of denying it; it is, however, included in his *Thirteen Principles of Faith. The kabbalists developed a theory of gilgul (transmigration), rejected by non-kabbalistic orthodoxy. Enlightenment and post-enlightenment rationalism, and in their wake modern *Reform Judaism, held the belief in an immortal soul to be rationally defensible or even necessary, unlike the "primitive" and materialist notion of a bodily resurrection. Many modern thinkers have re-interpreted the concept of immortality metaphorically. Hermann *Cohen, for example, has written of "the historical living on of the individual in the historical continuity of the people" (Religion of Reason [1971], p. 301).

AGED. The Bible uses various terms to describe the condition of being old. The most frequently used term is zaqen (old or aging), which is applied to Abraham (Gn. 24.1), and thereafter to Isaac, Jacob, and various other biblical figures. Sometimes the word is immediately followed by the phrase, "advanced in years." Other terms employed in the Bible include seva' yamim (sated in days; Gn. 35.29), seva' (hoary head; Lv. 19.32), male' yamim (full of days; Jer. 6.11), and zignah (old age; Is. 46.4). The two most frequent terms used are seva' and zignah, the former denoting greater age than the latter. The different levels of old age are enumerated in Avot 5.21: "at the age of sixty"—zignah (old age); "at the age of seventy"—seva' (hoary head); "at the age of eighty"—gevurah (strength). The Bible specifies in Genesis 6.3 that man's "days will be a hundred twenty years" but decreases that number in Psalms 90.10, "the days of our lives are seventy years, and if with exceeding strength, eighty years." An outstanding biblical depiction of old age appears in Ecclesiastes 12.1–7; its pessimism is echoed in Psalms 71.9, "Do not cast me off in the time of old age." Both the Bible and the Talmud refer to the frailty brought about by advancing age. Ecclesiastes 12.1 says, "Remember now your Creator in the days of your youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when you shall say, I have no pleasure in them." The psalmist pleads, "Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength fails" (Ps. 71.9). Age takes its toll upon one's mental faculties, as explained in Avot 4.25: "One who studies Torah as a child, to what may he be compared? To ink written upon new paper. And one who studies when he is old, to what may he be compared? To ink on a palimpsest." Both the Bible and rabbinic literature lay great store by respect for the aged; for example, "You shall rise up before the hoary head, and honor the face of the old man" (Lv. 19.32). Various other verses echo the importance of respecting the aged; thus, "The beauty of old men is the gray head" (Prv. 20.29) and "Do not despise your mother when she is old" (Prv. 23.22). The Talmud relates (Bik. 11b) that whenever R. Me'ir saw an old man, even if the man were an ignoramus, he would rise as a sign of respect, exclaiming, "the very fact that he has grown old is a sign that he has acquired merit." The sages interpreted zaqen as an acronym for the words zeh qanah ḥokhmah, one who has acquired wisdom, thus expanding the requirement of extending honor to include even young sages.

While the Talmud does not state any objective criteria for old age, there are various subjective criteria. For example, a priest in the Temple and a ritual slaughterer are considered to be old when their hands tremble. A woman is considered old if when addressed as "mother" she no longer takes umbrage (Shulḥan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah, 189.29). There are derogatory references to the aged (e.g., an old man is compared to a monkey [Eccl. Rab. 1.2] or when it is said, "there is no taste in the aged" [Shab. 89b]) and a few Talmudic statements that praise old age.

Care for the aged has always been considered one of the primary obligations of the Jewish community, and it has been defined in ethical and halakhic works. Rabbi Nahman of Bratslav wrote, "Gauge a country's prosperity by its treatment of the aged" (Sefer ha-Middot 66). From the eighteenth century on, a moshav zeqenim (old age home) was established in many places.

AGENT (Heb. shaliah), a person appointed to act as another's representative in matters of Jewish law or ritual, for example, one who acts as a proxy in cases of betrothal or divorce, or a sheliaḥ tsibbur*, one who leads the congregation in prayer. "A person's agent is regarded as the person himself" (Ned. 72b; Qid. 41b), therefore any act committed by a duly appointed agent is regarded as having been committed by the principal, who bears full responsibility for it (while the agent bears no liability). The agent must be of the same legal status and standing as his principal. The appointment of a minor, an imbecile, or a deaf-mute as an agent is invalid, as is any appointment by them (B. Q. 6.4). The death of the principal automatically voids the agency. An agent is regarded as acting in his principal's interest and not to his detriment; in any dispute as to whether the agent has exceeded the terms of his agency, this consideration is taken into account. The law of agency applies only to legal acts: "One cannot be an agent for a transgression" (Qid. 42b). A person committing a crime as the agent of a principal is held responsible for his act.

AGGADAH (אגדה), the nonlegal contents of the Talmud* and Midrash*, including—often by way of biblical exegesis—ethical and moral teaching, theological speculation, legends, folklore, gnomic sayings, prayers, historical information, praise of Israel and Erets Yisra'el, interpretation of dreams, and expressions of messianic faith and longing. Many theories have been advanced as to the origin of the name aggadah. Some derive it from the Hebrew huggad (things that are said or spoken, in contrast to biblical stories, which are written); some take it from the rabbinic expression used in expounding scripture, maggid ha-katuv, "scripture states." Still others connect it with the scriptural verse ve-higgadeta le-vinekha, "and you shall tell to your son" (Ex. 13.8), which implies the relating of something other than the Law and its ordinances. The Mishnah contains relatively little aggadah, and that usually appears at the end of treatises or after individual sections within the treatise as a kind of epilogue to the completed study of a unified segment of legal subject matter. However, about a third of the Talmud Yerushalmi and approximately a fourth of the Talmud Bavli is comprised of aggadah. Here, too, it is frequently introduced to mark off one section of legal study from another.

The aggadah serves not only as a kind of relief from strenuous, concentrated halakhic discourse, but also to keep the ethical ideals of the Torah ever fresh and meaningful, complementing the halakhah* but lacking its binding character. It elaborates and develops the stories of scripture so as to draw from them the maximum of moral instruction. Unlike halakhah, aggadah need not derive from an ancient recognized source but may be the free individual creation of every generation. The aggadah is rich in literary forms, including parable, metaphor, personification, satire, and poetry. It plays with homonymous roots, it computes the numerical value of letters to gain new information, it substitutes letters to reveal new nuances of meaning in scripture, and it even interprets individual letters of particular words as the abbreviation of a series of words. The Hebrew Bible is more often a source of the aggadah than the halakhah is, for aggadah concerns itself as much with the Prophets and the Hagiographa as it does with the Pentateuch. Like halakhah, aggadah developed rules (middot; see HERMENEUTICS) for the exposition of scripture, though the number of its rules is greater than that for halakhah (e.g., the thirty-two rules ascribed to Eli'ezer ben Yosei ha-Galili*), and the application of its rules is much freer. Some of these hermeneutic rules have been found to resemble the ancient methods for the interpretation of dreams and oracles, and similarities have been pointed out between the dream interpretation of the rabbis and the Onirocriticus of Artemidorus. Whereas only a few rules could be admitted for the elaboration and elucidation of halakhah, almost every currently established literary device could be used in aggadah. Although aggadah has no systematic philosophy, it deals in its own way with basic theological and moral problems. Many non-Jewish concepts found their way into aggadah, and almost all the schools of Greek thought left traces there.

There were ancient traditions of aggadah, just as there were of halakhah, and they are usually introduced by a phrase such as masoret aggadah, "it is an aggadic tradition." Thus, the midrash Shohar Tov to Psalms 18.32 related the aggadic tradition that Judah killed Esau after the death of Isaac. Tanḥuma' (58.17) mentions a "tradition" that Jerusalem will only be rebuilt after the ingathering of the Diaspora. Collections or "books" of aggadah seem to be very old. The Talmud Yerushalmi (Kil. 32b) notes an aggadic book on Psalms that was known at the time of R. Yehudah. A Talmudic passage (San. 57b) suggests the existence of a collection of aggadah on Genesis. R. Yoḥanan (Y., Hor. 48b) stated that he knew all the aggadah except for that to Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. That these collections were actually committed to writing is implied by a report to the effect that R. Yoḥanan and Reish Laqish read from such a book on the Sabbath (Tem. 14b) or by such statements as "one who reads aggadah from a book will not quickly forget it" (Y., Ber. 9). As a natural extension of the Aramaic exposition of the Torah reading in the synagogue, aggadah was also the source of the sermon, which it finally dominated to the exclusion of halakhah. Even in the academies, students would ask their teachers for instruction in aggadah when the latter were too tired to teach halakhah.

The first book of edited aggadah does not antedate the fourth century CE. Besides appearing in sections of the Mishnah, Tosefta', and Talmudic literature, many aggadic statements are included in the so-called halakhic midrashim (see MIDRASHIC LITERATURE) as well. The bulk of the aggadah, however, is contained in works compiled in the post-Talmudic era, the most prominent being those Midrashic compilations included in the Midrash Rabbah* and Tanḥuma'-Yelammedenu* collections and in such nonexegetical aggadic works as (Avot de-Rabbi Natan, Pirḳei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer*, and Tanna' de- Vei Eliyyahu [see SEDER ELIYYAHU]). Numerous other collections and single aggadic works exist, some extant only in manuscripts. In the Middle Ages many anthologies of aggadah were composed; among these are the Yalqut Shim'oni* (Germany, 13th cent.) and the Midrash ha-Gadol* (Yemen, c.13th cent.). The aggadic sections of the Talmud were collected in the sixteenth century in the 'Ein Ya'aqov of Ya'aqov ben Shelomoh ibn Haviiv (see IBN HAVIV FAMILY). Modern scientific study of aggadah began with Leopold *Zunz. There have been several modern collections, notably that of Louis *Ginzberg, who, in his Legends of the Jews (1909–1928), arranged the aggadah according to the chronological order of the scriptures. The Sefer ha-Aggadah (1910) of Hayyim Nahman Bialik and Yehoshu'a Hana Rawnitzki brought the aggadah to a broad public (English translation, in W. G. Braude, The Book of Legends [New York, 1992]). See also HOMILETICS.

AGGADAT BE-RE'SHIT, a late Midrashic work (probably 9th or 10th cent.), with affinities to Tanḥuma'*-Yelammedenu literature. It contains one unique particularity: each of the twenty-eight homilies consists of three parts. The first part comments on the first verse of a portion of Genesis, following the order of the biblical book according to the *triennial cycle of Bible reading (an early Palestinian custom) as it was practiced in the author's locale. The second part comments on a verse stemming from one of the Prophetic books and is related to the Prophetic synagogal reading for that Sabbath. At the end of each homily comes a Midrashic exposition of a verse or verses from Psalms, possibly indicating that this biblical book was recited regularly in the synagogue in the locale of the author. Solomon Buber, the most recent editor of Aggadat Be-Re'shit (Kraków, 1903), asserts that the large amount of material common to this text and the recension of Midrash Tanḥuma' (which he also edited) originated in the latter; this has not been proven.

AGGADAT ESTER, a Midrashic compilation on the Book of Esther, published for the first time by Solomon Buber (Kraków, 1897) on the basis of two Yemenite manuscripts, with additions, notes, and corrections by Yehudah Behak (Vilna, 1925; repr. 1964, 1982). Hanoḥ Albeck's contention that Aggadat Ester is the Yemenite Midrashic anthology Midrash ha-Gadol* (13th–14th cent.) to the Book of Esther has been disputed by Menahem Kasher.

AGGADAT MASHIAH a short (approx. 5 pgs.) exposition of the events that will lead up to the final messianic era with its resurrection of the dead and ingathering of the exiles. These events are framed by the prophetic word of Balaam (Nm. 24.17–19), and Aggadat Mashiah was therefore included by R. Toviyah ben Eli'ezer in his biblical commentary Leqah Tov (the only source for the text). Especially noteworthy is the clear demarcation of the two Messiahs, the Messiah, Son of Joseph, from Galilee, who will defeat Israel's enemies but who will then himself be killed, and the Messiah, Son of David, the messianic king who will reign forever. The author seems to allude to some sort of mass apostasy, reflected in his attack on those Jews who "have bad thoughts about God" and those who "go from Israel to join the Nations of the World." Yehudah ibn Shemu'el, the most recent editor of this text (Midreshei Ge'ullah [Jerusalem, 1954], pp. 101–106), claimed that the work is dependent upon the messianic narrative Book of Zerubbabel, but this is incorrect. Their points of contact derive from earlier traditions, and stylistically, Aggadat Mashiah seems to be earlier.

AGLA' (אֶלֶּה), magic word said to be composed of the initials of the phrase Attah gibbor le-'olam Adonai, "You are mighty forever, O Lord," which appears in the 'Amidah prayer. During the Middle Ages, German Christians also used the phrase as a talisman against fire and inscribed it—together with a cross—on wooden bowls; they interpreted the letters as initials of the German phrase Allmächtiger Gott, Lösche Aus, "Almighty God, extinguish the conflagration."

AGNOSTICISM. As originally formulated in the nineteenth century by T. H. Huxley, agnosticism designated an attitude of suspended judgment, particularly in religious matters. In this sense, it was incompatible with religious tradition, which considered the existence of God as well as certain other beliefs as absolutely certain and beyond any doubt or even necessity of proof. The problem of evil and suffering might lead to anguish about God's justice (as in the Book of Job) but not usually to doubts regarding his existence and power. Agnostic tendencies, denying the possibility of metaphysical knowledge, did exist in pre-modern (ancient Greek as well as medieval) philosophy but were criticized by others, such as *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on. The view, espoused by many philosophers, theologians, and mystics, that the divine was beyond human comprehension, should not be confused with agnosticism. Thus, Moses *Maimonides taught that humans can "comprehend only the fact that He exists, but not His essence" (Guide of the Perplexed 1.58). This theology was then extended to all that is beyond human earthly experience, as when Maimonides asserts that "we can obtain no knowledge of the essence of the heavens" (loc. cit.). The insistence on the limitations of the human mind ("If I knew Him, I would be He," wrote Sa'adyah) often functioned as a wise methodological reservation, inducing people to concentrate on intellectually manageable problems.

AGRARIAN LAWS. The economy envisaged by the laws of the Torah was purely agricultural. The children of the covenant were entering a land of milk and honey, blessed by the *seven species (Dt. 8.8). The Holy Land was to be divided according to tribal areas, except for the tribe of Levi, and each family within the tribe was to receive its portion. Alienation of this ancestral land could be only temporary. Every seventh year was a sabbatical year (see SHEMITTAH; Ex. 23.10–11; Lv. 25.1ff.), when, in addition to the cancellation of debts, all major agricultural work was prohibited. In Temple times the fiftieth year was the jubilee (see YOVEL; Lv. 25), when all land had to be returned to its original owners. As a result, the price of land was reckoned according to the number of crops it would produce until the jubilee year.

To such an extent was agriculture regarded as the essential occupation of the Jews in biblical times that the term Canaanite was synonymous with trader (Zec. 14.21; Hos. 12.8). Many of the Israelite feasts, particularly the Shalosh Regalim, have an agricultural basis. *Pesah was a herdsman's and farmer's festival; *Shavu'ot was the festival of the new grains; *Sukkot was the gathering in of the fall harvest. The common element of these festive occasions was thanksgiving to God for his blessings.

According to the rabbis, most of the agricultural and animal husbandry laws are applicable only in Erets Yisra'el, but many were applied by the rabbis outside the land. Some apply only to the Temple period, others to all time. Inside Erets Yisra'el, there were gradations of status, depending on whether the land was within the historic boundaries established and thus sanctified by the first and second conquests (those of Joshua and those in postexilic times, respectively).

In the first order of the Mishnah, called *Zera'im (Seeds), the details of the various agrarian laws are dealt with exhaustively. The underlying assumption of the laws is that Erets Yisra'el belongs to God (Lv. 25.23) and is therefore holy ground. The agricultural laws are regarded as "commandments dependent on the land [of Israel]." By observing certain restrictions and separating parts of the harvests as an offering or for gifts to priests, Levites, and the poor, the owner of the soil becomes conscious of his status as a mere steward, who acts in behalf of the true owner.

The agrarian laws fall into a number of categories. *Ki-l'ayim is the prohibition against mixing two or more kinds of seed in one field or against grafting different kinds of fruit trees (Lv. 19.19; Dt. 22.9). *Pe'ah refers to the corner of the harvested field to be left for the poor (Lv. 19.9–10, 23.22; Dt. 24.19–22), leget to gleanings that fall and must be left for the poor (Lv. 19.9–10), and shikhḥah to sheaves that have been overlooked and must also be left for the poor (see LEGET, SHIKHḤAH, AND PE'AH). Terumah and *ma'asrot are the heave offering and tithes, respectively (Nm. 18.8ff.; Dt. 14.22–27, 26.12–15). The terumah is given to a priest and the first tithe to a Levite, who in turn separates a tithe of the tithe for the priest. A second tithe must be consumed by the owner and his family in Jerusalem; however, every third year this is donated to the poor (today terumah may not be eaten by the priest because of ritual uncleanness; the second tithe is always redeemed, while the first must be separated and given to a Levite—an arrangement is generally made by which he agrees to sell it back to the owner in return for a small consideration). *Hallah is a portion of dough to be given to the priest (Nm. 15.17–21). *Orlah is the prohibition against eating or making use of the fruit of a newly planted tree during the first three years of its growth, while reva'i refers to the obligation to redeem the fruit of the fourth year of the vineyard (Lv. 19.23–25). Finally, bikkurim are the *first fruits of the seven species (Ex. 23.19; Dt. 26.1ff.) that are offered to the priest in the Temple.

With the modern resettlement of Jews in Erets Yisra'el and their reinvolvement with agricultural pursuits, many of the laws that had become academic have taken on a practical application. While laws such as first fruits applied only in Temple times, laws such as tithes, heave offerings, *orlah, the sabbatical and jubilee years, and the law of the firstborn of animals are regarded as applicable today. Apart from *orlah, however, it is tacitly conceded that modern economic conditions do not permit the literal application of these laws. Advantage is taken of legal loopholes to fulfill the spirit of these laws without necessarily applying the letter. This is particularly true concerning the sabbatical year. Agricultural settlements act in accordance with the far-reaching concessions worked out by Chief Rabbi Avraham Yitshaq Kook (see KOOK FAMILY), including the possibility of selling land to non-Jews during the sabbatical year, thereby creating a legal fiction through which land could be cultivated. Agricultural products sold to the public in Israel are certified to the effect that "tithes and heave offerings have been duly taken" and the religious sector is careful to pay attention to the observance of the relevant agricultural laws.

AGRIPPA I (c.11 BCE–44 CE), king of Judea, 41–c.44. The grandson of Herod the Great, Agrippa was probably born in Judea but was raised and educated in Rome, in circles closely connected with the imperial court. In 37 his friend the emperor Caligula (37–41) appointed him king of the former Herodian territories in the Golan and in southern Syria. In 39 the Galilee and Transjordan areas and in 41 the whole of Judea were added to his kingdom. Agrippa is noted both for his involvement in the imperial court on behalf of his fellow Jews and for his persecution of the early Christian movement. He seems to have been very popular among his Jewish subjects, was sympathetic to the Pharisees, and is favorably mentioned in Talmudic sources.

AGUDAS HA-RABONIM. See UNION OF ORTHODOX RABBIS OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

AGUDAT ISRAEL, also known as the Agudah, a world organization of strictly Orthodox Jewry; political party in interwar Europe and in modern Israel. Established in order to defend the traditional Jewish way of life and to counter the influence of competing religious or secular ideologies, especially Zionism, Agudat Israel nevertheless adopted a series of ideological and organizational innovations. The very act of organizing an Orthodox political party, a concession to the sociopolitical exigencies of the time, was an innovation that more extreme Orthodox elements rejected on principle. The initiative for the formation of Agudat Israel came from the separatist Orthodox communities of Germany, which hoped to enlist the support of the great rabbinical figures and the Orthodox masses of eastern Europe in the fight against Zionism and Reform Judaism. Its founding conference was held in Kattowitz (Katowice), Upper Silesia, in 1912. The conference laid the ground work for the process of forming the international apparatus of the organization and for the founding of national branches of the movement. Depending on local political conditions, the branches took the form of either lobbying groups (e.g., in England, the United States) or of actual political parties (in Poland, Latvia, and, later, in Israel). The two supreme bodies of Agudat Israel are its Council of Torah Sages (Mo'etset Gedolei ha-Torah), the rabbinical body that reviews and supervises all major decisions of the movement, and the Great Assembly (Kenesiyyah Gedolah), the periodic world gathering of Agudah representatives from various countries. The interwar period, punctuated by the first three Great Assemblies (1923, 1929, 1937), witnessed the consolidation and expansion of the Agudah's work on the national and international levels. In Poland, its politicians were elected to parliament and municipal councils, and gained control of major communities. They achieved government recognition for their network of Jewish schools and sponsored the innovative *Beth Jacob schools for women. On the international level, Agudat Israel endeavored to provide an independent Orthodox voice on all major Jewish issues, whether it be calendar reform or the proposed partition of Palestine. The Holocaust destroyed the major centers of Agudat Israel in Europe; since then, Israel and the United States have become the primary centers of activity. Despite its reservations about Zionism as a secular ideology, the Agudah made its peace with the newly founded State of Israel and has become an integral part of Israeli politics, even joining government coalitions. In the realm of doctrine, the Agudah developed the concept of "Da'at Torah," which invested the rabbinic sages with almost infallible insight and authority to rule on political, economic, and social matters, as well as strictly religious issues.

'AGUNAH (אֵגוּנָה), a term that first occurs in Ruth 1.13, refers to a married woman who is legally barred from marrying another man as a result of either insufficient evidence of her husband's death or his refusal or inability to give her a *divorce (in Jewish law, only a man can initiate a divorce). Talmudic law contains a number of provisions designed to alleviate the evidentiary burden of proving her husband's death, for example, the acceptance of the testimony of one witness only and reliance upon hearsay evidence. Women, slaves, handmaidens and relatives are also eligible to testify in 'agunah cases (Yev. 6.17, 93b; Shulḥan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 17.3, 56). The circumstances under which the husband is alleged to have died are taken into account and if, for example, he disappeared in a body of water with clearly visible physical boundaries, then his death will be presumed, provided that there was a witness who waited sufficiently long at the scene of the disappearance in order to establish that the husband did not come to the surface and survive (Yev. 120a–121b; Shulḥan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 17.32). Stringency is to be avoided in 'agunah cases, and finding ways of permitting 'agunot to remarry is regarded as a mitsvah (Resp. Ro'sh no. 51; Shulḥan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 17.21). If an 'agunah does remarry and her first husband reappears on the scene, then she must be divorced by both men, and the children from the second marriage are regarded as mamzerim. The Talmud refers to a practice in the time of David of soldiers giving their wives conditional divorces, which would take effect only if they did not return from battle within a set period of time (Ket. 9b). This practice, which was intended to prevent the proliferation of 'agunot, has been followed by some rabbinical authorities in recent times. The problem of the recalcitrant husband who will not give his wife a get (bill of divorce) has become a pressing one in the modern era due to the advent of civil divorce and its availability to Jews. The recent Orthodox approach to this problem is to devise a prenuptial agreement in which the husband commits himself to appearing before a beit din for the purpose of giving a get. This agreement may be enforced by communal and/or legal sanctions aimed at depriving him of certain benefits and advantages of both a religious and a civil nature. The Conservative movement adopted this approach in 1969 and also uses the halakhic institution of conditional marriage, both of which must be instituted at the time of marriage. If all else fails, the Conservative movement will annul the marriage, using the Talmud's empowerment of rabbis to do so (hafqa'at qiddushin). The Reform movement has rejected the concept of 'agunah entirely, on the principle of equality; civil divorce generally suffices.

AHAB (Heb. Ah'av), seventh king of Israel and son of Omri; reigned over Samaria for twenty-two years (c.874-853). The verdict of the Book of Kings concerning his reign is exceptionally harsh (1 Kgs. 16.30, 33; 21.25-26; cf. Mi. 6.13), probably because he did not oppose (and perhaps even on occasion actively participated in) his wife Jezebel's patronization of the Canaanite Baal cult (1 Kgs. 16.31; 2 Kgs. 21.3; see BAAL WORSHIP). Intended to highlight the theologically negative aspects of his rule, the Bible records his mostly hostile encounters with prophets: Elijah's prophecy of a drought and the subsequent contest of faith on Mount Carmel (1 Kgs. 17.1, 18.1-46); his hostile meeting with Elijah (1 Kgs. 18.16-19); encounters with an anonymous prophet on three occasions (1 Kgs. 20.13-14, 22, 28) and with another anonymous prophet who castigated him for sparing Ben-hadad, thus violating the laws of herem (1 Kgs. 20.35-43); and the murder of Naboth and the appropriation of his vineyard (1 Kgs. 21.1-29). Elijah's hostile encounter with Ahab on this occasion includes the famous accusation "Thus said the Lord: 'Would you murder and also take possession?'" [1 Kgs. 21.17-29; cf. 1 Kgs. 22.38; 2 Kgs. 9.25-26, 30-37]).

The selective recording of the events of Ahab's reign in the biblical account for obviously tendentious theological and didactic reasons is supplemented by ancient Near Eastern sources. These afford glimpses of one of the most important Israelite reigns during the First Temple period, when Moab was a vassal of Israel. In only three isolated verses does the Bible even mention the relationship between Israel and Moab during the reign of Ahab. The Second Book of Kings 1.1 and 3.5, when taken together, imply that King Mesha of Moab rebelled against Israel, its sovereign, upon the death of Ahab. The Second Book of Kings 3.4 just as clearly implies that prior to the rebellion, Moab had been paying an enormous tribute to Israel. In fact, Israel's conquest of Moab during Omri's reign and the subsequent period of vassalage, which ended only upon the death of Ahab, is clearly described in the Moabite Mesha Stela as a period when the chief Moabite god Chemosh "was angry with his land."

Ahab was one of the leaders of the southern Syrian coalition against the Assyrian king Shalmaneser III at the battle of Qarqar (853 BCE). Israel contributed two thousand war chariots to the united coalition forces, more than any of the other allies. Although Assyrian annals claimed a massive victory for Shalmaneser, the fact that Shalmaneser's records indicate that he fought this same coalition four more times, in 849, 848, 845, and 841, clearly demonstrates that it was only after the last of these campaigns (long after Ahab's death) that the western states were finally subjugated.

AHAD HA-'AM (1856-1927), pen name of Asher Ginzberg, meaning "one of the people"; writer and Zionist philosopher. Born of a Hasidic family in the Ukraine, Ginzberg achieved the reputation of a brilliant young Talmudist before studying modern philosophy, which he understood as irrevocably undermining religious faith. In 1884 he moved to Odessa, where he came into close contact with the Hovevei Zion movement and began in 1889 to write the occasional essays that made him one of the most prominent figures in modern Hebrew literature. In the debate over the future of the early Zionist movement and Jewish culture, Ahad ha-'Am called for more intense educational efforts to strengthen Jewish national consciousness. Rejecting calls for the radical transformation of Jewish values, he advocated pursuit of Jewish continuity in secular terms, praising absolute justice as an essential Jewish value.

After 1897 Ahad ha-'Am criticized Theodor Herzl's political Zionism for what he felt were its unrealistic and inauthentic Jewish aims, holding that Zionism was a means for protecting the Jewish people from demoralization and assimilation rather than a response to the failure of Jews to achieve political and social integration in the Diaspora. Drawing on nineteenth-century evolutionary views, Ahad ha-'Am conceived of the Jewish people as a national ego, endowed with a collective will to survive and possessing a distinctive cultural-spiritual personality that had emerged through the ancient struggles between priesthood and prophecy and later in the practical ethos of the Pharisees. Renewed Jewish settlements in Erets Yisra'el would serve as a spiritual center that would nurture new Hebraic cultural forms, strengthening and enriching Jewish loyalties in the Diaspora and counteracting the corrosive individualism of modern society.

Ahad ha-'Am's influence was considerable among spiritual or cultural Zionists, including Martin Buber and Gershom Scholem, even when they rejected his philosophical views.

In 1907 Ahad ha-'Am moved to London and in 1922 settled in Tel Aviv, where he completed the editing of his collected essays and several volumes of letters.

AḤA' OF SHABḤA (c.680–750), Babylonian rabbi, also known as Aḥa'i, who taught for many years at the academy of *Pumbedita. He was the editor (or, less probably, the author) of She'iltot, a collection of homiletic questions. (An early example of this genre is found in Talmud tractate Shabbat 30a–b.)

The collection associated with Aḥa' contains approximately 170 homilies arranged according to the weekly Pentateuchal readings. Some of these homilies, as well as homilies belonging to this genre though not included in the collection of Aḥa', were incorporated into other works, especially Halakhot Gedolot*. Topics were chosen to appeal to a relatively broad audience. Each homily, after an introductory section, propounds a question that is finally resolved following an intermediate section in which rabbinic material relating to the general topic is quoted. The primary significance of the work for modern scholars lies in its attestation of an early version of the Talmud Bavli. The editio princeps was published in Venice in 1566. A critical edition was published by S. K. Mirsky (5 vols. [1959–1977]).

AḤARIT HA-YAMIM. See ESCHATOLOGY.

AHARON BEN ELIYAHU (c.1328–1369), *Karaites scholar born in Nicomedia and active in Constantinople. He was frequently referred to as Aharon the Younger to distinguish him from *Aharon ben Yosef ha-Rofe', the Elder. Aharon the Younger sought to provide an authoritative basis for Karaite religious life with his trilogy of Karaite lore: 'Ets Hayyim, completed in 1346, on theology (edited by Franz Delitzsch [Leipzig, 1841]); Gan 'Eden, completed in 1354, on Karaite law (1864; Ramleh, 1972); and Keter Torah, completed in 1362, a commentary on the Pentateuch (1866; Ramleh, 1972). In his works, Aharon demonstrates a wide and deep acquaintance with Karaite and Rabbanite learning, as well as with Arabic philosophical literature. He also composed a number of religious poems, some of which were included in the Karaite liturgy.

Aharon's 'Ets Hayyim was the last Karaite attempt to provide a rational basis for religious beliefs and was meant to be the Karaite counterpart to Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed. Unlike Maimonides, Aharon did not seek to create a new synthesis of religion with Aristotelian philosophy but instead reformulated the Mutazili thought of his Karaite predecessors. While he was openly critical of the Maimonidean approach, his book manifests a much greater appreciation and understanding of Avraham ibn Ezra and Maimonides than do the commentaries of his predecessor Aharon ben Yosef ha-Rofe'. In contrast, 'Ets Hayyim reveals a more independent, resistant attitude toward the Andalusian Rabbanites than do the works of such fifteenth-century Karaites as Eliyyahu Bashyazi or Kaleb Afendopolo. 'Ets Hayyim was popular among later Karaites, and a commentary was written on it by Simḥah Lutski.

In his Gan 'Eden, Aharon retains a strict interpretation of Karaite law, although he does not accept the restrictive consanguine theory of forbidden marriage. This work was the last major codification of Karaite practice before the fifteenth-century reforms of the Bashyazi family. In his biblical commentary, Aharon adopted the general Karaite preference for literal interpretation but shows the influence of the Spanish Rabbanite commentators and grammarians, inserting metaphorical comments where appropriate.

AHARON BEN ME'IR (10th cent.), Palestinian *ga'on. He is known primarily for his role in the calendrical controversy of 921 and 922, which pitted Palestinian leaders against Babylonian leaders. As the official head of Palestinian Jewry, he issued a proclamation concerning the fixing of the Jewish *calendar for the years 921 through 924. The Babylonian authorities, who followed a different interpretation of certain calendrical rules, arrived at different dates and called on the Jewish world at large to disregard his proclamation and follow the Babylonian version of the calendar. A bitter exchange followed, and the Jewish world was deeply divided. Eventually, the Babylonian version prevailed. In addition to providing the opportunity for *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on to distinguish himself in the Babylonian cause, contributing to his advancement in Babylonian academic circles, this controversy marked the last stand of the Palestinian authorities against the encroachment of Babylonian influence in legal matters.

AHARON BEN MOSHEH HA-LEVI OF STARO-SIELCE (1766–1828), Hasidic master. In his lifetime, Aharon ha-Levi was recognized as the most prominent adherent and original exponent of the teachings of R. *Shneur Zalman of Lyady within the *Ḥabad Hasidic movement. The tempestuous dispute that erupted after the death of Shneur Zalman resulted in both the dynastic succession of his son, Dov Ber Schneersohn, to the leadership of the evolving Ḥabad movement and to a significant ideological schism directed by Aharon. The second generation of Ḥabad was torn by the conflict arising from Aharon's attempts to disseminate extensive and systematic explanations of the writings of Shneur Zalman concerning the secrets of divine worship among the uninitiated, as well as his definitive interpretation of Ḥabad divine worship. Further, Aharon formulated a dialectic worldview that denied an independent existence to all reality, since all things, in his contention, possessed true actuality only within the divine entity. This position engendered a mystical divine worship based in total self-abnegation and denial resulting in mystical union with God. His works include Sha'arei ha-'Avodah (Shklov, 1821), Sha'arei ha-Yihud ve-ha-'Eminah (Shklov, 1820), and 'Avodat ha-Levi (Lwów, 1866).

AHARON BEN SHEMU'EL, legendary miracle worker from Baghdad who revealed esoteric teachings, magic, and "secrets of prayers" to the Jewish communities in southern Italy. Two sources describe his deeds: the eleventh-century chronicle Megillat Ahima'ats, which includes a detailed description of his voyage to Italy and several tales of his miraculous activities there; and the genealogy of the *Kalonimos family, written by *El'azar ben Yehudah of Worms in his commentary on the prayers (MS Paris, 772, etc.). According to this second source, Aharon revealed the secrets of the prayers to the forefathers of the Kalonimids, who settled in the Rhineland in the ninth century. According to Megillat Ahima'ats, Aharon was the son of the Babylonian ga'on and was banished from his home because he used magic to make a lion perform menial work. He reportedly revived a dead child, recognized a dead person who tried to serve as a leader of the prayers in the synagogue, and performed several other miracles. It is possible that there is a historical basis to these legends, but they are insufficient to establish the exact date and circumstances of Aharon's life.

AHARON BEN YA'AQOV HA-KOHEN OF LUNEL (13th–14th cent.), Provençal scholar and codifier. Despite his appellation, he was probably from Narbonne. Exiled from southern France in 1306, he migrated to Majorca. He was the author of the Orhot Ḥayyim (pt. 1, Florence, 1750; pt. 2, Berlin, 1902), a compendium of Jewish law and custom based on Provençal, German, French, and Spanish works, which he revised upon arriving on Majorca to include some local customs. The anonymous Kol Bo (1490) is considered by some scholars to be an abbreviated version of Orhot Ḥayyim, but others view Kol Bo as a first draft. In addition to Jewish law, copies of Orhot Ḥayyim in manuscript form also include chapters on faith, philosophy, the natural sciences, the Messiah, reward and punishment, the intercalation of the calendar, and formulas for documents.

AHARON BEN YOSEF HA-KOHEN SARGADO, ga'on of *Pumbedita from 943 to 960. Surprisingly, he was not a scion of one of the families traditionally associated with the academy, but a prosperous merchant. Although he was a bitter enemy of *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, Aharon's literary activity shows unmistakable signs of Sa'adyah's influence. In addition to the traditional writing of responsa, few of which have survived, Aharon wrote a commentary, in Arabic, as yet unpublished, on the second half of the Book of Deuteronomy, which was popular until at least the twelfth century.

AHARON BEN YOSEF HA-LEVI (13th–14th cent.), Talmudic scholar and commentator also known as Harah. He was born in Barcelona and was a student of Moses *Nahmanides.

Very few of Aharon ben Yosef ha-Levi's works have survived. Best-known are his commentaries on Talmudic tractates Ketubbot and Beitsah; his commentary on two tractates of Yitshaq Alfasi's code, Berakhot and Ta'anit; and his critique of R. Shelomoh ben Avraham Adret's Torat ha-Bayit, on Jewish home and family ritual law. This critique, Bedeq ha-Bayit, appears in standard editions of Torat ha-Bayit. Though Aharon ben Yosef ha-Levi has also been credited with the authorship of Sefer ha-Mitsvot, a popular work on the 613 commandments, this view is unsubstantiated.

AHARON BEN YOSEF HA-ROFE' (c.1250–1320), *Karaite scholar and exegete, known as the Elder to distinguish him from *Aharon ben Eliyyahu, the Younger, who lived about a century later. The sole fact known about Aharon the Elder's life is that in 1279 he was living in Solkhat, Crimea, where he disputed the calendar with the Rabbanites. He also probably lived in Constantinople. His major work is Sefer ha-Mivhar (Yevpatoriya 1835), a commentary on the Pentateuch completed in 1293. He takes a literal approach, although his work includes a significant amount of theological content and an occasional aggadic interpretation, usually taken from *Rashi. He demonstrates a deep and appreciative knowledge of rabbinic literature and quotes frequently from both Karaite and Rabbanite predecessors, in particular, Avraham ibn Ezra. Aharon the Elder's theological approach is based on Kalam, although the influence of Maimonidean Aristotelianism can also be discerned; he thus represents the beginning of a change in Karaite religious thought. Sefer ha-Mivhar was widely used by later Karaites, and seven supercommentaries were written on it. Aharon also wrote commentaries on the Former Prophets and on Isaiah 1–59 (published as Mivhar Yesharim [Yevpatoriya, 1836]), Psalms 1–71, and Job (which has not survived). In addition, he wrote an unfinished Hebrew grammar, Kelil Yofi (Constantinople, 1581; Yevpatoriya, 1847), which shows the influence of Yonah ibn Yanah. Aharon set the Karaite liturgy and introduced a number of Spanish Rabbanite piyyutim into it. His redaction became accepted as the final version of the Karaite prayer service, and some of his own liturgical poems were included in the Karaite prayer book.

AHARON HA-LEVI OF BARCELONA (13th–14th cent.), Spanish Talmudist. He is the author of Sefer ha-Ḥinnukh, in which the 613 *commandments are enumerated in the order in which they appear in the Pentateuch and are expounded according to rabbinic tradition. The book was translated into Latin and French.

AḤARONIM (אַחֲרֹנִים; later ones), in rabbinic literature, a term referring to contemporary scholars or those of recent generations. The dividing line between the ri'shonim* (early ones) and the aḥaronim is not clearly demarcated. Beginning in the first half of the fifteenth century, aḥaronim was most often used in Ashkenazi circles to refer to rabbinic scholars who lived after the mid-fourteenth century, when the Black Death and attacks against German Jews decimated Jewish communities. According to other views, the aḥaronim came after Yosef *Karo, who wrote the Shulḥan 'Arukh. Generally, authorities of this period, which stretches to the present day, defer to the opinions of scholars of earlier periods, whom they view as superior to themselves but not necessarily to one another.

AHASUERUS (Heb. Aḥasheverosh). [This entry discusses the biblical Persian king; for a discussion of the legendary wanderer, see WANDERING JEW.] King of Persia mentioned in the *Book of Esther and believed by modern scholars to correspond to King Xerxes I (r. 486–465), Ahasuerus is pictured as very weak and capricious, easily influenced by his advisors and by the queen. He is the only figure mentioned in Esther who is referred to elsewhere in the Bible, appearing in Daniel 9.1 (where he is referred to mistakenly as the father of Darius rather than his son) and Ezra 4.6. There is also some discussion of Ahasuerus in the aggadah, where some positive things are said about him, including the assertion that he was one of the few kings in history who was able to rule over the entire earth (Meg. 11a; Targum Sheni to Est 1.2).

Scholars are now convinced that the name Ahasuerus, in its Biblical Hebrew form, is the equivalent of the Persian Xshavarsha, which is used to refer to King Xerxes I, the fourth king of the Achaemenian dynasty founded by Cyrus the Great. This corresponds to the Akkadian name Hish'arshu (and Ahshiwarshu) and the official Aramaic name Heshirush. These names have long been known from fifth-century BCE Aramaic papyri and from trilingual inscriptions in Persian, Akkadian, and Elamite. A variant form of the spelling with an initial aleph is now attested in an Aramaic papyrus fragment from Elephantine dating to 484 BCE.

AHAVAH RABBAH AND AHAVAT 'OLAM (אַהֲבַת רַבָּה; אַהֲבַת עוֹלָם; Great Love and Everlasting Love), two variations of the second blessing before the *Shema' mentioned in the Talmud (Ber. 11b). In the Ashkenazi rite, Ahavah Rabbah is recited in the morning, while Ahavat 'Olam is recited in the evening. In all other rites Ahavat 'Olam is used both in the morning and evening services. The central theme of this blessing is the giving of the Torah as an act of love by God to Israel. Another element is the prayer for the ability to study the Torah and fulfill all its teachings. The Sephardi rite emphasizes divine love and deeds of redemption.

AHIJAH THE SHILONITE (10th cent. BCE), a prophet from the premonarchic cultic center of *Shiloh. In his prophecies Ahijah encouraged the revolt against King *Solomon and the subsequent division of Solomon's empire by the Ephraimite Jeroboam ben Nebat. Ahijah met Jeroboam on the highway between Jerusalem and Shechem and tore his outer garment into twelve pieces, giving ten of them to Jeroboam to represent symbolically the ten tribes that God gave to Jeroboam, with the other two to remain with Solomon. Because of God's later dissatisfaction with Jeroboam, the then blind Ahijah prophesied to a disguised wife of Jeroboam the demise of his dynasty (1 Kgs. 11.29–40, 14.1–18). Rabbinic tradition designated Ahijah as one of the seven righteous men whose combined lifespans cover the history of the world. The others are *Adam, Methusaleh, Shem, *Jacob, Amram, and *Elijah. In Hasidic legend Ahijah figures as the mystical teacher of Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov.

AHITHOPHEL (Heb. Ahitofel), adviser to *David, noted for his wisdom ("The counsel of Ahithophel was as if a man inquired of the word of God" [2 Sm. 16.23]). Ahithophel later went over to the rebellious *Absalom, but his advice, which might have meant success for the rebellion, was rejected in favor of the counterproposal made by Hushai the Archite (acting on the command of David). Seeing that his counsel went unheeded, Ahithophel committed suicide. In later Jewish tradition, Ahithophel became the archetype of an evil, provocative, overproud adviser (the rabbis say he is denied a share in the world to come), while in medieval literature he is depicted as a Mephistophelian figure to whom is ascribed a Book of Lots dealing with the divination of future events. According to a Midrashic legend, Ahithophel was the grandfather of Bath-sheba and teacher of Socrates.

AḤOT QETANNAH (אֲחֹת קְטַנָּה; Little Sister), a piyyut (a piyyut* with a refrain) for the eve of Ro'sh ha-Shanah in the Sephardi and Yemenite liturgies and incorporated into some Ashkenazi liturgies under the influence of the mystics. The initial letters of the eight stanzas spell out the author's name, Avraham Ḥazzan (Ghirondi, born in Salonika, 1533). Ahot qetannah, the opening words, are taken from Song of Songs 8.8. According to the Midrash, Israel, the Little Sister, seeks reconciliation with her Divine Lover. The poet describes the suffering Israel has endured during the past year, concluding each stanza with the refrain, "Let the year end with its curses." The final stanza, in anticipation of a better future, ends, "Let the new year begin with its blessings!"

'AKKUM (אֲכֻמ; abbr. for Heb. worshipers of stars and constellations), idol worshipers. The term reflects an era when astrology was evidently particularly widespread, and much pagan worship was centered around the stars and planets. 'Akkum was often used in rabbinic literature to refer to an idolater or heathen as opposed to a Christian (nokhri or goy [gentile]). However, Christian polemicists alleged that the term was an abbreviation for "worshipers of Christ and Muḥammad" or "worshipers of Christ and Mary."

ALAMI, SHELOMOH (c.1370–1420), Spanish ethical writer who experienced the Spanish persecutions of 1391 and later moved to Portugal, where in 1415 he wrote Iggeret ha-Musar. In the book, also known as the Iggeret ha-Tokhaḥah veba-'Eminah, he suggests that the troubles of his people were caused by their own evil deeds. He condemns the learned as being either preoccupied with subtle Talmudic problems or with vainly trying to reconcile Jewish learning with fashionable philosophy; the rich had become too interested in luxury and had discarded their Judaism, while the ordinary people had not always been honest in their dealings with the gentiles. He also contrasts the style of Christian religious and liturgical behavior with the lack of decorum and carelessness of the Jews. The earliest of the eighteen editions of Iggeret ha-Musar appeared in Constantinople in 1510; and the latest, edited by A. N. Habermann, in Jerusalem in 1946.

ALASHKAR, MOSHEH (1466–1547), rabbinic scholar. Born in Spain, Alashkar was among the Jews expelled in 1492. After staying for a time in Tunis and in Patras, Greece, he reached Cairo, where he was appointed dayyan. In his later years he went to Jerusalem, where he remained in contact on halakhic matters with various Diaspora communities, such as Italy and Greece. He was in particularly close contact with the scholars of Crete. Alashkar is especially known for his responsa to distinguished contemporaries (Venice, 1554), and he had halakhic disputes with Ya'aqov *Berab, the leading authority in Safed, among others. He also wrote on Kabbalah and was the author of piyyutim; one of them was included in the Sephardi baq-qashot* (publ. in Y. Zarki, Yefeh Nof [Sabionetta, 1573]).

ALASHKAR, YOSEF (15th cent.), North African rabbinic scholar; son of Mosheh (1417–1468), a distinguished physician and kabbalist, and author of a work in verse on the laws of ritual slaughter. Although Yosef wrote many works, little is known of his life other than that he studied in Tlemcen. His multifaceted writings include a lengthy commentary on Avot; a work on the laws of ritual slaughter; an ethical book, Refu'at ha-Nefesh; Porat Yosef on the Masorah; and a work on Ya'aqov ben Asher's Arba'ah Turim (Orah Hayyim). These remain in manuscript. His first and most important book was Sefer Tsafnat Pa'neah (edited by Moshe Idel [Jerusalem, 1991]), in which he drew connections between subjects in the Bible and oral law with astronomical, philosophical, and kabbalistic themes. After his death, his tomb became a place of pilgrimage for Jews in Algeria.

ALBALAG, YITSHAQ (13th cent.), philosopher and translator who lived in northern Spain or southern France; a follower of Aristotelianism as interpreted by Averroës. In 1292 Albalag translated al-Ghazali's Maqasid al-falasifah into Hebrew and added his own comments where he disagreed with the author's views. His prologue, which he called Sefer Tiqqun ha-De'ot (edited by Georges Vajda [Jerusalem, 1973]), includes an explanation of the creation as related in Genesis. Contrary to Maimonides, Albalag held that it is possible to prove the eternity of the world philosophically. Albalag was responsible for disseminating the ideas of Averroës among Jewish thinkers and was one of the chief Jewish exponents of the "double truth" theory, according to which there is no compromise between the conflicting truths of theology and philosophy. Each establishes its rules in its own manner, and a thesis may be true and false at the same time—philosophically true and theologically false, or vice versa.

ALBECK FAMILY, scholars of rabbinics.

Shalom Albeck (1858–1920). Born and educated in Warsaw, Albeck was a prolific scholar who undertook a biographical lexicon of rabbinic figures (Mishpehot Sofetim, pt. 1 [1903]). He became involved in a protracted scholarly controversy when he expressed doubt about the textual authenticity of B. H. Auerbach's edition of *Avraham ben Yitshaq of Narbonne's Sefer ha-'Eshkol (Halberstadt, 1861), accusing the editor of forgery. Albeck finally issued his own critical edition (Berlin, 1910) which, upon his death, was continued by his son, Hanokh.

Hanokh Albeck (1890–1972). Born in Łowicz, Poland, he studied at both the Israelitisch-Theologische Lehranstalt in Vienna and the University of Vienna. In 1920 he began work as a research scholar at the Akademie für die Wissenschaft des Judentums in Berlin. He also served for a decade as professor of Talmud at the Berlin Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums before moving to Jerusalem and joining the faculty of the Hebrew University, where he taught from 1936 to 1956. He concluded in his Untersuchungen über die Redaktion der Mishna (Berlin, 1923) that the compilers of the Talmud did not edit but only collected scattered older material. In his Untersuchungen über die halakhischen Midraschim (Berlin, 1927), he stated that variant types of halakhic midraschim were the result of divergent redactions. Albeck published a critical edition of the Mishnah (1952–1959), edited the Hebrew translation of Leopold Zunz's Gottesdienstliche Vorträge (Jerusalem, 1947), and completed the edition of Genesis Rabbah started by Julius Theodor.

ALBO, YOSEF (c.1380–1444), Spanish philosopher; pupil of Hasda'i ben Avraham *Crescas. In 1213 and 1214 Albo was one of the chief Jewish spokesmen in the Disputation of *Tortosa, imposed on the Jews by the church authorities. Following the disputation, widespread conversion occurred among Spanish Jews, and Albo wrote his Sefer ha-'Iqqarim to stem this tendency and strengthen those whose faith was wavering. This book was the final major statement of medieval Jewish *philosophy and, though undoubtedly affected by the atmosphere of Christian attacks on Judaism, represents a positive attempt to determine the roots of Jewish religion. Albo considers first the question of salvation and finds his answer in the proper conception of law. His preoccupation with law and his relegation of belief in the coming of the Messiah to the level of a secondary, rather than a primary, principle may well be his response to the Christian emphasis on faith and messianism. He focused on the delineation of the three kinds of law that guide humanity. Conventional and natural law suffice to care for earthly needs, such as peace and economic security. Only divine or revealed law can assure salvation. By setting forth three basic principles—belief in the existence of God, revelation, and retribution—under which he subsumed what he called the shorashim (secondary or derivative roots or principles), Albo intended to enable people to distinguish between true and pseudodivine laws. There are eight shorashim; four of them are connected to the first principle, the existence of God, and they are God's unity, his incorporeity, his independence of time, and his perfection. To the second principle, divine revelation, are connected three other shorashim: divine knowledge, prophecy, and the authenticity of Moses' mission. The final shorash, connected to the third principle, retribution, is divine providence. From the shorashim he derives six "branches," which are not fundamentals to faith: creation ex nihilo, Moses as the greatest prophet, the eternal validity of the Torah, the potential for perfection by observing even a simple commandment, resurrection of the dead, and the advent of the Messiah. In typical medieval fashion, Albo tried to advance arguments for divine law based on human reason and experience, but in the last analysis he had to rest his case on revelation and belief in the reality of miracles. Albo's book was a great success in the Jewish world. The first edition appeared in Soncino in 1485. Another edition, under the title Ohel Ya'aqov, with a commentary by Ya'aqov ben Shemu'el Bunem of Brześć, appeared in Freiburg in 1584. An edition with an extensive commentary, called 'Ets Shatul, by Gedalyah ben Shelomoh Lipschitz appeared in Venice in 1618. Some Christian theologians, including Hugo Grotius and Richard Simon, held Sefer ha-'Iqqarim in high esteem. A five-volume critical edition with English translation and ALCHEMY, the branch of chemistry dedicated to the transformation of base metals into gold. The precepts of alchemy had some impact on Jewish scientists, philosophers, and mystics during the Middle Ages and early modern times. Several favorable references to it are to be found in the works of Jewish philosopher-scientists in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, but there is no indication that any of them dedicated a specific study to the subject, or performed experiments guided by the principles of this field. Alchemy remained a relatively marginal subject in Jewish intellectual discourse, and some scholars expressed opposition to it. It had more impact on Jewish *magic, and several medieval and early modern magical texts make use of alchemical (often combined with astrological) signs and concepts. For example, it is evident from the writings of Avraham ibn Ezra that he was aware of the principles of alchemy and viewed them as part of the body of scientific knowledge, but there is no indication that he placed particular emphasis on them (as opposed to *astrology, which plays an important role in his work).

Alchemy had a greater impact on the medieval *Kabbalah. Its symbols were included in comprehensive kabbalistic systems, which presented all aspects of celestial existence as united in one chain of *emanation of divine powers. The terminology and techniques of the alchemists intrigued Jewish mystics, who interpreted the processes described as analogous to hidden processes of the divine world, and as reflecting the characteristics of divine powers. This is especially evident in the more magical aspects of kabbalistic speculations, where often astrological symbols are combined (as is often the case in non-Jewish alchemical treatises as well). The most influential use of alchemical concepts is found in the *Zohar. Several sections of the Zohar, and of the Hebrew kabbalistic works of Moshe de León, use alchemical processes and terminology as components of the homiletical interpretation of biblical verses in a kabbalistic manner. R. Yoḥanan Aliman, a kabbalist who wrote at the end of the fifteenth century, included alchemy among his many interests in sciences and magical procedures. The Safed kabbalist R. Ḥayyim Vital wrote an alchemical treatise and indicated his interest in this topic in other ways as well.

One of the more important aspects of the impact of alchemy on Jewish thought was its relationship to biblical hermeneutics. Many biblical figures, verses, and events were interpreted as embodying or reflecting alchemical principles, and difficult passages in scriptures were understood as representing truths pointed out by alchemical theory. In this way, the Bible was used to legitimize the "craft," as well as to demonstrate its antiquity. There were several alchemists who contributed meaningfully to the development of medieval and early modern alchemical literature who were Jews or Jewish converts to Christianity, but they did not write in Hebrew, so their works were not integrated into Jewish scientific tradition. Alchemical tradition includes legends about prominent Jewish figures in the history of this science, from Elijah the Prophet to Maria Hebraica, who was reputed to have lived in the first century in Egypt and to have discovered important alchemical techniques. Such legends, coupled with the attribution of alchemical knowledge to biblical figures, created an image of a major Jewish element in the history of alchemy. Yet within Jewish culture itself its impact remained marginal.

ALCIMUS, high priest in Jerusalem from c.162 to 159 BCE. Following the restoration of the sacrificial cult by *Judah the Maccabee in 164 BCE, the post of high priest seems to have remained vacant for about two years, until the Seleucid king Demetrius I nominated Alcimus. His nomination was approved by the scribes and the *Hasideans but not by Judah. Once in office, Alcimus alienated the Hasideans by murdering sixty of their adherents. This deed as well as his opposition to Judah and his destruction of the walls of the inner court of the Temple were condemned in the extant Jewish sources.

ALDABI, ME'IR (c.1310–1360), Spanish mystical philosopher. A grandson of *Asher ben Yeḥi'el, Aldabi was the author of Shevilei Emunah, an encyclopedic treatise on the existence and nature of God, creation, the geography of the earth, human physiology and psychology, rules for health, the nature of the soul, Jewish law, human destiny, and the final redemption of Israel. The work is divided into ten paths, or sections, and seems to have been based largely on the ideas of Gershon ben Shelomoh of Arles, Moses *Nahmanides, Yosef ben Ya'aqov ibn *Zaddik, *Hillel ben Shemu'el, Moses *Maimonides, Shelomoh ben Avraham *Adret, and *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda'. Aldabi, who settled in Jerusalem, was well-versed in both Talmud and kabbalistic literature and seems to have had some knowledge of Arabic. He believed that the ideas of the Greek philosophers were ultimately derived from Hebrew sources, and his aim seems to have been to compile all of knowledge into one volume. The work, first published in Riva di Trento (1518), was popular and went through several editions.

'ALEINU (אֱלֵינוּ; It Is Our Duty to Praise), prayer proclaiming divine sovereignty over the world; though probably composed earlier, it is attributed by tradition to the school of Rav, from the third century, as an introduction to the *Malkhuyot section of the *Ro'sh ha-Shanah Musaf service. From the fourteenth century on, it began to be used as the concluding prayer for all services in all rites. The prayer was also the object of slanderous accusations. The phrase "for they prostrate themselves to vanity and emptiness and pray to a god who cannot save them" was interpreted by the Christian authorities as a specific attack upon Christianity and was censored by them. It was later deleted from many printed editions of the Ashkenazi ritual in order to prevent libels and persecutions. The Sephardim, who recite only the first paragraph of the prayer at the end of their daily prayer, and who lived mainly in Islamic countries, still retain it. Most Ashkenazi Orthodox congregations in Israel have reinstituted this phrase, whereas some of the progressive editions of the prayer book continue to omit it. The prayer, a confident and triumphant proclamation of God's universal kingship in a pagan world, was invested during medieval times with special solemnity and awe and became particularly associated with martyrdom. The martyrs of Blois, in 1171, are said to have been heard singing the 'Aleinu from the burning pyre.

ALFASI, DAVID (10th cent.), *Karaitic lexicographer and commentator. He was born in Fez, Morocco, and lived for a number of years in Jerusalem, where he wrote his Kitab Jami' al-Alfaz, a Judeo-Arabic lexicon of the Bible. This dictionary was an important step forward in the development of Hebrew philology. Alfasi had a fine sense for language and pointed out many parallels between biblical Hebrew, Mishnaic Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic. He made use of the ancient Aramaic Bible translations by Onkelos and Yonatan ben 'Uzzi'el, as well as the more contemporary commentary of Sa'adyah Ga'on. Levi ben Yefet compiled a short version of the lexicon, which was used by 'Ali ben Yisra'el and 'Ali ibn Suleyman when composing their dictionaries. Alfasi also wrote commentaries on Psalms and the Song of Songs, which do not seem to have survived.

ALFASI, YITSHAQ (1013–1103), Talmudic authority and codifier; known as Rif. Born in Algeria, he studied with R. Hanan'el ben Hushi'el in Kairouan and settled in Fez (hence the name Alfasi, i.e., of Fez), where he lived until the age of seventy-five. He was then forced to flee to Spain, where he headed the community of Lucena. Alfasi was an important link in the process of transferring the center of Talmudic studies from east to west. The last of the Babylonian ge'onim, R. Ha'i, died when Alfasi was twenty-five, and by way of the North African academies, Spain began to emerge as the new focus of Talmudic learning. Alfasi was the first major rabbinical authority to teach in Spain. Hundreds of his responsa have been preserved, most of them originally written in Arabic and addressed to communities in Spain and North Africa. His Sefer ha-Halakhah (Constantinople, 1509) is one of the basic works of Jewish legal codification. Its objectives were to extract legal subject matter from the Talmud and determine halakhic rulings, and to present a digest of the Talmud that would facilitate and popularize its study. His brief explanations, inserted into the original Talmud text, brilliantly clarify difficult and obscure points. Writing at the conclusion of the geonic period, Alfasi was able to present an authoritative summation of geonic thought and legislation while concentrating on the actual Talmud text, which, by that time, was often neglected. Sefer ha-Halakhot influenced many scholars and codifiers, constituting a primary source for Moses *Maimonides. It was also, in turn, the subject of numerous other works, both critical and supportive, and during the following centuries in western Europe, particularly in Spain, rabbinical study was based not on the Talmud but on Alfasi's work. ALGAZI FAMILY, family of rabbis and community leaders active from the sixteenth through the nineteenth century in Turkey, Crete, Erets Yisra'el, and Egypt.

Nissim Shelomoh ben Avraham Algazi (1610–1683), rabbi born in Bursa, Turkey. In 1635 he moved to Jerusalem, but in approximately 1646 he settled in Smyrna, where he established a beit midrash. He spent his last years, from 1670 on, back in Jerusalem. His writings include commentaries on the Talmud and aggadah and four volumes of homilies.

Yisra'el Ya'aqov ben Yom Tov Algazi (1680–1756), grandson of Nissim Shelomoh; rabbi and kabbalist. By 1737, he had left his native Smyrna, lived in Safed, and settled in Jerusalem. He revitalized the spiritual life of the Jerusalem community, establishing yeshivot and leading the influential Beit El and Ahavat Shalom, circles of kabbalists. He produced works on many halakhic subjects, a work on Talmudic methodology, and a homiletic commentary on the Torah; it has been surmised that he was also the author of the anonymous Hemdut Yamim. Revered by Sephardi Jewry, he was appointed chief rabbi of Jerusalem (ri'shon le-Tsiyyon) shortly before his death. The circles of mystics to which he belonged believed in the possibility of a return from the dead, and there is a document defining the goals of his circle dated from a year after his death and bearing his signature.

Yom Tov ben Yisra'el Ya'aqov Algazi (1727–1802), son of Yisra'el Ya'aqov and outstanding halakhist and kabbalist. A friend of Hayyim Yosef David Azulai, Algazi was appointed chief rabbi of Jerusalem in 1776. Among his works are sermons and responsa, a commentary on a halakhic text of Nahmanides, which he discovered in Italy, and a study of the laws of divorce, Get Mequshar (1767).

'AL HA-NISSIM (אֵלֵינוּ יְהוָה; [We Thank You] for the Miracles), addition inserted into the *Amidah and *Birkat ha-Mazon on the festivals of *Purim and *Hanukkah. After the initial formula, a brief account of the events commemorated on the festival is recited. The version that has become accepted is first known from the prayer book of R. *Amram bar Sheshna' (9th cent.), though different rites exhibit minor textual variants. The Conservative prayer book contains a version to be recited on Yom ha-'Atsma'ut.

'AL HET (אָל הֵט; For the Sin), a litany of confession, also known as Viddui Rabbah, recited in the Minhah service preceding Yom Kippur and in every service on Yom Kippur except the concluding service, when it is replaced by *Attah Noten Yad. The congregation first recites these confessions silently and then repeats them aloud, together with the reader, as part of the confession connected to the Yom Kippur 'Amidah since tannaitic times. The list of sins is in alphabetical order (the Sephardi version includes one sin for each letter, the Ashkenazi, two). Shorter versions exist from the geonic period, as do expanded versions from the Middle Ages. The 'Al Het' is recited in the first person plural, as a corporate and not an individual act, and enumerates sins in the domain of human relations and acts of diminishing the image of God, begging God's forgiveness.

ALIMAN, YOHANAN (c.1435–1504), author of a philosophical commentary on the Song of Songs; also known as Allemano. Born in Constantinople, he later immigrated to Italy. His most famous pupil was the Christian Hebraist and kabbalist Pico della Mirandola. Hesheq Shelomoh (Leghorn, 1790), the title of his commentary on the Song of Songs, is the longest of four books he is known to have written and the only one which has been printed (this, only in part). It reveals a thorough knowledge of Greek and Arabic philosophy. In the introduction to the work he seeks to demonstrate that King Solomon had a command of all fields of human inquiry. Aliman's other works are 'Einei ha-'Edah, a commentary on the Pentateuch; Hayyei 'Olam, on how to achieve union with God; and Sefer Liqqutim, a collection of novellae, wise sayings, and aphorisms, some from works no longer extant.

ALIMONY. There is no provision in Jewish law for the maintenance of a divorced wife by her husband (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 82.6). A divorced woman does, however, receive a lump sum, consisting of the ketubbah*, an additional increment known as the tosefet ketubbah, and her dowry (nedunya). This lump sum is intended to provide a divorced woman with all the financial support she requires. Even if she has forfeited her ketubbah as a result of misconduct during marriage, she is entitled to receive back her dowry (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 115.5). A husband who lives with his wife and does not ensure that she has a proper ketubbah is condemned by the Talmud in the strongest of terms (Ket. 54b). Notwithstanding the fact that divorce terminates a husband's obligation to maintain his wife, it is a mitsvah to support a divorced spouse in preference to the poor at large (Isserles, Even ha-'Ezer 119.8).

'ALIYYAH (אֲלִיּוּת; ascent, going up), a word applied to three different kinds of ascent.

Ascent to Heaven. The only explicit reference in the Bible to a miraculous ascent to heaven is that of the prophet Elijah (2 Kgs. 2.1–13). The Midrash (Gn. Rab. 25.1) denies that Enoch ascended to heaven, against the views of the sectarians (minim), who so interpreted Genesis 5.24, but apocalyptic literature regarded both Enoch and Moses (the latter on the basis of his ascent of Mount Sinai) as having made the ascent to heaven and returned to earth; they are both the subjects of apocalypses bearing their names and centering on their ascension. Other figures who ascended to heaven according to apocalyptic and rabbinic literature include Isaiah, Baruch, Ezra, and even post-biblical rabbis such as Yishma'e'l ben Elisha'. In some instances the ascent is described as a journey to a permanent paradise; in others it is a temporary mystical ascent followed by a return to earth.

Ascent to Erets Yisra'el. The geographical elevation of Erets Yisra'el, relative to low-lying Egypt, is the basis of the concept of going down from Israel to Egypt (Gn. 12.10) and going up from Egypt to Israel (Gn. 13.1). From this, 'aliyyah' was applied to journeys from any country to Israel, whether for *pilgrimage on the occasion of the *Shalosh Regalim or for permanent settlement. Biblical law requires every male Israelite to make the 'aliyyat regel' (festival pilgrimage) and visit the Temple three times a year (Ex. 23.14). After the destruction of the Second Temple, such pilgrimages were made as voluntary acts of piety. With the *exile, the rabbis of the Talmudic period and subsequent ages went to great lengths to emphasize the importance of permanent settlement in Israel, apart from the duty of pilgrimage: "One should rather dwell in Israel even among a non-Jewish majority than outside Israel even in the midst of a Jewish majority" (T., 'A. Z. 4.3); "He who dwells in the land of Israel is regarded as having God ever with him, but he who dwells outside Israel is as one who has no God" ('A. Z. 4.5). Both statements stem from the aggadic discussion of the Mishnaic law that states that a man can force his family to follow him to settle in Israel, and if the wife refuses to do so, she loses her marriage settlement in case of divorce (Ket. 110b). Maimonides ruled that the refusal of a husband or wife to accompany his or her spouse to Erets Yisra'el constitutes grounds for divorce (Hilkhos Ishut 13). Faced with the problem of a sizable migration from Babylon to Israel, third-century Babylonian amora' R. Yehudah came out strongly against 'aliyyah' to Erets Yisra'el, going so far as to declare it a biblical transgression (Ket. 110b). Similarly during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when 'aliyyah' from England, France, and Germany was assuming considerable proportions as a result of the increasing insecurity of the Jews in those countries, tosafist R. Hayyim Kohen ruled that the religious duty to settle in the Holy Land no longer applied, since it was too difficult to observe all the additional commandments applicable there and the penalty for transgressing them was severe. Another reason 'aliyyah' was discouraged was because of the danger of travel. Rabbi Me'ir ben Baruch of Rothenburg (13th cent.) took a middle position and in a responsum sanctioned 'aliyyah' to Israel only if one's economic livelihood was assured there. Talmudic precept and later expositions of religious law kept alive the ideal of permanent settlement in Erets Yisra'el, exemplified by distinguished rabbis, Talmudists, kabbalists, and pietists (e.g., Nahmanides in 1266, 'Ovadyah Bertinoro in 1488, Yosef Karo and his followers in the 16th cent., Yesha'yahu Horowitz in 1621, Yehudah 'Hasid ha-Levi and his 1,500 followers in 1700, Mena'hem Mendel of Vitebsk and 300 'Hasidim in 1777). Dwelling in Erets Yisra'el was of profound mystical significance for the kabbalists, who cited the authority of the *Zohar. This tradition continued among the 'Hasidim of eastern Europe. There was also a steady 'aliyyah' from North Africa. With the growth of modern Zionism and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, religious factors and motivations have continued to play an important part in the mass 'aliyyah' of Jews from all parts of the world. Some of those immigrating to Israel, especially from Muslim lands (e.g., Yemen), were motivated by traditional messianism, and religious Jews saw the mass immigration as the fulfillment of the biblically prophesied ingathering of the *exiles. Classical nineteenth-century *Reform Judaism expunged references for a return to Zion from its ideology and liturgy, but this was revised in the mid-twentieth century. Some Orthodox Jews reject modern Zionism as an erroneous human attempt to force *redemption (see ZIONISM).

Ascent to the Reading of the Law. When the Torah is read in the synagogue (see QERYAT HA-TORAH), individuals are called up to the reading. This honor is known as an 'aliyyah'. In ancient times although one went down to conduct the prayers (the reading desk was recessed in the floor), the Torah scroll was read from an elevated platform (cf. Neh. 8.4); hence the use of the word 'aliyyah'. Only males over the age of thirteen are called up to the Torah in Orthodox congregations; women are now called up in non-Orthodox synagogues. The first 'aliyyah' is reserved for a kohen (see PRIESTHOOD), the second for a Levite. The third 'aliyyah' and the sixth are regarded as the most prestigious. Until the thirteenth century the person called up to the Torah read the portion himself; for those unable to do so, a reader was appointed. By the fourteenth century, a reader was appointed to recite the portion for all, so as not to put the ignorant to shame, and the person called up only recited the relevant blessings. Today a boy celebrating his bar mitsvah and a girl her bat mitsvah often read the portion to which they are called. In most rites persons are called up by their first name and patronymic. Often in non-Orthodox synagogues, people are called by the names of both parents.

ALKABEZ, SHELOMOH (1505–c.1576), kabbalist and poet; immigrated to Erets Yisra'el from Salonika. He was among the founders of the sixteenth-century kabbalistic community of *Safed. Alkabez was the student of R. Mosheh Albildah and R. Yosef *Taitazak in Salonika; his student and brother-in-law was R. Mosheh Cordovero. Before leaving Salonika in 1534, he delivered a sermon in which he explained that his impending trip was based upon a theory of national redemption. On his way to Erets Yisra'el he stayed in Nikopol and Adrianople. From Nikopol, where he celebrated Shavu'ot with R. Yosef Karo, Alkabez sent a letter to Salonika in which he described the revelation of a maggid to Karo and encouraged his readers to immigrate to Erets Yisra'el. On his way he also wrote a letter to Karo concerning kabbalistic matters (published at the end of his Berit ha-Levi).

Alkabez wrote several works, but only a few of them have survived. Two important works that concern his doctrine of the divinity are still in manuscript. His major works available in print are Menot ha-Levi (Venice, 1585), a commentary to the Book of Esther, which he presented as a wedding gift to his wife's family (1529); Ayyelet Ahavim (Venice, 1512), a commentary to the Song of Songs; Berit ha-Levi (Lemberg, 1863), a commentary to the Passover Haggadah; and Shores Yishai (Constantinople, 1561 or 1566), a commentary to Ruth, which he composed in Safed. Alkabez's thought influenced Cordovero and many other later kabbalists. In Ayyelet Ahavim, Alkabez included a biographical love story describing the kabbalist's intimate relationship with the Torah, his love of the study of Torah, the difficulties he encounters, his ideals, and his accomplishments. In Berit ha-Levi, he stresses the importance of the Zoharic corpus and attacks those who mock it. In his published prayers, he lyricizes the anguish of the exile from Spain and the desolate state of Erets Yisra'el. Alkabez's most celebrated prayer, the poem Lekha Dodi*, has been incorporated into the Friday evening service.

ALKALAI, YEHUDAH SHELOMOH HAI (1798–1878), forerunner of modern *Zionism and Sephardi rabbi of Zemun, near Belgrade. He was one of a small group of mid-nineteenth-century Orthodox rabbis who maintained that Jews had to take the initiative to settle in Erets Yisra'el for their own security and not await messianic auspices for the return to Zion. At first his ideas remained within traditional rabbinic yearnings for Zion and kabbalistic calculations focusing on 1840 (5600 in the Jewish calendar) as the messianic year. However, his growing awareness of contemporary historical developments led him to reinterpret the religious texts as calling on the Jewish people to resettle their ancestral homeland by natural means as a necessary prelude to the supernatural redemption. In a series of books and pamphlets and visits to the main capitals of Europe he outlined a program that anticipated the main ingredients of modern Zionism. He proposed the establishment of a representative assembly of Jewish religious and secular leaders, the adoption of Hebrew as the unifying national language, productivization of the settlers, diversification of the economy, and revival of the biblical tithe, whereby every Jew would contribute a tenth of his or her income toward the rebuilding of Zion. He failed at first to achieve any substantial support, encountering opposition from Jewish assimilationists who wished to integrate into the countries of their adoption and from pietists who regarded human intervention in the messianic consummation as blasphemy. In the 1860s and 1870s, during which period he emigrated to Erets Yisra'el (1874), he found his ideas shared by a small but growing number of individuals and groups that had become involved in the practical efforts to settle the land.

ALLEGORY. As a mode of interpretation of the Bible, allegory was a central and crucial step in the development of Jewish thought. The first significant allegorist in Jewish literature was Philo, who continued a tradition that reached back at least to Aristobulus of Paneas, of whose work only sparse quotations survive. Philo's extensive writings and commentaries present an allegorical reading of the Bible that uncovers its inner message of the ascent of the soul to higher, spiritual spheres. He nevertheless also upholds the literal meaning and validity of the commandments: "It is true that circumcision does indeed portray the excision of pleasure . . . but let us not on this account repeal the law laid down for circumcising."

Philo has been viewed as the inaugurator of scriptural philosophy, which was to remain the hallmark of Jewish philosophy until Spinoza. The problematic nature of allegorical interpretation is seen in the brief passage quoted above. How far can one go in attributing another, albeit deeper, meaning to scripture without invalidating the commandments of the Torah? As philosophy reentered the mainstream of rabbinic Judaism with Sa'adyah Ga'on, the legitimacy of the allegorical approach lay at the heart of numerous controversies in the Middle Ages. In the fourteenth century, Abba' Mari castigated the followers of Maimonides, who presumed to turn Abraham and Sarah into symbols of form and matter. Against the philosophers, the kabbalists held that "the prayers and rituals of the Torah had to be preserved as symbols of the transcendence that erupts into our world, not as allegories of ideas inherent in the world . . ." (Gershon Scholem, Origins of the Kabbalah).

Talmudic and Midrashic literature are replete with interpretations of scripture that are symbolical rather than allegorical. Thus according to Genesis Rabbah 70.8, Jacob's well symbolizes Zion, the Sanhedrin, or even the synagogue. Moses' raised hands, water, and the tree of life all signify the Torah (Mekhilta' de-Rabbi Yishma'e'l on "Be-Shallah"). The wicked are designated by the sun and the sea in the opening chapter of Ecclesiastes. This method of interpretation differs, however, from the sustained allegorical development by Philo, if only because the anthological nature of rabbinic literature does not permit extensive and systematic treatment. Rabbi Yishma'e'l ben Elisha, who held that "the Torah was speaking in the language of man," and his school would naturally have been more receptive to the allegorical method. The amoraic aggadah abounds in the type of exegesis cited above.

The connection between allegory and apologetics has been a subject of scholarly debate. It is obvious that allegory could serve as an effective tool for those interested in preserving a sacred text while altering its meaning at one and the same time. The implicit possibility of the annulment of the text accounts for some of the vehement opposition to allegorical interpretation.

ALMOSNINO FAMILY, a family of Spanish origin prominent in various Mediterranean communities, notably Salonika.

Mosheh ben Barukh Almosnino (c.1515–1580), rabbi, scholar, and homilist. He served various congregations in Salonika and worked to unite the many Jewish communities, though with little success. His book of homilies, Ma'amats Koah (Venice, 1588), is an important source for his philosophy. Of special interest is the section on the nature of life, which reflects his general spiritual outlook. He questions the extent to which the laws of justice, in halakhah and in ethics, apply for all times and in all circumstances. Thus the refusal to look at a married woman who is drowning he dismisses as foolish pietism and says that halakhah must be applied with common sense and wisdom. Insistence on performing even the greatest mitsvah at the cost of endangering life contradicts the basic law of preserving life. The laws of justice must be made to fit specific situations and cannot be viewed as ideal abstractions. Almosnino was the author of various compositions, including a commentary on Avot, a commentary on the Five Scrolls, a book of ethics (in Ladino), and responsa.

Yosef ben Yitshaq Almosnino (1642–1689), a descendant of Mosheh ben Barukh; rabbinical authority and kabbalist. Born in Salonika, Yosef served as rabbi in Belgrade. He was a supporter of Shabbateanism. Many of his works were lost in a fire.

AL-NAKAWA, YISRA'EL BEN YOSEF (died 1391), Spanish scholar; martyred in his native Toledo. He belonged to an important Jewish family from Spain that subsequently immigrated to northern Africa and Turkey. He wrote the ethical work Menorat ha-Ma'or, which was probably the basis for the better-known work of the same name by Yitshaq *Aboab. The book deals with practical aspects of religious life and incorporates a wealth of maxims gathered from Talmudic aggadah, later rabbinic sources, and the Zohar. It has twenty chapters and begins with an acrostic poem based on the author's name. Each chapter also begins with an acrostic poem based on the name Yisra'el. The book was printed in 1578, and an abridgment was published in 1593 in Kraków under the title Menorat Zahav Kullah. A new edition, based on the single surviving manuscript of the work that is in Oxford, was published by Hyman Enelow (4 vols. [New York, 1929–1932]). A number of piyyutim written by Al-Nakawa have survived.

ALPHABET, HEBREW. The Hebrew alphabet is an offshoot of the Canaanite alphabet, the first purely alphabetical script. In the course of its history, Hebrew employed two distinct forms of this alphabet. The first was the ancient Hebrew alphabet, used until the Babylonian exile. Even after the exile, this script appeared on practically all Jewish coins, throughout some Dead Sea manuscripts, and in other Dead Sea manuscripts for the writing of divine names only. In general use, the ancient Hebrew alphabet was replaced by an eastern Aramaic script, itself derived from the Canaanite alphabet; only the Samaritans retained the ancient Hebrew alphabet. In the first two centuries CE, the Aramaic alphabet (ketav ashuri) developed into the specifically Jewish square script (ketav merubba'; see SCRIPT, HEBREW). At various times cursive forms developed locally (e.g., *Rashi script). Jews used the Hebrew alphabet extensively in writing such vernacular languages as Aramaic, Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Berber, Spanish, Provençal, Italian, medieval and modern German, Judeo-Spanish, and Yiddish. Until modern times religious Jews avoided using gentile scripts, which were said to trouble the spiritual purity of the eyes.

The order of the Hebrew alphabet was apparently fixed from the start and was employed as a literary device in alphabetic acrostical psalms. It was the Greeks who first conceived of using the letters of the alphabet as numerical signs (the Israelites used special number symbols). The method was adopted in the first centuries CE by Jews and is still extensively employed. It gave rise to gimatriyyah*, in which the numerical values of the letters of a word are added together and compared with those of other words for exegetical, homiletic, and mystical uses. The method of inserting the letters in Torah scrolls is minutely regulated by halakhah and custom; of special interest are the tagin* (crowns) placed over seven of the letters. The religious significance of the Hebrew alphabet is mainly bound up with the writing of divine names. While the Tetragrammaton must not be written at all under ordinary circumstances, and when written by a Torah scribe, only after proper ritual purification, all other names, substitutes, and abbreviations for the divine name are also holy and must not be defiled or destroyed.

At first, vowels were not indicated. In the course of time, certain letters (y, v, ', h) also came to serve as vowel indicators. This use was gradually extended to cases where there was already a vowel, so that y came to mark i and e and v to mark u and o. This system of matres lectionis is only partly, and rather inconsistently, used in standard Hebrew Bibles. The occurrence of defective and full spellings is regulated by tradition, and failure to observe it can invalidate a Torah scroll or a divorce document. In the seventh through the ninth century, various systems arose—one of which subsequently came into general use—for indicating vowels by the addition of signs above, below, and (rarely) inside the letters. This complement to the Hebrew alphabet did not, however, become an integral part of it. Vowel signs (nequdot) do not appear in Torah scrolls; they are not used in documents, nor do they appear in most books for practical use (see VOCALIZATION).

Today the way in which the Bible text is vocalized is held to be of absolute authority in Orthodox circles. Other students of the Bible are willing to accept, for exegetical purposes, alternative vocalizations of the same consonantal skeleton, which are possible with many Hebrew words.

Most of the basic concepts of the alphabet used by Jewish mystics were established in the Midrash. The statement (Avot 5.1) that the universe was created by ten divine utterances postulates that language is first and foremost a divine tool of creation rather than a human means of communication. The Talmud attributes to Bezalel ben Uri, the builder of the Tabernacle in the desert (Ber. 55a), the "knowledge of the letters by which the heaven and earth were created," which he used in order to create God's earthly abode in harmony with the celestial one. The Midrash (Gn. Rab. 1.1) states that God "was consulting the Torah and creating the world," implying that the linguistic entity preceded the material and spiritual components of the universe, serving as a blueprint of the divine endeavor.

Language, which for the Midrash is the Hebrew language, is thus conceived as an aspect of divine wisdom. It is, therefore, as infinite as its source and cannot be pinned down to a specific layer of meaning that will exhaust its message. Every verse includes within it an infinite number of meanings and divine messages, which serve humanity for eternity. Every generation and every scholar can and should find in it new messages (all of which were revealed to Moses on Mount Sinai). Judaism in late antiquity did not hesitate, therefore, to present several, or even dozens, of different interpretations of every verse. To claim that one interpretation was the true one would amount to limiting divine wisdom.

The meaning of language, and especially that of the alphabet, was changed in a revolutionary manner. If God created the universe by the utterance of several verses, the power of creation could not be just the literal meaning of yehi or, "Let there be light." It could, in the same way, be in the sound of these words, in the number of letters, in the numerical value of these letters, in the shapes of these letters, or any other aspect of the semiotic message. When vocalization marks and musical signs (te'amim) were added to the Hebrew biblical verses, their shapes and names became aspects of that semiotic message; the same is true of the crowns that adorn the Hebrew letters. The order of the letters in a verse can be changed in order to reveal new layers of meaning, as can acronyms*, enabling the hermeneutic interpreter to use dozens of methods to change every word into every other.

These concepts developed gradually in late antiquity, increasing in importance. By the seventh century there were treatises dedicated completely to such interpretations, like the Alphabet of Rabbi 'Aqiva*, which is completely based on the interpretation of the shapes of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. The use of gimatriyyah*, notarikon*, and temurah (interchange of letters) became increasingly frequent at the beginning of the Middle Ages. The medieval mystics inherited these methods, at least in their essential forms, as a part of their tradition, and developed them in a radical manner.

Earlier mystics, authors of Heikhalot and Merkavah literature, were relatively uninterested in language mysticism. The main source of medieval speculations on this subject was the Sefer Yetsirah*.

Language mysticism became central to the circles of mystics who emerged in Europe in the second half of the twelfth century. The earliest work of the Kabbalah, Sefer ha-Bahir*, includes numerous sections dedicated to the interpretation of the shapes of the letters, their vocalization marks, and their musical signs (though gimatriyyah* plays only a small role). A significant part of Sefer ha-Bahir can be read as a commentary on the alphabet. Other schools, especially the Iyyun* circle (the main text of which is Sefer ha-'Iyyun), identify mystical speculation with the method of letter combinations contained in the Sefer Yetsirah. Many early mystics wrote commentaries on the Sefer Yetsirah, in which the letters and language are conceived as keys to universal and divine mysteries.

One of the most radical expressions of the medieval concept of the alphabet is a work by R. *El'azar ben Yehudah of Worms, Sefer ha-Hokhmah. It presents seventy-three gates of wisdom, which are the different methods by which each of the verses of the Bible can and should be interpreted. This work is one of the strongest expressions of the belief in the infinity of semiotic messages contained in every sacred text. Many medieval kabbalists developed similar systems. The most influential expression of this attitude to language can be found in the works of Avraham ben Shemu'el *Abulafia.

Two central Hebrew mystical works of the fourteenth century deal almost exclusively with the concept of language as a key to divine mysteries. One is Baddei ha-'Aron by R. Shem Tov ibn Ga'on (the work was written in Jerusalem and Safed between 1315 and 1325), and the other is Sefer ha-Temunah, an anonymous work of this period. In Baddei ha-'Aron the author analyzed the central aspects of language and related them directly to the various realms within the divine world. Sefer ha-Temunah is based on the images of the letters, which are regarded as the images of God himself.

Not all kabbalists attached the same importance to the alphabet and to linguistic speculation. These played a minor role among the kabbalists in Provence, in the Gerona circle, and even in the Zohar itself. An important section of the Zohar discusses the shapes of the letters, yet more often than not these elements are marginal. Even the use of the numerical value of words and verses is secondary in the Zohar to other methods of homiletical interpretation. Later kabbalists also differ in their attitude to these methods.

ALPHABET OF BEN SIRA, Hebrew work of the geonic period, preserved in several different recensions. It recounts in a highly parodical manner some frivolous episodes loosely woven around the figure of Ben Sira, who is said to have been born to Jeremiah's daughter, impregnated by her own father's semen. Some of the episodes incorporate alphabetically arranged aphorisms, which Ben Sira supposedly composed and which gave the work its name, while others include his responses to King Nebuchadnezzar's questions on such varied subjects as the reason why farts were created, the causes of animosity between cats and dogs, and the sexual habits of ravens.

ALROY, DAVID (12th cent.), pseudo-*Messiah. He succeeded his father, Shelomoh, as leader of a messianic movement in Kurdistan with a widespread Jewish following. His true name was Menaḥem ben Shelomoh. His adopted name was designed to bolster his messianic claims, since the provenance of a Messiah from the lineage of King David forms an integral part of the Jewish messianic tradition. Alroy's dramatic career was noted by the twelfth-century Jewish traveler Benjamin of Tudela, in a derogatory Muslim account by Samau'al al-Magribi, and in a novel The Wondrous Tale of Alroy (1839) by Benjamin Disraeli. Alroy launched a campaign to reach the Holy Land from Mosul in Iraq. He dispatched emissaries to Baghdad to alert the Jews to prepare for their miraculous return to Erets Yisra'el. When they awaited deliverance on their rooftops in vain, the official Jewish leadership grew alarmed and pronounced their opposition to the movement. Muslim authorities also opposed Alroy. He was assassinated around 1160, but his charismatic personality guaranteed the survival of a mystique surrounding his memory, particularly in Iran. A group of his followers (Menaḥemites) in Azerbaijan continued to believe in his Messiahship after his death.

ALSHEKH, MOSHEH (c.1507–1600), rabbinical scholar and Bible exegete. Born in Adrianople, Turkey, in 1498 to parents who had fled Spain in 1492, he studied in Salonika under Yosef *Taitazak and Yosef *Karo, later settling in Safed, where he served as dayyan in Karo's court. His responsa were published by his son Ḥayyim in Vienna in 1605 and heavily influenced the glosses of Shabbetai ben Me'ir ha-Kohen on the Shulḥan 'Arukh. Apart from his responsa, Alshekh is best known for his voluminous homiletic commentaries on the Bible that were greatly influenced by Yitshaq Abravanel (see ABRAVANEL FAMILY). Four of these commentaries were published during the author's lifetime: Ḥavatsalet ha-Sharon on Daniel (Constantinople, 1563), Shoshanat ha-'Amaqim on Song of Songs (Venice, 1591), Rav Peninim on Proverbs (Venice, 1592), and Torat Mosheh on Genesis (Constantinople, 1593). Eight more of Alshekh's Bible commentaries were published after his death by his son. His commentaries tend to the allegorical as a compromise between the rationalist and esoteric approaches to textual commentary. Alshekh was one of the first commentators to popularize the idea of four levels of interpretation associated with the acronym pardes*.

ALTAR, structure upon which *sacrifices were offered to the deity. The Hebrew term mizbeah is derived from z v h (slaughter). Altars in the Bible are divided into two types: temporary or private altars erected on specific occasions and for specific purposes, and temple altars. To the former class belong Noah's altar (Gn. 8.20) and the altars built by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Gn. 12.7, 26.25, 33.20) as they traversed the land of Canaan, worshipping God as they went. In this category, too, are the altars erected by Moses following the victory over Amalek (Ex. 17.15) and at Mount Sinai when the covenant ceremony, including the sacrificial meal, was performed (Ex. 20.21–23). Such altars occasionally achieved some renown and were recalled by later generations; an example is the altar built by Joshua on Mount Ebal, upon which he inscribed a copy of the teaching of Moses (Jos. 8.30–32, as commanded in Dt. 27. 1–8). At other times altars would be put to their designated use and thereafter be forgotten. Such was the case, for instance, with the altar erected by Elijah on Mount Carmel in order to compete with the priests of Baal and demonstrate the lordship of God. According to the law in Exodus 20.21–23, altars were to be made of earth; stone altars were permitted provided that the stones not be hewn, since this would necessitate the use of the sword, an instrument of war. The sanctity of the altar occasionally made it a haven for manslaughter, who would seize the four "horns" of the altar and escape arrest; biblical law stipulates, however, that the intentional killer not be allowed this form of *asylum (Ex. 21.14; 1 Kgs. 1.50–53, 2.28–34).

Temple altars were designed to be permanent fixtures, and the sacrificial worship performed in a temple would be of an institutionalized and routine character. Furthermore, although individuals might occasionally sacrifice upon private, local altars scattered about the countryside, certain individual offerings, such as firstlings, offerings in fulfillment of vows, tithes, and the pilgrimage festival offerings had to be made on temple altars.

Local altars, subsequently called *high places, were prohibited by biblical (Deuteronomic) law, and once the Tabernacle was built, private field altars were outlawed (Lv. 17.3–7). According to the Book of Deuteronomy and the historical literature associated with it, the central sacrificial altar of the Temple was the sole legitimate place of worship (Dt. 12.5–14) from the moment the Temple was erected.

In addition to the sacrificial altars that existed at each of the minor Israelite temples, the sacrificial altar of the Tabernacle in the wilderness (described in Ex. 27.1–8; see also 29.38–46) and that of Solomon's Temple (1 Kgs. 8.64; 2 Kgs. 16.14; Ez. 9.2) are the most important of the temple altars in the Bible. The former was designed to be portable; it was made of wood overlaid with bronze, measured 5 × 5 × 3 cubits, and was located in the Tabernacle courtyard. The latter stood in the Temple court in Jerusalem. It too was of bronze and according to 2 Chronicles 4.1 was many times the size of the former.

Both the Tabernacle and Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem had another altar as well; the inner altar, used for offering incense (Ex. 30.1–10; 1 Kgs. 7.48). It was of greater sanctity than the sacrificial altar: it was of gold, not bronze; it stood inside the Temple, not in the court; access to it was restricted to the high priest; and it was employed as part of the daily inner ritual of the divine abode. Incense was offered upon it in the morning and evening.

Upon their return from the Babylonian exile, the Jews erected an altar before rebuilding the Temple, indicating that the restoration of regular sacrificial worship took precedence over the Temple itself.

In Second Temple times, the sacrificial altar was the focus of great rejoicing on the annual celebration of Sukkot. The sacrificial legislation of the Bible presumes that both altars—the inner and the outer—along with the Ark are contaminated by the wrongdoings and impurities of Israel. They therefore need to be purged regularly so that the divine presence, believed to abide in the Temple, does not depart. Thus, in addition to their primary function in the offering of sacrifices and incense, they figure prominently in all rituals of atonement (i.e., purification of the sacred precincts). The crucial role of the altar in securing atonement was recognized by rabbinic tradition as well, and after the destruction of the Second Temple, this role was replaced by charity. The table on which meals were taken in the Jewish home was considered a substitute for the altar (Ber. 55a; T., Sot. 15.11–13) and many customs derived from this identification. The detailed description of the altar found in the Bible served as the basis for allegorical and mystical elaboration in later aggadic and kabbalistic literature.

ALTER FAMILY. See GER.

AL TIQREI (אל תיקרי; do not read), Midrashic device by which biblical phrases are reinterpreted by slight changes, such as revocalization. The object was not to change the meaning of a phrase but to add extra meaning. For example, the end of the Talmudic tractate Be-rakhot (64a) quotes the verse "And all your children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of your children" (Is. 54.13) and states "Read not [al tiqrei] 'your children' (banayikh) but 'your builders' (bonayikh), namely the sages."

AMALEKITES, ancient nomadic people living in the Sinai desert and the southern portions of the land of Canaan. According to the biblical account (Gn. 36.9–12), they were of Edomite stock. At Rephidim, the children of Israel, on their way from Egypt to Mount Sinai, were treacherously attacked by the Amalekites, whom they repelled after a battle of varying fortunes. Thereafter the Amalekites were regarded as Israel's inveterate foes, whose annihilation became a sacred obligation (Ex. 17.8–16; Dt. 25.17–19). This is recalled liturgically on the Sabbath preceding Purim (see SABBATHS, SPECIAL). Saul's failure to fulfill the commandment of total annihilation (1 Sm. 15) led to the annulment of the rights of his descendants to succeed to the throne of Israel. The Amalekites suffered defeat at the hands of David (2 Sm. 8.12) and were finally wiped out during the reign of King Hezekiah of Judah (8th cent. BCE; 1 Chr. 4.43). Rabbinic literature dwells on Amalek's role as Israel's permanent archenemy. *Haman is said to be descended from the Amalekites, his cognomen "Agagi" taken to indicate his descent from Agag, king of Amalek (1 Sm. 15.8). Whenever the Jews failed to abide by the covenant, the Amalekites are said to have prevailed over them. Only after the final destruction of the Amalekites will God and his throne be complete.

AMEN (אָמֵן; "So be it"), expression occurring fourteen times in the Bible and signifying assent to an oath (e.g., Dt. 27.15), agreement or corroboration (e.g., 1 Kgs. 1.36), or blessing and praise of God (Ps. 41.14). The term was also used as a public response after the prayers and blessings of the priests and Levites (cf. Neh. 8.6; 1 Chr. 16.36; Ps. 106.48), although in the Temple it was part of a larger formula (Ps. 72.18–19). In synagogue practice, amen is the response to every benediction, and in Sephardi synagogues, the amen response is also interjected at many other parts of the service. According to the rabbis, it is obligatory to say amen on hearing a blessing, and the person who says it is regarded as if he had recited the blessing himself, just as a person who says amen after an oath is regarded as having sworn the oath himself (Shev. 29a). Amen is rarely said by the person who himself makes the benediction. The rabbis suggested homiletically that the word is derived from the initials of the phrase El melek ne'eman, "God, faithful king" (San. 111a). The term passed into Christian and to some extent Islamic usage.

'AM HA-'ARETS (אֶמֶת הָאָרֶץ; people of the land), a term that in biblical usage referred to natives of a land (whether Israelite or non-Israelite) or (in the plural) to foreign populations. In postexilic biblical texts (Ezra and Nehemiah), the term was applied to the inhabitants of Palestine who were hostile to the returning exiles and lax in faith and observance. During the tannaitic period, 'am ha-'arets was applied to one who disregarded that which was considered essential to religious piety; thus, shifts in the definition of religious piety led to changing characterizations of an 'am ha-'arets. Prior to the destruction of the Second Temple, 'am ha-'arets generally referred to a person neglectful in the observance of positive commandments, particularly the laws of tithes and ritual purity. Groups, the members of which were called haverim, were formed by those who wished to set themselves apart from the 'amei ha-'arets in order to guard against consumption of untithed produce or contraction of ritual impurity.

A second meaning of 'am ha-'arets—namely, an ignoramus—came to the fore after the destruction of the Temple. Today the term 'am ha-'arets connotes one who lacks knowledge of Jewish ritual and tradition.

'AMIDAH (אָמִידָה; Standing), the main statutory prayer in Jewish public and private worship since the destruction of the Second Temple; it is recited standing. According to the rabbis, all of the prescribed synagogue services that were seen as replacements for former obligatory services in the Temple (Shaharit, Minḥah, Ma'ariv on weekdays, together with Musaf on Shabbat and festivals and Ne'ilah on Yom Kippur; Ber. 26b) incorporate the 'Amidah in one of its forms as their central feature. Rabbinic literature referred to the 'Amidah as the She-monah 'Esreh (Eighteen), based on the original number of weekday benedictions it contained, although today, with additions from the Babylonian rite, it contains nineteen benedictions. The 'Amidah, as the (obligatory) prayer par excellence, was also referred to simply as Tefillah or, in Aramaic, as Tseluta' (both words meaning prayer). Even if the exact wording was subject to change until modern times, the sages shaped the 'Amidah as the institutionalized "standing" before God, which enables individuals and congregations to express praise and pleas before God. The 'Amidah is said silently by the private worshiper and, in the morning and afternoon congregational services (in the presence of a minyan), repeated aloud by the reader. The opening of the 'Amidah consists of three blessings; these are followed by twelve or thirteen blessings on weekdays and one on holidays; the 'Amidah closes with three final blessings. Certain changes are made according to the Jewish calendar, including variations for the seasons and additions for the 'Aseret Yemei Teshuvah and for public fasts.

The 'Amidah opens with *Avot (Fathers), praising the God of the patriarchs (in Reform tradition, the matriarchs as well) and their descendants. The Avot is followed by the Gevurot (Almighty), an address to God who creates eternal life and resurrects the dead. The Qedu-shat ha-Shem (The Holiness of the Name) follows. It is an equation of God's holiness with his name, represented by the Tetragrammaton, which was revealed to Israel and in whose holiness worshipers share by repeating the divine name in its substitute forms in every rabbinic benediction. The opening sentence is replaced by the *Qedushah, in differing forms, as the climax of holiness in the congregational service, in the reader's repetition of the 'Amidah.

The first of the intermediary benedictions for weekdays is Da'at (Knowledge), which addresses God as the one who enables people to distinguish, to understand, and to know. In the evening 'Amidah for the conclusion of Sabbaths and festivals, the *Havdalah blessing is added; it refers to the need for knowledge to distinguish between the different kinds of times in the Jewish calendar. Next is Teshuvah (*Repentance), a request for God to bring the worshiper back to him; Selihah (Forgiveness), a prayer for forgiveness for sins and transgressions; *Ge'ullah (Redemption), a prayer for redemption from suffering; Refu'ah (Healing), a request for the healing of the sick of the people of Israel, which may include a private prayer specifying a particular individual; and Birkat ha-Shanim (Blessing of Years), a blessing for the seasons (thus a request for crops) and for the material prosperity of the individual and the congregation. The next section deals with subjects of public and/or national interest. Qibbutz Galuyyot (Ingathering of the *Exiles) deals with the return of the exiles to Erets Yisra'el as one of the conditions of national existence. Hashavat ha-Mishpat (Restoration of Righteous Jurisdiction) asks for a return to divine law and life according to God's rulings. *Birkat ha-Minim (Blessing of the Heretics) concerns humbling the heretics and other destructive elements in the life of a congregation (early rites included mention of the Notserim, asking God to mark a border between rabbinic and Jewish-Christian communities). 'Al ha-Tsaddiqim (For the Pious) asks for the reward of pious contributions to public life. Binyan Yerushalayim (Building Jerusalem) is a plea for the restoration of the divine presence in the Temple and of the kingdom of the House of David by the rebuilding of Jerusalem. Mashiah ben David (Messiah, Son of David) is a prayer for the restoration of the Davidic dynasty and the coming of the Messiah. This benediction, attested in the first millennium of rabbinic prayer only in the Babylonian rite, which stresses the subject of the preceding benediction, raises the number of benedictions to nineteen. In nineteenth-century Reform Judaism both benedictions were reformulated. Shome'a Tefillah (Hear Our Prayers), a plea concluding the intermediary section, expresses the confidence that God is the one who hears prayer. The single intermediate blessing on Sabbaths and festivals (Qedushat ha-Yom) refers to the particular nature of the day in question. The Ro'sh ha-Shanah Musaf contains three intermediate blessings.

Every 'Amidah concludes with three benedictions, the first of which is the *Avodah (Worship). This prayer for the return of God's presence to the place of the Temple to restore biblical forms of worship was altered or omitted in Reform Judaism. An insertion for Ro'sh Hodesh and Hol ha-Mo'ed, *Ya'aleh ve-Yavo', connects the remembrance of the merits of the ancestors with a plea for mercy. Hoda'ah (Thanksgiving) is a benediction of thanksgiving for God's mercies, with special insertions for Purim and Hanukkah, *Al ha-Nissim. Shalom (Peace) is a prayer for peace alluding to the *Birkat ha-Kohanim (Nm. 6.24-26), which may be recited in public prayer by the descendants of the priestly families on special occasions or read by the reader before the repetition of this benediction resembling the Temple service. Even though the 'Amidah is called "the petitionary prayer," its benedictions express confidence in redemption. Although the 'Amidah is obligatory for the individual, the first person plural is used throughout, making the 'Amidah the prayer of all Israel; private petitions may be inserted, usually at its end.

AMITTAI, synagogal poets from Oria, in southern Italy.

Amittai (c.800 CE) is credited with the composition of a number of poems in the style of early Palestinian piyyutim, some of which were adopted into the Italian and German rites.

Amittai ben Shefatyah (late 9th cent. CE), grandson of Amittai and believed to be the author of most of the forty piyyutim that are connected with the Amittai name, was one of the major payyetanim of the early Italian-Ashkenazi school of Hebrew liturgical poetry. His penitential prayer Adonai, Adonai, El Raḥum ve-Ḥannun has been incorporated into the Ne'ilah service for Yom Kippur. He also wrote dirges lamenting the anti-Jewish outbreaks in his time (in particular the compulsory conversions enforced under Byzantine emperor Basil I), and several of his poems poignantly express the Jewish longing for Zion.

'AMMI BAR NATAN (fl. 279 CE), amora' and disciple of R. *Yohanan bar Nappaha' who headed the *Tiberias academy after Yohanan's death in 279. With his colleague R. *Assi, 'Ammi regularly toured Palestine to encourage religious study. 'Ammi was responsible for the Jewish judiciary and strove to ensure that religious judges (dayyanim) be chosen on their merit and not—as had been the tendency—for their wealth. A righteous man who cared for the needy (Shab. 10a) and looked after the interests of proselytes (Y., Hag. 1.7), 'Ammi traveled to Palmyra to intercede with Queen Zenobia on behalf of a certain Jew held there as captive (Y., Ter. 8). Among his famous dicta were: "One should not trouble the community too much" (Ta'an. 14b) and "There is no death without sin, no suffering without iniquity" (Shab. 55a).

AMMON AND MOAB, two neighboring countries of ancient Israel, to the east of the Jordan River and the Dead Sea, in what is today the kingdom of Jordan. (The capital of Ammon was situated in present-day Amman.) Biblical tradition recognizes a close relationship between Israel and these two nations, as they are traced back to the incestuous union of Lot, Abraham's nephew, and his two daughters (Gen. 19.30–38). The cultures of Israel, Ammon, and Moab shared much in common. For example, the Ammonite, Moabite, and Hebrew languages are dialects of the Canaanite language and were mutually intelligible. Ammon (whose chief deity was Milcom) and Moab (whose patron deity was Chemosh) developed as independent kingdoms in Transjordan sometime in the Early Iron Age (c.13th/12th cent. BCE) and often were at odds with the various tribes of Israel. The earliest Ammonite king recorded in the Bible is Nahash, who besieged the Israelite town Jabesh-gilead and was subsequently defeated by Saul (1 Sm. 11), who also defeated Moab (1 Sm. 14.47–48). Soon after Israel became a monarchy, David conquered these two countries and incorporated them into his kingdom. Probably after Solomon's death, Ammon and Moab became independent once more. Later, Omri, king of Israel, subjugated Moab, but within a few decades Moab declared its independence. This event is detailed in an important epigraphic remain, the Mesha Stele (or Moabite Stone, today in the Louvre), written by the Moabite king Mesha (2 Kgs. 3) around 850 BCE. Both Ammon and Moab became Assyrian vassals during the time of Tiglath-pileser III (7th cent. BCE). Because of the tensions that dominated the histories of Israel and its two neighbors, the Book of Deuteronomy legislates that "No Ammonite or Moabite shall be admitted into the congregation of the Lord" (Deut. 23.4). This is interpreted to mean that an Israelite woman cannot marry a man from these two countries. However, it appears that an Ammonite or Moabite woman could become an Israelite, since Ruth was a Moabite who adopted the religion of her mother-in-law Naomi (Ru. 1), married Boaz, and eventually became the great-grandmother of David. In post-biblical times, the Talmud relaxed the attitude toward Ammonites and Moabites, and R. Yehoshu'a ben Hananyah permitted the conversion of their males on the grounds that the original people could no longer be distinguished; even priests were permitted to marry the daughter of such a convert (Yev. 77a).

AMNON OF MAINZ. See U-NETANNEH TOQEF.

AMORA' (Aram.; אֲמֹרָא; speaker, interpreter), name given to a rabbinic teacher in both Palestine and Babylonia during the Talmudic period. In the early amoraic period (c.220–260) there is often little distinction between the tannaitic (see TANNA') and amoraic methods. As the amoraic period continued, however, the amora'im began to regard the Mishnah and other tannaitic sources as the authoritative basis for their own rulings. Support from a tannaitic source strengthened the opinion of an amora'; an objection weakened it and forced the amora' to cite a tannaitic tradition of equal or greater authority or to reinterpret the tannaitic source of the objection. Furthermore, as the amora'im progressed, their traditions preserved more discussions of issues rather than short dictums expressing a norm.

The basic methods of Palestinian and Babylonian amora'im were similar. Nevertheless, Palestinian amora'im tended to interpret the Mishnah and other tannaitic sources closer to their plain meaning than the Babylonian amora'im. This was a result of their proximity to the world in which the tannaitic tradition had grown. For the Babylonians, much of the tannaitic tradition was imported from Palestine and grafted onto a different social, economic, and religious reality. Therefore, the Babylonian amora'im sometimes interpreted their tannaitic sources less in accord with their simple meaning.

The Babylonian amoraic period extended across seven generations, to approximately 530 CE, while the Palestinian amoraic period ended in approximately 450 CE. This explains, to some degree, the larger scope of Babylonian Talmudic law and lore. It may also explain why the redaction of the Talmud Bavli seems more polished than the less accessible formulation of the Talmud Yerushalmi. This, however, is subject to considerable current academic debate (see Jacob Neusner's The Formation of the Babylonian Talmud).

Among the best-known Babylonian amora'im are Rav and Shemu'el (1st generation); R. Yehudah and R. Huna' (2d generation); Rabbah, R. Yosef, R. Nahman, R. Hilda', and R. Sheshet (3d generation); Rava' and Abbaye' (4th generation); R. Papa' and Ravina' (5th generation); R. Ashi (6th generation); and Mar bar R. Ashi (7th generation). The best-known Palestinian amora'im are R. Hiyya', R. Hoshia'yah, and R. Yehoshu'a ben Levi (1st generation); R. Yoḥanan and R. Shim'on ben Laqish (2d generation); R. Abbahu, R. El'azar ben Pedat, R. 'Ammi, R. Assi, and R. Ze'ira' (3d generation); R. Yonah and R. Yosei bar Abin (4th generation); and R. Mana' and Yosei bar Abin II (5th generation).

Palestinian amora'im are distinguished in title from Babylonian amora'im. The former are called "Rabbi," indicating complete judiciary competence in all matters of law, whereas those in Babylonia are called "Rav." Babylonian rabbinic authorities did not possess the right to judge cases involving fines. The two groups kept in contact through the frequent visits of scholars specially appointed to bring the teachings of Erets Yisra'el to Babylonia and vice versa; some rabbis moved from one rabbinic center to the other. There is even some evidence of occasional hostility between amora'im in Erets Yisra'el and Babylonian newcomers. Nevertheless, both Talmuds reflect considerable interaction between Babylonia and Erets Yisra'el.

The great centers of amoraic instruction in Erets Yisra'el were in Tiberias, Sepphoris, and Caesarea; in Babylonia, in Nehardea, Sura, Pumbedita, and Maḥoza. The total number of amora'im mentioned in the sources exceeds three thousand.

AMORITES, early Semitic inhabitants of Palestine. The name refers to a particular people (e.g., Gn. 15.19–21; Jos. 10.5; Jgs. 3.5) that was annihilated or assimilated by the Israelites or, collectively, to the group (e.g., Dt. 1.27; 2 Sam. 21.2; Am. 2.9–10) of Canaanite nations that were indigenous to the land of Canaan before the Israelite conquest. The word is derived from the Akkadian amurru (western), which, beginning with the Old Akkadian period, specifically is used to designate uncivilized "westerners" (i.e., non-Mesopotamian barbarians from the west, unacquainted with such amenities as permanent housing, eating cooked meat, agriculture, or municipal government). In approximately 2000 BCE, the Amorites invaded Babylonia, at first contributing to the fall of the Ur III dynasty and later on establishing their own bases of power in such places as Mari and finally the first dynasty of Babylon (see BABYLONIA; HAMMURABI). The vassal kingdom of Amurru in Syria in the fourteenth century BCE contributed some eighteen of the Amarna Letters (EA 60–62, 156–161, 371). Much effort has been exerted by scholars to reconstruct Amorite as an independent dialect within the Northwest Semitic languages (i.e., exclusive of the Canaanite and Aramaic subgroups). The data are based almost exclusively on proper names, and there is no possibility of contextual corroboration.

In Talmudic times, the Amorites were regarded as the prototypes of the early Canaanite population and were viewed as the chief bearers of a false faith. Evil customs and superstitions were known as "the ways of the Amorites" (Shab. 67a), and the rabbis applied the name Amorites to all idolaters.

AMOS (8th cent. BCE), the earliest of the literary prophets. He lived in the period before the Assyrian invasions that destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel. Born in the Judean town of Tekoa, south of Bethlehem, Amos prophesied during the reigns of Uzziah, king of Judah, and Jeroboam II, king of Israel (1.1). Amos was a pastoralist and an agriculturalist who experienced five visions from God, which prompted him to announce the downfall of the northern kingdom of Israel and the death of its king. Speaking at Bethel, the royal sanctuary of the northern kingdom, he defended his prophetic calling, dissociating himself from the professional prophets and soothsayers until he was evicted by the high priest Amaziah (7.10–19). The prophet shocked his audience by proclaiming the impending doom of the then flourishing nation. His message emphasized the moral decay of the northern kingdom, especially its mistreatment of the poor, hungry, and landless. Amos was a master of rhetoric and ironic reversal. Thus, his oracles against the foreign nations, designed to gain the approval of his listeners, culminate in a condemnation of the northern kingdom of Israel (chaps. 1–2). He reversed the popular conception of the "Day of the Lord" by portraying it as a day of darkness and judgment rather than of light and bliss (5.18–20). Amos maintained that of all nations, Israel was the most vulnerable to divine retribution because of its status as a "chosen people" (3.2), which had been widely understood as conferring unconditional benefits and security (cf. 2.9–11, 9.7–10). Amos also proclaimed the important new principles of the primacy of morality over the cult and the decisive role of social morality in determining national destiny (5.21–27). He foretold destruction, but his prophecy ends with a description of Israel's future restoration under a Davidic monarch (9.11–15). According to the Talmud (Mak. 24a), all 613 commandments of the Bible were summed up in Amos's single dictum "Seek me and live!" (5.4).

The Book of Amos is the third book of the Minor Prophets. It contains four major sections. The first contains the prophet's condemnations of a series of foreign nations as well as of Judah and Israel (chaps. 1–2). The series is designed to win the assent of the audience by condemning Israel's enemies and then to shock the listeners by culminating with a condemnation of Israel itself. The second section (chaps. 3–4) identifies God as the one who brings about Israel's punishment. Here Amos condemns the upper-class women of Samaria and levels a sharp castigation at the cult. The third section (chaps. 5–6) exhorts the audience to seek the Lord and live (this is the only ray of hope that the prophet sees until the end of the book), while describing further the judgment that will come upon the people if they do not. The final section (chaps. 7–9) provides the legitimation for the prophet's message by describing five visions in which he perceived God's commission to speak as a prophet. The book ends with the announcement of the future restoration of the "fallen booth of David" (9.11) along with blessings of bounty and security for Israel. The presence of a superscription in Amos 1.1 and a narrative concerning the prophet's eviction from the sanctuary at Bethel in 7.10–17 indicates that someone other than the prophet assembled the book in its present form, perhaps during the reign of King Josiah of Judah who destroyed the sanctuary at Bethel.

'AMRAM BAR SHESHNA' (9th cent.), ga'on; head of a breakaway faction of the *Sura academy and later, perhaps, of the mother institution. A number of his responsa have been preserved, but he is best known for his prayer book, the Seder Rav 'Amram, which he edited in response to the request of a scholar in Barcelona. This, the earliest known comprehensive Jewish prayer book, contained both liturgical texts and halakhic instructions and was extremely influential in medieval Europe. Its popularity led scholars and copyists to expand the text by inserting passages (many of them based on geonic responsa) dealing with related topics and to revise it in accordance with liturgical customs current in their own communities, as a result of which it is frequently impossible to establish the original text with any degree of certainty. Seder Rav 'Amram has been edited by Daniel Goldschmidt (1971) with an English translation by D. Hedegard (weekday prayers, 1951) and T. Kronholm (Sabbath prayers, 1974).

AMULETS (Heb. qemi'im), objects worn as charms against evil (sickness, bad luck, the "evil eye," etc.). An amulet usually contains Bible verses that refer to protection against harm, such as "I will put none of the diseases upon you, which I have put upon the Egyptians, for I am the Lord your healer" (Ex. 15.26), or combinations of letters and symbols, names of angels, and so on. The Tosefta (T., Shab. 5.9) speaks of an "effective amulet" (game'a mum'eh) as one that has healed three times, "whether it be an amulet of writing or an amulet of herb roots" (Rashi explains the word game'a [Shab. 61a] as anything that can be tied into a knot). The Mishnah, too, indirectly recognizes the practice of wearing amulets when it rules that "an amulet which has not yet proven its effectiveness" may not be worn in the street on the Sabbath (Shab. 6.2). Amulets were very common throughout the ancient Near East and many have been uncovered in archeological excavations. The earlier magical traditions that formed the basis for the wearing of amulets subsequently merged with certain kabbalistic notions, for example, the mystical nature of the name of God and, hence, the efficacy of its representation by various combinations of letters. These gave rise to the so-called "practical Kabbalah," as distinct from the doctrinal and theosophical "speculative" Kabbalah. Some medieval authorities (e.g., Maimonides) opposed the use of amulets, dismissing them as superstitious folly. In the later Middle Ages, amulets were written by rabbis with a reputation for kabbalistic competence (see EYBESCHUETZ, YONATAN) or by "holy name" specialists (ba'alei shem; the founder of Hasidism, Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov was originally such a writer of amulets). Amulets may be written on parchment or made of silver or other metals. They may contain letters, words, or symbolic elements (magic squares, triangles, the five fingers of the hand) and are an important expression of folk art. The use of amulets is still prevalent in Israel and among Oriental and Hasidic Jews. Not all amulets are worn; some are hung on the walls of a birth chamber, in a car, or placed wherever real or imagined danger lurks. Amulets written by contemporary holy men are prized. Miniature books, such as Psalms, are also considered amulets, and are popular among soldiers in the Israeli army.

ANAGRAMS, literary device by which the letters of a word or sentence are transposed to form a new word or sentence. Examples are found in the Bible and were often used in Talmudic and Midrashic literature as a basis for aggadic interpretations of biblical texts. Influenced by Midrashic and Arabic literature, the anagram became a favorite device of medieval Hebrew poets and was also frequently used in Kabbalah (and in *amulets).

'ANAN BEN DAVID (8th cent.), founder of the Ananite sect in Babylonia; considered by the *Karaites to be their founder. Details of 'Anan's life are obscure. The tenth-century Karaite Qirqisani reports that 'Anan was "the first to bring to light a great deal of the truth about the scriptural ordinances. He was learned in the lore of the Rabbanites." Traditions reported in twelfth-century sources relate that 'Anan was descended from the Davidic line and was to be appointed exilarch (head of the Jewish community in Babylonia). However, because of his heretical tendencies, his younger brother was selected. Thereupon, 'Anan gathered around himself a group of sectarians and set himself up as an alternative exilarch. This led to his arrest on the order of the caliph and a narrow escape from a death sentence as a rebel. While this story is probably more fable than fact, 'Anan does appear to have been a scholarly Rabbanite of aristocratic descent, who for reasons of his own consolidated around himself a non-normative group of Jews. A variety of non-rabbinic Jewish traditions were alive in sectarian movements active in this period on the eastern fringes of the caliphate. When 'Anan appeared, he brought some of these traditions closer to the center of Jewish culture and gave them a new focus and legitimacy. A combination of historical sources indicates that he founded his sect between 762 and 767.

The Ananites seem to have remained a small group loyal to the traditions to which 'Anan gave literary expression in his Sefer ha-Mitsvot. They continued to exist as a separate group until the eleventh century, when their remnants were absorbed by the Karaites. Even though the later Karaites frequently disagreed with the rulings in Sefer ha-Mitsvot, they considered 'Anan to be the originator of their sect, and his descendants were respected and honored as nesi'im, descendants of the royal, Davidic line.

Sefer ha-Mitsvot, written in Aramaic, reflects rabbinic methods of legal exegesis of the biblical text, but it formulates a strict and ascetic religious practice that stresses the mourning and sorrow that should be maintained in light of the destruction of the Temple. 'Anan introduced changes in the method of determination and intercalation of the calendar, prohibited having any fire burn on the Sabbath (even if lit previously), established a seventy-day fast, and greatly extended the degrees of forbidden relationships. His rulings for the synagogue and its prayer rites are modeled on the priestly service in the Temple. 'Anan also wrote another legal work called Fadhlaka, and Qirqisani reports that he wrote a work on transmigration of souls. Scholars have found some similarities between 'Anan's teachings and Sadducean and Qumran traditions. Significant fragments of Sefer ha-Mitsvot have survived and have been published by A. Harkavy, Studien und Mitteilungen 8 (1903); Solomon Schechter, Documents of Jewish Sectaries 2 (1910); J. N. Epstein, Tarbiz 7 (1935/1936): 283–290; and J. ANATOLI, YA'AQOV BEN ABBA' MARI (13th cent.), homilist, translator, and physician. He started his career in France but had settled in Naples by 1231. There he was a close associate of Michael Scot, a favorite of Emperor Frederick II. Anatoli himself was the emperor's physician. His best-known work was Malmad ha-Talmidim (Lyck, 1866), a collection of sermons on the weekly Torah readings. He attacked ascetic practices, notably excessive fasting and mortification of the body, and fanaticism and superstition, associating them with elements in Christianity. Most of his sermons were directed against religious laxity and the mechanical performance of the commandments. In his translation of Aristotle's Organon, he urges Jews to master logic in order to be able to respond to Christian polemics.

ANAV FAMILY, family of scholars in Italy. The family claimed to be descended from aristocratic families brought by Titus to Rome after the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem in 70 CE.

Binyamin ben Avraham Anav (13th cent.), scholar in Rome; brother of Tsidiqiyahu. Besides a wide knowledge of halakhah, he was involved in philosophical speculation, mathematics, and astronomy. He wrote liturgical poems, many of which were incorporated into the Roman rite, the "Maḥzor Roma'."

Tsidiqiyahu ben Avraham Anav (13th cent.), rabbi in Rome; brother of Binyamin. He studied under famous scholars in Italy and outside. His halakhic work Shibbolei ha-Leqet deals with the sources and underlying reasons for ritual observances. It also deals with the rules of benedictions, prayers, Sabbath, Ro'sh Hodesh, Ḥanukkah, Purim, and feasts and fasts. He discusses laws of mourning, circumcision, fringes (tsitsit), phylacteries (tefillin), as well as ritual slaughtering and the consumption of ritually clean animals and forbidden foods. It was published by S. Buber in 1886 and in a critical edition by S. Mirsky in 1966.

Yehudah ben Binyamin Anav (c.1215–after 1280), rabbi in Rome, cousin of Binyamin and Tsidiqiyahu. He was the teacher of Tsidiqiyahu. He wrote commentaries on the halakhot of Alfasi, on Mishnah Sheqalim, and a summary of the laws of sheḥitah and terefah.

Yehi'el ben Yequti'el Anav (13th cent.), author and copyist in Rome, nephew of Yehudah ben Binyamin. He published an important ethical treatise Ma'alot ha-Middot, a description of good attributes and their opposite, with the aim of encouraging his contemporaries to act ethically and to warn them against bad influences. His sources were not only the Bible and rabbinic literature but also philosophical works and Christian moral writings. He composed an elegy on the destruction of a Roman synagogue by fire in 1284. He was also a copyist of Hebrew manuscripts, the most important of which (known as MS Leiden) contains a large section of the Talmud Yerushalmi.

ANDEROGINOS (אַנְדֶּרוֹגִינוֹס; hermaphrodite), in Jewish law the term for an animal or human with both male and female characteristics and organs. This is to be distinguished from the tumtum, a person with dual sexual characteristics whose sex cannot be determined. The legal status of the anderoginos is the subject of some dispute. The majority opinion is that it is regarded as both a questionable male and a questionable female. This means that in certain areas of Jewish law the anderoginos is treated as a male, and in other areas as a female. According to the majority opinion, an androgynous individual is permitted to marry but is not obligated to have children (T., Bik. 2).

'ANENU (אָנענע; Answer Us), prayer inserted on fast days in the Ge'ullah (seventh blessing) by the reader and in the Shema' Kolenu blessing (Birkat Tefillah, the seventeenth blessing) by the congregation in the repetition of the *Amidah at the Shaḥarit and Minhah services. 'Anenu beseeches God to "answer in time of trouble." The earliest formulation may be in the Talmud Yerushalmi (Ber. 4.3), but the existing versions contain a number of divergences, that of the Ashkenazi rite being closest to the Yerushalmi version.

ANGEL OF DEATH, the angel who takes the human soul from the body. While the Bible refers to "destroying angels" (2 Sm. 24.16; Is. 37.36), the concept of the angel of death only developed in the post-biblical period. According to the third-century Palestinian amora' R. *Shim'on ben Laqish (B. B. 16a), the "accuser," Satan, and the evil inclination that tempts and leads to sin are one and the same, for the wages of sin are death. Both Satan and the angel of death are often referred to as the angel Samael, the head of the realm of evil. According to the Talmud, Israel accepted the Torah so that the angel of death would have no hold on them ('A. Z.* 5a), that is to say the "Torah of Life" is the antidote to death. Many customs and superstitions developed from the belief in an angel of death. Beginning in the thirteenth century, for example, it became customary in some places to pour out all water found in the room at the time of a person's death. This practice probably originated in the belief that the angel of death pierced his victim with a sword dipped in poison, some of which may have dripped into the water found in the room at the moment of death. In eastern Europe a glass of water and a towel were placed next to the bed of a person about to die so that the angel of death could wash the poison from his sword and then wipe it dry.

ANGELS. Conceived of as supernatural, celestial beings, angels play a role in Jewish thought and literature from earliest biblical times, yet angelology has never become a major systematized branch of Jewish theology. Various names are applied to angelic beings in scripture. Like the Greek word angelos, from which angel is derived, the Hebrew word mal'akh signifies primarily a messenger or agent; it is as God's messenger that the mal'akh becomes an angel. Other designations for spiritual entities are: benei Elohim or benei Elim (sons of God; Gn. 6.4; Ps. 29.1, respectively); qedoshim (holy ones; Ps. 89.6, 89.8); 'ir (watcher, envoy; Dn. 4.10, 4.14); and sometimes simply ish (man; Gn. 18.2, 32.25). More distinctive appellations are reserved for the supernatural creatures connected with the divine throne or chariot: *seraphim (Is. 6.2); keruvim (cherubim; Ez. 10.3; cf. Gn. 3.24); hayyot (living creatures; Ez. 1.5); ofannim* (wheels; Ez. 1.15ff.). Notwithstanding the variety of generic names by which angels are called and the use of descriptive expressions indicative of their mission, such as "the angel which has redeemed" (Gn. 48.16), "the angel that destroyed" (2 Sm. 24.16), and so on, it is significant that with the exception of certain postexilic references, these heavenly spirits are depicted in the Bible as lacking individuality, personal names, and hierarchical rank. In the course of their duties, they assume many forms, the shape varying with their task. Most often, especially in the earlier narratives, they appear as human beings, but irrespective of their commission, they remain completely obedient to the divine will. Even *Satan, the adversary, is none other than the Lord's official prosecutor and is subservient to his authority. The concept of rebellious angels belongs to post-biblical Jewish literature.

Angelic functions are numerous and as a rule beneficent. Thus, they come to the aid of Hagar, apprise Abraham that a son will be born to him, guard the Israelites against the pursuing Egyptians, protect them during their wanderings in the wilderness, and interpret the visions of Zechariah and Daniel. At other times angels (to be distinguished from the *demons of a later epoch) are given punitive missions—to destroy Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn. 19), punish the citizens of Jerusalem (Ez. 9), and smite the camp of Assyria (2 Kgs. 19.35). In heaven the angels surround God's throne and form his council and court (1 Kgs. 22.19ff.). They also constitute the celestial choir that has sung unceasing praise to the Creator since the beginning of time (Jb. 38.7). Inconsistencies discernible in the portrayal of angelic activities (e.g., the "sons of God" marrying the daughters of men, Gn. 6.2ff.) appear to be due to the fact that varied strands of thought and belief combine to form the fabric of biblical angelology. In some instances, forces deified by heathen people were reduced to the status of angels and thus brought under the control of the one God. During other periods it was felt that the very transcendental character of God postulated the presence of beings to mediate between him and the world. In many passages the angel merely personifies a divine attribute or embodies God's will in history or is an objectivization of the prophet's vision. It is noteworthy, however, that in large parts of the Bible angels are conspicuously absent. It is conjectured that the prophetic and priestly circles, as well as the so-called Deuteronomic school, were opposed to the doctrine of angels inasmuch as it derogated from the absolute divinity of the one God.

The Babylonian exile had a marked effect on Jewish angelology, as attested in the statement, "The names of the angels were brought by the Jews from Babylonia" (Y., R. ha-Sh. 1.2). The angels became individualized, were given specific names, and were graded, like Babylonian spirits, into different ranks. Ezekiel speaks of seven angels, six of whom wrought destruction, while the seventh acted as a scribe. Zechariah saw "a man riding upon a red horse," who was chief of those who "walk to and fro through the earth" (Zec. 1.8–19). The new conception of the deity was so transcendental that it was no longer God but "the angel that talked with me" who instructed the prophet (Zec. 1.9, 14). In the Bible, this process reaches its climax in the Book of Daniel. Here the angels are classified; two high-ranking angels have individual names (*Michael and Gabriel); and national guardian angels (sarim) are introduced for the first time (Dn. 8.16, 10.20–21).

The evolution of angelology advanced still further in post-biblical apocalyptic literature, especially in 1, 2, and 3 Enoch, Jubilees, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, and the Sibylline Oracles. The world of angels now becomes so bizarre and chaotic as to leave an impression of unbridled imagination. Essentially, the angels serve as the media of revelation and the instruments by which God governs the world. Their numbers are astronomical; their varieties almost endless. All the elements and phenomena of nature are given tutelary spirits. Certain angelic categories are of special interest. Frequent reference is made to the angel of peace. The seven (or four) archangels are usually deemed to be the highest angelic echelon (1 En. 20.1–8). They may be identifiable with the "watchers" of Daniel, the "angels of the presence" (see Is. 63.9), and the "ministering angels" of rabbinic ideology. Mystic lore devoted special attention to the divine chariot (Ez. 1–3) attended by the host of heavenly angels. At the other end of the scale, the fallen angels, who for their sins were cast from heaven to the nether world (see Gn. 6.4; Is. 14.12–15), are given prominence in the apocalyptic works but find no place in rabbinic literature. It is they who begot the demons and are seducers of women. They were subjugated by the archangels but not annihilated. This polarization of the angel world into good and evil spirits is a major feature of angelology to which it appears the Essenes made a considerable contribution. The Sadducees, on the other hand, seem to have been strenuously opposed to it.

A highly developed angelology is also found in the Talmud, Midrash, and the Palestinian Targum. Under Magian and Zoroastrian influence, the angelic hosts proliferated, but in rabbinic Judaism, the evil spirits, even the mal'akhei habbalah (angels of destruction), remained under the surpeme control of the one God. There are many aggadic sayings on the subject of angels: they are made of fire, or of fire and water divinely harmonized; some are transitory and live only to sing a single hymn of praise to the Creator, others are eternal, a few are of cosmic proportions. It was a moot point whether the permanent angels were formed on the second, fourth, or fifth day of Creation. They certainly were not created on the first day, lest it be thought that they were God's partners in the creative process. They are called elyonim (higher beings) to distinguish them from the tahtonim (lower beings), the denizens of the earth. They have no will of their own but loyally carry out the divine commands. Mostly they seek the good for pious men and the well-being of Israel in particular. Wherever no personal agent is mentioned in the Bible, the aggadah tends to fill the vacuum with angels. Thus, they are given an important role in the creation of man, the sacrifice of Isaac, and the story of Esther. There are seventy or seventy-two guardian angels of the nations (cf. Septuagint, Dt. 32.8). They constitute the divine council and the court. Individual Israelites also have guardian angels. A Jew is given one angel with the fulfillment of each commandment, and two accompany each Jew constantly. On Sabbath eve, a good and evil angel accompany each worshiper as he returns from the synagogue. In the sanctuary on high, the mal'akhei ha-sharet (ministering angels) perform the priestly functions, with Michael acting as a kind of high priest. There are seven heavens, each in the charge of an archangel. Of special eminence is the mal'akh ha-panim (angel of the presence), also called Amshapands and identified with Enoch. There are numerous allusions to angels of destruction. The most terrible of the destroying angels is the mal'akh ha-mavet (the angel of death), who waits at the bedside of the sick. At the tip of his sword hangs a lethal drop of venom. Originally the angel of death, like other angels, personified a function of the divine will, but gradually he acquired a definitely demonic individuality. He is linked and at times identified with *Satan (who tempts and accuses), the evil inclination, and *Samael, the prince of demons.

All the great Jewish philosophers except Philo adopted a rationalistic view of angels. Ibn Daud, Maimonides, and Levi ben Gershom identified them with the pure intellects who governed the planetary bodies. Sa'adyah Ga'on and Yehudah ha-Levi regarded them as manifestations of prophetic visions created for a specific mission; Yehudah ha-Levi, however, considered the angels of the "higher world" as eternal. In the Kabbalah, both speculative and practical angelology assumes its most extravagant forms. Distinctions were made between male and female angels (Zohar 1.11, 9b). While the Talmud (Y., Ber. 9:13) depicts the angels as servants of God and prohibits supplicating them for help, ancient mystical texts (Heikhalot, Zohar, and later kabbalistic literature) attributed to them the most extraordinary powers; despite the disapproval of many rabbinic authorities, appeals were made to them in the form of *amulets, incantations, and even through interpolations in the liturgy. Kabbalistic angelology remained, nevertheless, essentially monotheistic. Most rabbinic texts agree that man, in spite of his bodily materiality, ranks above the angels.

References to angels are still preserved in the traditional liturgy. They occur inter alia in the preface to the Qedushah, the selihot, and in the Shofarot passages. The ministering angels and the angels of peace are addressed in the hymn Shalom 'Aleikhem, recited in the Ashkenazi rite after the evening service on Friday night. Generally speaking, contemporary Judaism regards allusions to angels in scripture and in the liturgy as of poetic and symbolic significance rather than of doctrinal import or factual significance. Reform Judaism has tended to remove liturgical references to angels.

ANI MA'AMIN. See THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES OF FAITH.

ANIMALS, TREATMENT OF. Jewish law prohibits the infliction of unnecessary pain on animals, referred to in Hebrew as the prohibition of tsa'ar ba'alei hayyim. One of the *Noahic laws is the ban on eating a limb taken from a living animal (Gn. 9.4). The Bible is replete with detailed references to the obligation to be kind to animals and not overwork them (Lv. 22.27–28; Dt. 22.4, 22.6), saying that God “delivers” man and beast alike (Ps. 36.7). Rabbinic law directed that one must feed one's animals before feeding one's self, which recalls the special trait that marked Rebekah as Isaac's future wife (Gn. 24.14). The Talmud (B. M. 32a–b) discusses whether the prohibition against inflicting pain on animals is of biblical or rabbinic origin. Most Talmudic and post-Talmudic authorities agree that the prohibition is of biblical origin (Shulhan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Hayyim 305.19). The rabbis ruled that many Sabbath laws could be infringed to rescue an animal from death or pain (Shab. 128b). However, this does not prevent the necessary killing of animals for either the health or safety of humans. Indeed, the Shulhan 'Arukh (Even ha-'Ezer 5:14) avers that the prohibition of tsa'ar ba'alei hayyim is inapplicable in the case of significant human need. Thus, Galician rabbi Jacob Reischer, writing in Shevut Ya'akov 3.71 during the dawn of medical experimentation in the early 1700s, states that one may test medicines on animals to determine their efficacy on people. There are, however, a number of modern authorities who rule that such conduct is impious and should not be carried out by honorable individuals. A similar approach can be found in the writings of R. Moshe Feinstein (Shulhan 'Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 2.47), who notes that pious people do not even directly kill insects that bother them.

ANINUT (אֲנִינּוּת), interval between death and burial of a close relative. During this period the mourner is called onen. The onen is absolved from observing all Torah precepts, including praying and putting on tefillin, and is expected to concentrate on preparation for the funeral. He is forbidden to eat meat or drink wine. Should a Sabbath intervene during this period, the onen must observe the Sabbath precepts as usual. See also MOURNING.

ANNA' BE-KOAH (אֲנָהּ בְּקוֹאֵה; We Beg You! with the Strength [of Your Right Hand's Greatness]), a supplication for divine protection and for the acceptance of the community's prayers, ascribed to the first-century teacher Nehunya' ben ha-Qanah, but probably composed by a medieval mystic. According to the kabbalists, the initial letters of the forty-two words of the prayer represent the forty-two-lettered name of God, as set out in Qiddushin 71a. In some prayer books Anna' be-Koah is incorporated into the daily morning service and into the Sabbath eve service before Lekhah Dodi. In other liturgies that avoid mysticism, the prayer was either eliminated or else printed in a smaller typeface as a reluctant accommodation. It has not been included in non-Orthodox liturgies.

ANOINTING, the application of *oil to a person or object, expressed in Hebrew by the verb mashah (from which the term *messiah is derived) and in later times by the verb sakh. In ancient times, everyday anointing of the body was done for medical, cosmetic, and hygienic reasons (the last two being prohibited on fasts and during mourning, as they are forms of physical pleasure [Yoma' 8.1]), and the anointing of certain foodstuffs had culinary importance. In religious usage, anointing signifies consecration. Moses was commanded to see to the preparation of sacred anointing oil, composed of pure olive oil mixed with the most expensive fragrant spices: myrrh, cinnamon, aromatic cane, and cassia (Ex. 29.21, 30.22–25, 40.9–14). This oil was to be applied to each and every sacred person, conveying to them a quality of contagious holiness: “whatever touches them shall become consecrated” (Ex. 30.29). The effect of physical contact between such anointed objects and profane objects was said to be deadly.

The sacred oil was also to be used to anoint *Aaron and his sons as well, along with their sacred vestments, thus consecrating them and their descendants for all time to the *priesthood. Although the investiture of the priests included elaborate sacrificial rituals, the anointing and donning of *priestly vestments most clearly indicated sacred status (Ex. 29.36, etc.). Thus, the day of the high priest's investiture is referred to as the day of "the anointed priests" (Nm. 3.3). For the high priest alone, the anointing oil was not merely applied but poured on his head (Lv. 8.12). Rabbinic literature regularly calls the high priest "the anointed priest" and refers to the priest appointed to address the armed forces before going out to battle (Dt. 20.2) as "the priest anointed for war" (e.g., Sot. 8.1). The anointing ceremonies were carried out after the Tabernacle was erected (Lv. 8.10–12, 30; Nm. 7.1).

From the time of Saul on, religious anointing was used in the Israelite monarchy. The anointing of the king by a prophet was an indication that he had been chosen by God, that is, consecrated to his task as earthly legate of the divine king. Saul and David were anointed privately by Samuel (1 Sm. 9.1, 10.1, 12–13, 16.3), as was Jehu by the agent of Elisha (2 Kgs. 9). Public anointings, while they may have been carried out with or without divine sanction, were nonetheless religious acts. The public anointing of David at Hebron (2 Sm. 5.3, 17) confirmed the earlier anointing by Samuel, whereas the anointing of Solomon by Zadok the priest (1 Kgs. 1.39) and of Joash and Jehoachim (2 Kgs. 11.12 and 23.20) seems to have been a response to rival claims to the throne or to opposition parties. Sensing the extraordinary nature of these cases, the rabbis of the Talmud interpreted that as a rule kings are anointed only at the inauguration of a new dynasty.

The possibility that King Hazael of Aram may have been anointed by an Israelite prophet at God's command (Elijah, according to 1 Kgs. 19.15–16; or perhaps Elisha, as in 2 Kgs. 9) suggests the idea that God, as universal king, appoints the rulers of all nations. In Isaiah 45.1, Cyrus, king of Persia, who permitted the return of the Jews to their ancient land, is called the anointed of God.

The Israelite king, believed to be chosen by God, is called "the Lord's anointed" (mashiah [1 Sm. 2.10, 24.7, 11, 26.16; 2 Sm. 1.14, 16, 19.22, 22.51, 23.1, and frequently in the Psalms]). It was the hope for eventual reestablishment of Israel's ancient sovereignty and of the Davidic monarchy that embodied it that led to the use of the term mashiah to denote the future king (Messiah) of Israel. This term lent itself to Israel's hopes for its future restoration in general (messianism). Anointing played no role in Jewish ritual after the destruction of the Second Temple. The Talmudic rabbis conveyed many traditions concerning anointing, notably in Horayot 11b–12a.

ANTHROPOMORPHISM, the attribution to God of human qualities, such as human form (anthropomorphism proper, e.g., God's figure, hands, eyes, etc.) and human emotions (anthropopathism, e.g., God loves, is angry, etc.). Anthropomorphism, which is taken for granted in many primitive and pagan religions, becomes an issue when the concept of a spiritual and transcendent God, especially as elaborated by philosophy, conflicts with apparent anthropomorphism in authoritative texts (e.g., the Bible, rabbinic aggadah, etc.). Nineteenth-century scholars claimed to have discovered evidence of a gradual evolution from an anthropomorphic to a more spiritual conception of God in the biblical texts, but this is now held to be an oversimplification. Biblical writers do not hesitate to resort to anthropomorphism (God walks in the garden of Eden, passes over the houses of the children of Israel, dwells in Zion, is moved by love or feelings of revenge, etc.), but they frequently use qualifying language. Many of the definite anthropomorphisms are obviously not meant to be taken literally but are the language of imagery. The *Targums (Onkelos in particular) as well as the Hellenistic philosophers (*Philo) rendered this anthropomorphic imagery by qualifying circumlocutions or interpreted it allegorically, so as to avoid all danger of misunderstanding. Rabbinic usage, too, did not shy away from anthropomorphism, and it was attacked by the *Karaites and others for its alleged primitive crudity. The great medieval Jewish philosophers, Moses *Maimonides in particular, undertook to interpret all objectionable anthropomorphisms; namely, to translate them into abstract, conceptual language (see GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF). The mystics and kabbalists evolved new—to some, shocking—anthropomorphisms, as well as theories and concepts to deal with them. Ultimately the issue is one of enabling human beings to speak validly both of a god (in theology) and to a god (in prayer) who is utterly transcendent. The choice seems to be between saying nothing at all (the "mystic silence") and daring to speak of him in human terms; that is, in the only language men possess to indicate that he is actively meaningful in human life (as a creator, father, king, lover, redeemer). The conviction of God's spirituality and transcendence as it finally developed in Judaism was so radical and deep that even the most daring anthropomorphism could be used without risk or danger.

ANTIBI FAMILY, family of rabbis in Aleppo, Egypt, and Erets Yisra'el.

Yitshaq ben Shabbetai Antibi (died 1804) of Aleppo, was the author of Ohel Yitshaq, a collection of sermons; Beit Av (Leghorn, 1849), on Maimonides and Yosef Karo; and responsa (in Yehudah Qatsin's Mahaneh Yehudah [Leghorn, 1803]).

Ya'aqov Antibi (died 1846), born in Aleppo, was rabbi in Damascus for forty years and the author of Abbir Ya'aqov, a collection of novellae. His religious poems were included in the Damascus baqqashot (see BAQQA-SHAH).

Avraham ben Yitshaq Antibi (1765–1858), son of Yitshaq ben Shabbetai, was a scholar of great learning and a strong community leader, who issued taqqanot to enforce his rulings. He is the author of Yoshev Ohalim (Leghorn, 1825), a collection of sermons; Penei ha-Bayit (Leghorn, 1843), a commentary on Shelomoh Adret's Torat ha-Bayit and on the Shulhan 'Arukh; the popular ethical work Hokhmah u-Musar (Leghorn, 1850; Jerusalem, 1961; edited by J. Avadi Shayev [Jerusalem, 1980]), which incorporated Huqqei Nashim, on matrimonial law, and Penei Ohel Mo'ed (Jerusalem, 1959), a collection of homiletical discourses for the Sabbath, in which he speculated on the date of redemption. His most important work is Mor va-Ahalot (Leghorn, 1843), a collection of responsa, which sheds much light on the life of the Jews of Syria in his time.

ANTIGONUS OF SOKHO (c.200 BCE), sage; disciple of *Shim'on ha-Tsaddiq. The sole aphorism preserved in his name is the statement in Avot 1.3: "Be not like servants who serve their master in the hope of receiving a reward, but be like those servants who serve their masters with no expectation of receiving a reward; and let the fear of heaven be upon you." His two pupils, Zadko and Boethus, are reported to have misinterpreted this as a repudiation of the belief in retribution in the world to come (Avot de-Rabbi Natan 5.2). From these two pupils emerged the deviant sects of the *Zadokites and the *Boethusians.

ANTINOMIANISM, theoretical negation and actual transgression of traditional law on various grounds. Tendencies and movements denying the validity of the received ritual and moral norms or, at least, encouraging their neglect, have appeared in different periods and for various reasons. In Hellenistic Egypt, and again in the Middle Ages, the interpretation of the Torah by means of *allegory led to the substitution of allegorical and symbolic meanings for the literal meaning and thus at times tended to undermine the strict observance of the law. The abolition of the Law by Jesus, and its fulfillment through the "New Covenant," is a central feature of Paul's theology, for example.

The Talmudic sages were concerned with the possibility of antinomian trends and regarded even Solomon's transgressions as antinomian in nature. According to the Talmud Yerushalmi (San 2.6), Solomon believed that since he knew the reasons for the law, he could ensure that his transgressions would not negatively affect him. God's reply is a complete rejection of antinomianism: "Solomon and a thousand like him will be annihilated before a single letter of the Torah will be abolished." Another Talmudic passage (Yoma 67b) polemicalizes against those who would make light of certain ritual laws because of their lack of evident reasons and insists that it is those laws especially which Satan "urges one to transgress," but since God has ordained them, humans have no right to question them.

Concerns about antinomianism are common in medieval Jewish literature. All who ventured into the field of ta'amei ha-mitsvot (suggesting reasons for the commandments [see COMMANDMENTS, REASONS FOR]) had to confront this issue. Some scholars, including Maimonides, thought that without a rational basis, people would reject the law (agnostic antinomianism), whereas others believed that by offering reasons, obedience to the law would be undermined (philosophical antinomianism).

Mystical and messianic movements were often suspected of antinomian tendencies. While none can be ascribed to the classical Kabbalah, extreme antinomianism made its appearance in both the theology and the practice of Shabbateanism (see SHABBETAÏ TSEVI) and Frankism (see FRANK, YA'AQOV). Their followers were able to draw support from assorted statements in rabbinic and kabbalistic literature, which speak of abolishment of the mitsvot in messianic days. Slightly altering the wording of one of the traditional liturgical formulas, the Shabbateans blessed God who "permits that which is forbidden." Reform Judaism has also had an antinomian aspect, in that many of its leading thinkers claimed that the ritual law was a hindrance to true spirituality and should be discarded in modern times.

ANTIOCHUS, SCROLL OF. See SCROLL OF ANTIOCHUS.

ANTIOCHUS IV EPIPHANES (r. 175–164), Seleucid king of Syria, described in contemporary sources as eccentric and unpredictable, a ruthless despot who could also be extremely pious and generous. Soon after ascending to the throne, he intervened in Jewish religious life in Jerusalem, where he deposed the pious high priest Onias III and appointed Onias's brother, the Hellenizer Jason, in his stead. Some three years later he deposed Jason and appointed another Hellenizer, Menelaus. In 169 and perhaps again in 168, Antiochus plundered Jerusalem and the Temple. In 167 he ordered the desecration of the Temple and the abolition of Torah observances. Circumcision, Sabbath observance, or the possession of a Torah scroll were made punishable by death, the walls of Jerusalem were razed to the ground, and foreigners were settled in a newly built citadel in the city's midst. Antiochus's motivation in attempting to extirpate the Jewish religion as well as the extent of the Jewish Hellenizers' involvement are matters of much scholarly debate, and the available sources do not allow any clear-cut answers. Antiochus had not anticipated the ensuing armed revolt led by the *Hasmoneans and their supporters, which led Antiochus's son and successor, Antiochus V Eupator, to rescind his father's anti-Jewish decrees in 162 and to restore to the Jews the right to live according to their own laws.

ANTISEMITISM, hatred of and hostility to the Jews. The term was coined in 1879 by the German anti-Jewish writer Wilhelm Marr, but it has entered general usage to apply to all manifestations of hatred of the Jewish people throughout the ages, and as such it has a long history. It even precedes the enmity of the Christian church toward the Jews for their alleged crime of deicide and their refusal to accept Jesus. Indeed, the expression of animosity toward the Jews is found as early as the statement of Haman: "There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the people in all the provinces of the kingdom, and their laws are diverse from all people, neither keep they the king's laws, therefore it is not for the king's profit to suffer them" (Est. 3.8). That verse contains many traditional aspects of antisemitism, including the discomfort with the dispersion of the Jews; the suspicions aroused by their customs, giving rise to "the dislike of the like for the unlike"; the accusation that they are an alien element potentially harmful to the state (cf. Ex. 1.10) and that, in any case, they are disloyal to it; and the belief in their dispensability as a useless element.

Much of the early hatred of the Jews was based on the Jewish rejection of paganism. The Jewish refusal to worship images led to a series of clashes with the Hellenistic and Roman authorities and to the antagonism to Jews expressed, for example, in the works of certain classical authors. Other peoples accepted the existence of the gods of other nations; only the Jews refused absolutely to acknowledge such existence or to send tribute. Moreover, Jewish religious practices (e.g., marriage customs, dietary laws) cut them off from social intercourse with their neighbors. The necessity for Jews to live in close proximity to one another (for the proper observance of the Sabbath, in order to be close to a synagogue, and so forth) as well as their inability to perform certain communal or national obligations (e.g., military service) for religious reasons also emphasized their apartness. Pagan (Hellenistic) antisemitism was rife in the first century BCE and the first century CE, particularly in Alexandria, and was probably accentuated by Jewish proselytizing activities and the concomitant Jewish denigration of the practices of other religions. However, it was in the Christian world that antisemitism assumed the most tragic proportions. Although *Christianity denied all other religions, it found itself in a particularly hostile position with regard to the "mother religion" from which it claimed its descent but which had rejected it. The spread and ultimate political success of Christianity led to the emergence of the doctrine that the Jews were hated by God, who had rejected them for their sinfulness and obstinacy. Jews were gradually forced out of every sphere of political influence and deprived of civil and political rights. The Christian church's attempts to erect barriers between Jew and non-Jew were translated into legislation affecting all aspects of Jewish life. Conversion to Judaism became an offense punishable by death, and a movement for the destruction of synagogues and forced conversion (see CONVERSION, FORCED) of the Jews was strong from the fifth century on. Exclusion of Jews from economic life was the next objective, and in the later Middle Ages expulsions were frequent. Hatred of the Jews was fed by liturgical and other (e.g., dramatic) commemorations of the crucifixion of Jesus, which were liable to erupt with particular violence at the Easter season, the occasion for organized attacks on the Jews. Religious antisemitism reached its first climax in the period of the Crusades, and the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) passed a series of anti-Jewish measures. In this atmosphere many anti-Jewish libels—notably the *blood libel—received universal credence throughout the Christian world. The ultimately religious nature of Christian antisemitism was demonstrated by the fact that baptism automatically removed all disabilities from a Jew. In fact, discrimination and persecution had the avowed purpose of producing conversion, and there is no record of church discrimination against converted Jews earlier than the sixteenth century, when such discrimination occurred in Spain. The doctrine of the medieval church that by their crime of deicide and their refusal to accept the divinity of Jesus the Jews had become the "spawn of the devil" and the enemies of God was largely responsible for the concept that Jews, as a group, were inherently wicked and depraved and had to be treated accordingly. In the Muslim world, antisemitic developments were far less overt, except in periods of religious extremism. There was little specific antisemitism, and Jews were treated (or ill-treated) like other infidels.

The end of the Middle Ages did not bring any major changes in antisemitism. The Counter-Reformation in the Catholic world renewed and increased anti-Jewish legislation and enforced the introduction of the ghetto system. Protestants in general followed the medieval pattern, and Luther advocated an extreme anti-Jewish policy, but it was in Protestant countries that anti-

Jewish barriers were first removed. In the nineteenth century, the religious foundations of Christian Europe were weakened and with them religious prejudices, except in czarist Russia, which followed the Eastern rite of Christianity, and wherever the Catholic church continued to press an antisemitic policy.

In the nineteenth century "scientific" antisemitism gradually took the place of religious antisemitism. The Jews were said to represent a distinct Semitic ethnic group inferior to the Nordic or Aryan people among whom they lived. Hence, their integration and assimilation into their environment, even if possible, would corrupt society and bring about the decline of prevailing standards. Modern antisemitism was thus built on racial, not religious, foundations, and the adoption of the prevailing faith no longer provided an escape route for persecuted Jews. Modern racial antisemitism reached its tragic apogee with the rise of Hitler and his infamous Final Solution of the Jewish problem. Responsible contemporary church leaders, realizing the dangers of antisemitism as well as the common ground of people of all faiths, have condemned antisemitism and are making efforts to spread attitudes of tolerance and understanding, and Pope John Paul II has castigated antisemitism as a sin. Antisemitism continues to be prevalent in many places, largely with a socioeconomic motivation, but a residue of religious causation continues in the Christian world, and in Islamic lands it has been fanned by anti-Zionism.

ANUSIM. See MARRANOS.

APIQOROS (אִפִּיקוֹרוֹס; heretic), form used in rabbinic literature of the name of the Greek philosopher Epicurus (4th cent. BCE). His teaching that pleasure (but only if philosophically and properly understood) was the highest good and that the soul perished with the body caused his name to become synonymous with unbelief in Jewish parlance. The Talmud therefore applied the name to all heretics, and the term was eventually used to refer to all unbelievers and skeptics. The Mishnah (Avot 2.19) urged the believer to learn "how to answer the Epicurean," that is, the unbeliever. Maimonides classified as apiqorsim those who disbelieve in prophecy in general, those who deny the prophecy of Moses, and those who do not believe that God knows an individual's thoughts. They were regarded as completely wicked and without any lot in the future world. The Shulhan 'Arukh, which defines an apiqoros as one who rejects the divine origin of the Torah as well as prophecy, deems that person worthy of death. Since medieval times, the term has also been applied in popular parlance to Jews who are lax in traditional observance. See also HERESY.

APOCALYPSE, a text that recounts divine revelations to human beings on such topics as the end of the world and the Day of Judgment, the fate of souls after death, the divine throne and the angelic hosts that surround it, and astronomical and cosmological phenomena. Although the terms apocalypse and apocalyptic are associated with the end of the world, the Greek word from which the English derives means uncovering or revelation, without regard to the content of the revelation. In some apocalypses, eschatology is the dominant concern, while in others it plays a smaller role.

The first apocalypses date from the third century BCE. The Jews of Erets Yisra'el and Egypt continued to compose apocalypses through the rest of the Second Temple period, and several apocalypses were written in response to the destruction of the Second Temple (70 CE). About a dozen Jewish apocalypses have survived. While the biblical prophets prophesied in their own names, the apocalypses were attributed by their authors to heroes of the past; for example, Ezra, the hero of the apocalypse 4 Ezra, was an important leader of the Persian period, while Enoch, the hero of a number of apocalypses, was the mysterious patriarch who "walked with God and was not" (Gn. 5.21–24). With the exception of the biblical Book of Daniel, the apocalypses survived because they were transmitted by Christians. Apocalypses written in Hebrew or Aramaic were translated first into Greek and later into other languages used by Christians; even apocalypses originally written in Greek sometimes survived in translation. Early Christians also composed apocalypses of their own, including the Book of Revelation in the New Testament. Both Jews and Christians continued to write apocalypses through the Middle Ages.

While prophetic literature consists primarily of the words the prophets hear the Lord speak, the apocalypses place their revelations in the context of narratives. The revelation itself is conveyed either through symbolic visions or a journey to places inaccessible to human beings, usually the heavens. Both of these modes of revelation represent developments of forms found in prophetic literature. Only a few instances of symbolic visions appear in earlier prophets, but they play a central role in the prophecies of Zechariah, who was active at the time of the building of the Second Temple (520–515).

The prominence of visions that require angelic interpretation in Zechariah and the apocalypses reflects the growing importance of interpretation in biblical religion in the Second Temple period. The journey or ascent in the apocalypses is a development of a form that first appears in Ezekiel's vision of the new temple (Ez. 40–48), in which the prophet is taken on a guided tour of this structure by an angel. On the whole, symbolic visions are associated with accounts of Israel's history culminating in predictions about the end of the world, while the tour offers readers a glimpse of the heavenly realm, the fate of souls after death, or the secrets of nature. Daniel, 4 Ezra, and 2 Baruch are examples of apocalypses with symbolic visions, while the "Book of the Watchers" (1 En. 1–36), 2 Enoch, and 3 Baruch are among the apocalypses involving journeys or ascents. The categories are not mutually exclusive; the Apocalypse of Abraham involves an ascent to heaven that concludes with a symbolic vision.

The eschatology of the apocalypses is more deterministic than that of prophetic literature. While the prophets hope to persuade their listeners to repent and thus avert catastrophe, the apocalypses view the coming judgment as the inevitable conclusion of a plan formulated long ago. The goal of pious behavior is not to head off disaster but to secure a place among the righteous at the last judgment. This new attitude is usually presumed to derive from feelings of powerlessness caused by the loss of political independence in the period of the Second Temple. The attribution of the apocalypses to ancient heroes emphasizes that the course of history is predetermined. In addition, the ancient hero can prophesy accurately about events that have already occurred, thus lending authority to the genuinely predictive elements of the apocalypses.

Speculation in the apocalypses about the angelic inhabitants of the heavens and especially the divine throne, which is deeply indebted to the Book of Ezekiel, is part of a larger phenomenon in the literature of the Second Temple period. Scholars have usually viewed the growth of angelology as reflecting a feeling of alienation and distance from God, but the filling of the heavens with angels can also be understood as an effort to bridge the distance between humanity and the divine.

The reward and punishment of souls after death, an important concern of several apocalypses, is a theme that emerges only in the Second Temple period. The desire to provide recompense for those who did not receive their just deserts in this life seems to have intensified during the Maccabean Revolt (166–164), when pious Jews suffered precisely for their piety.

Several apocalypses show an interest in cosmological phenomena, including the sun and the moon, winds, rain, and so on. This interest can be understood in the context of the created world as an expression of God's greatness, which is found in biblical wisdom literature.

APOCALYPSE OF ABRAHAM, pseudepigraphous work extant only in a Slavonic version. Written originally in Hebrew or (less likely) Aramaic, it is the work of a Jewish author, although in its present form it contains at least one Christian interpolation. As it alludes to the destruction of the Temple, it must have been written after 70 CE, most likely toward the end of the first century or the beginning of the second. The contents fall into two distinct sections, the first of which recounts Abraham's conversion from the idolatry of his father Terah to the worship of the one true God. The second section contains Abraham's apocalyptic journey through the heavens, during which he is shown the whole of human history, from Adam and Eve to the destruction of the Temple, followed by the final judgment, the arrival of the Messiah, the ingathering of the exiles, and the restoration of the Temple.

APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHA, a body of literature, primarily of Jewish authorship, from the Second Temple period and the years following. Although the works included in the two groupings have much in common with each other, the categories themselves have quite different histories. The works classed as the Apocrypha are the fifteen books or portions of books that appear in the Old Testament of the Vulgate, Jerome's Latin translation of the Christian Bible, but not in the Hebrew Bible. The fifteen books are 1 Esdras, 2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, Additions to Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Ben Sira, 1 Baruch, Letter of Jeremiah, Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Young Men, Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, Prayer of Manasseh, 1 Maccabees, and 2 Maccabees.

Jerome translated the Old Testament from the Hebrew, but the apocryphal books formed part of the Old Latin translation that preceded Jerome's. Jerome included these works in his translation but noted that they were not found in the Hebrew. Until the sixteenth century and the rise of Protestantism, the works were treated as part of the Old Testament by the Western church. Because the books did not form part of the Hebrew Bible, Protestants placed the books in a separate, inferior, category; the term apocrypha means "hidden" in Greek. The Catholic church, in response, affirmed the canonicity of all of these texts except for the Prayer of Manasseh and 1 and 2 Esdras, which were relegated to an appendix printed after the New Testament. The remaining twelve books it classed as deuterocanonical, that is, admitted to the canon later than the other books of the Bible but canonical nonetheless.

With the exception of 2 Esdras, the books of the Apocrypha formed part of the Greek Bible used by the Jews of Egypt in the centuries immediately before and after the turn of the era. Thus the question arises as to why they were not included in the Hebrew Bible. Some, such as the Wisdom of Solomon and 2 Maccabees, were excluded because they were composed in Greek. Some of those with Hebrew or Aramaic originals were deemed too late for inclusion either on the basis of the author (Ben Sirā) or the events described (1 Maccabees). The absence of other works, such as Tobit and Judith, has no obvious explanation.

The Apocrypha, then, is a fixed group of works, established in the course of debates between Christians. In contrast, the pseudepigrapha (falsely attributed writings) category is a scholarly invention. The texts treated under this heading are extremely diverse. The classic collection of R. H. Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament (1913), includes seventeen pseudepigraphous works. H.F.D. Sparks's Apocryphal Old Testament (1984), a revision of the Charles volume, includes sixteen texts that did not appear in Charles, while it omits six of the texts Charles included. The two-volume collection of J. H. Charlesworth (1983, 1985) is even more expansive, with over sixty titles. These collections share a core of texts including the apocalypses 1 Enoch, 2 Enoch, 2 Baruch, and 3 Baruch, as well as Jubilees and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. These texts have in common the claim to be the work of heroes of the biblical past. Other texts frequently classed as pseudepigraphous, such as Joseph and Asenath and the Life of Adam and Eve, recount stories about these heroes without making claims about authorship. In the coming decades, texts from the *Dead Sea Scrolls, undeniably of early Jewish provenance, might well be considered as part of the pseudepigrapha. The Dead Sea Scrolls have already yielded important evidence for the Hebrew and Aramaic originals of some of the pseudepigrapha previously known only in translation.

APOLOGETICS, the defense of a position in the face of critical challenge. The apologetic defense of Judaism and the Jewish people is generally considered to have originated in Hellenistic Alexandria. Beginning in the mid-second century BCE, and continuing for several centuries, such works as the Sibylline Oracles and the Wisdom of Solomon attempted to portray the superiority of Jewish ethics and practice over the allegedly immoral views and behavior of the pagan world. *Philo's work was also meant to demonstrate that Judaism contained in the most perfect form all the intellectual and moral achievements and ideals of Hellenistic philosophy and piety. As against its usual pejorative connotation, apologetics must be considered a natural form of reaction to criticism, whether from hostile or objective sources or from self-questioning. On occasion Jewish apologetics has exaggerated its case, but for the most part it has been a record of restatement of Jewish concepts in the light of anti-Jewish attack and contempt or genuine cultural difference. Frequently its purpose was not so much to convince others as to heighten Jewish morale. Jewish apologetics reflected the various environments in which the Jews have felt the need of responding. Thus, *Josephus Flavius, in his Against Apion, was reacting to the antisemitic calumnies then current in Alexandria. In presenting his account of Jewish history he also essayed a summary statement of the religious and moral values of normative Judaism: "The laws given us are disposed after the best manner for the advancement of piety, for mutual communion with one another, for a general love of mankind, also for justice, for sustaining labors with fortitude, and for a contempt for death." Later Jewish apologetics reasserted Judaism against Greek philosophy, Christianity, Islam (*Yehudah ha-Levi's Kuzari dealt with all three), and, in the modern period, against scientific positivism and defended Jews against various forms of prejudice and antisemitism. Apologists have not only defended Judaism but also made valuable and permanent contributions to Jewish thought and tradition. Thus, the intellectual achievement of *Maimonides literally transformed Judaism. His demonstration of the compatibility of Judaism with Aristotelian philosophy gave new content and meaning to many traditional concepts, such as prophecy, the hereafter, and many others. By applying philosophical methods of reasoning, he further spiritualized the Jewish conception of God. Jewish apologetics is less "apologetic" than the term indicates. Occasionally, and with great courage, Jews have gone on the attack. Thus, the Muslims were charged at various times with moral laxity and Islam with distorting the Bible. Yosef Kimḥi (12th cent.; see KIMḤI FAMILY) began the practice of countering Christian attacks by circulating Jewish replies that often contained vigorous criticism of Christian morality and theology. Moses *Mendelssohn's Jerusalem (1783) was a milestone in Jewish apologetics, marking the opening of the Jewish struggle for *emancipation. Apologetics in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries had to defend Judaism against the *blood libel and recrudescant antisemitism generally. As a reflection of the spiritual level both of general society and of the Jewish people, Jewish apologetics continues to be developed as Jews wish to defend, interpret, or reconstruct their cultural theory and way of life in interaction with their environment. See also POLEMICS.

APOSTASY, the abandonment of one's faith and practice for another religion. The first large-scale apostasy from Judaism seems to have occurred during the events preceding the Maccabean Revolt from 166 to 164 and involved mainly the upper strata of Jewish society in Jerusalem who had abandoned traditional practice for the Hellenistic way of life. That the abandonment of Jewish practice by early Judeo-Christians was regarded as apostasy can be seen in Irenaeus's interpretation of Acts 21.21 (Adversus haereses 1.262): James, the leader of those Judeo-Christians, and his followers, the *Ebionites, "repudiated the apostle Paul, maintaining that he was an apostate from the Law." The most famous apostate mentioned by name in the Talmud is *Elisha' ben Avuyah, a contemporary of R. 'Aqiva' and teacher of R. Me'ir and one of the most distinguished rabbis of his era. After his apostasy, the rabbis referred to him merely as Aher (Another One). As a bitterly persecuted minority religion, Judaism inevitably regarded apostasy as a despicable act of desertion, treason, and weakness. Hatred of apostasy grew as many apostates, either to still their consciences or to demonstrate their zeal in their newly adopted faith, took a prominent part in anti-Jewish *polemics and denunciations. Among the most notorious were the leaders on the Christian side of the three famous medieval *disputations: Nicholas Donin in Paris (1240), Pablo Christiani in Barcelona (1263), and Jerónimo de Santa Fé (Joshua ha-Lorki) in the Disputation of Tortosa (1413–1414). Another medieval apostate who did untold harm to his former coreligionists was Shelomoh ha-Levi, rabbi of Burgos, who converted to Christianity after the pogroms of 1391. As Pablo de Santa Maria, bishop of Burgos, he became a member of the triumvirate forming the Regency Council during the minority of King Juan II. His harsh decrees against the Jews, aimed at humbling their pride and breaking their spirit, succeeded in bringing about a wave of conversions. Another famous apostate, Johannes *Pfefferkorn advocated the confiscation of the Talmud in sixteenth-century Germany. Special understanding was extended by the rabbis to forced apostates who in many cases continued as secret Jews (Heb. anusim; see CONVERSION, FORCED; MARRANOS). Apostasy to Islam was not infrequent, but these apostates initiated little of the anti-Jewish activity that was so often undertaken by their Christian counterparts. The status of apostates in religious law was frequently discussed in rabbinic literature; for example, whether a penitent apostate required a ceremony of readmission to Judaism or whether the wife of an apostate required a valid divorce or his sister-in-law halitsah. The apostate (Heb. meshummad or mumar*), although a sinner, is still regarded essentially as a Jew; however, that person loses certain rights and privileges of an Israelite and is disqualified from giving testimony or performing ritual slaughter. The Talmud classifies apostates in various categories; for example, "an apostate as regards one commandment only" (that is, one who regularly violates a particular precept) and "an apostate as regards the whole Torah." Another distinction is made between the mumar le-hakh'is, who violates a precept in a spirit of rebellion and denies its divine authority, and the mumar le-te'avon, who violates the precept because he is not strong enough to withstand temptation. Many of the Talmudic laws regarding the treatment of the various categories of mumar have fallen into disuse. It became a custom for families to observe mourning for members who apostasized. In the past two centuries, the process of *emancipation has led to widespread *assimilation in the framework of which many Jews converted to Christianity. Fringe groups that call themselves *Jewish Christians are classified by Jews as apostates.

APPROBATION (Heb. haskamah), official authorization prefixed to a book. With the introduction of printing, it became customary to preface Hebrew books with an approbatory note by one or more recognized rabbinic authorities. This was originally instituted as a voluntary measure by Jewish authorities to avoid unnecessary friction with the church. A decision by a rabbinical conference at Ferrara in 1554 stated that every Hebrew book required the haskamah of a committee composed of three rabbis and a representative of the community before it was printed. Later, the haskamah was used as an instrument to ensure that no Hebrew book contained material that could be regarded as heretical. The haskamah, which was in the interest of both author and publisher, fulfilled a double purpose: it served as an imprimatur, assuring the reader that there was nothing heretical or otherwise objectionable in a book; and it also contained a prohibition (sometimes phrased in the form of a herem*) forbidding others to reprint the book within a specified number of years, assuring the book's copy-right. See also CENSORSHIP.

From 1909 until he migrated to Jerusalem in 1938, he taught rabbinics in the latter institution. Aptowitzer's monumental work, Das Schriftwort in der rabbinischen Literatur (4 vols. [Vienna, 1906–1915]), investigated variant readings of the biblical text contained in the Talmud and the Midrash. He also edited the tosafist Eli'ezer ben Yo'el's Sefer Ra'abiyah (2 vols. 'AQAVYAH BEN MAHALAL'EL (1st cent. BCE), sage of the late Second Temple period. Several of his halakhic sayings are quoted in tannaitic literature. He differed from the majority of contemporary scholars on a number of issues connected with the laws of purity. His fellow scholars said they would elect him to the position of av beit din* if he would change his views, but he resolutely refused to do so, saying: "Better that I be called a fool all my days, than that I be wicked before the Lord for a single hour and that men may say he withdrew his opinion for the sake of gaining power" ('Eduy. 5.6). As a result, according to some opinions, he was excommunicated. However, he instructed his son to accept the views of the majority: "I heard my view from the majority, and my fellows heard it from the majority. I stood steadfast to my view as did they. However, you heard this view from an individual [i.e., 'Aqavyah]. Best to reject the minority opinion and accept that of the majority" ('Eduy. 5.7). His best-known saying is "Consider three things, and you will not come within the power of sin . . . know from where you come—from a putrefying drop; to where you go—to a place of dust, worms, and maggots; and before whom you will have to give an account—before the Holy One Blessed be He" (Avot 3.1). 'Aqavyah provided answers to these questions of a moral nature to teach humility and the fear of heaven.

AQDAMUT MILLIN (Aram.; אֲקָדָמוּת מִלִּין; Introduction), piyyut recited in Ashkenazi synagogues on the morning of Shavu'ot* (where two days are observed, it is said on the first) immediately prior to the reading of the Torah; in some rites, it is read after the first verse of the portion of the Law. Possibly originally intended as an introduction to the Aramaic translation of the Decalogue, which was recited in the synagogue on this festival, Aqdamut Millin was composed by R. Me'ir ben Yits'haq Nahora'i of Worms (11th cent.). The poem contains a doxology and the reply of Israel to its persecutors, describing the ultimate bliss assured for Israel and the punishment foreseen for hostile nations. It is a ninety-line acrostic based on a double alphabet and the author's name. One of its two traditional melodies has become a central feature of the Ashkenazi service on Shavu'ot.

'AQEDAH (אֲקֵדָה; binding), the story of the binding of Isaac* (Gn. 22). After Ishmael, Abraham's* elder son, had been sent away, leaving Isaac as heir to the blessing of his father, Abraham was commanded by God to take Isaac to a mountain in the land of Moriah and there to offer him as a sacrifice. Abraham unquestioningly obeyed. As he was about to slaughter Isaac, his hand was stayed by an angel, who informed him that he was being tested. A ram caught by its horns in a nearby thicket was offered in place of Isaac. The angel then informed Abraham that he would be blessed because he was prepared in complete trust to sacrifice his "only son."

The story provided the basis for the development of a wide spectrum of interpretations, which offer a variety of theological understandings, and became a vehicle for confronting the tragic experiences of the Jewish community over the centuries. On its own terms, the story establishes the selfless nature of Abraham's devotion to God. This association with the readiness for martyrdom apparently gave rise to the Midrashic account that Isaac was actually slain and burnt and then returned to life when his ashes were touched by the dew of resurrection. This version also found expression in the prayer of the individual who sounds the shofar* on Ro'sh ha-Shanah: "Gaze upon the ashes of Isaac our father, heaped upon the altar, and deal with your people, Israel, according to the attribute of mercy." In the Sephardi rite, a poetic version of the 'aqedah is sung before the sounding of the shofar.

The story of the 'aqedah is read in the synagogue on the second day of Ro'sh ha-Shanah. Midrashic interpretations of the sacrifice provide the basis for a number of piyyutim that deal with the forgiveness of sin. Some of these poems reflect the tragedies that occurred in the Rhineland toward the end of the eleventh century. Rabbi Efrayim ben Ya'aqov of Bonn wrote: "Recall to our credit the many 'aqedahs / The saints, men and women, slain for your sake. / Remember the righteous martyrs of Judah, / Those that were bound of Jacob." In many rites, the 'aqedah chapter (Gn. 22) is recited as part of the daily morning prayer.

The sounding of the shofar on Ro'sh ha-Shanah is connected in several prayers with the ram offered in Isaac's stead. Rabbi Abbahu explained the sound of the shofar: "The Holy One, blessed be He, said 'Sound the ram's horn before me that I may remember in your favor the binding of Isaac the son of Abraham, and I will account it to you as though you had bound yourselves before me'" (R. ha-Sh. 16a).

The early church fathers believed that the story of the 'aqedah symbolically prefigured the death of Jesus (see Rom. 8.32). There is a reference to the story in the Qur'an (Sura 37.100-109), but most Muslim theologians connect it with Ishmael rather than Isaac.

'AQIVA' BEN YOSEF (c.40-135), tanna' who laid the foundation for the exposition and organization of the oral law as later codified in the *Mishnah. About two hundred and seventy halakhic statements and over one hundred aggadic sayings are preserved in his name; an additional two hundred traditions about 'Aqiva', cited by other sages, also appear in the Talmud and Midrash.

'Aqiva' was probably born in western Judea. He learned methods of scriptural interpretation (midrash) from Naḥum of Gimzo and studied with R. Eli'ezer Hurqanos (who initiated him into mysticism) in Lydda and with R. Yehoshu'a ben Ḥananyah in Peqi'in (Judea). His own school (beit midrash) was located in Bene Beraq.

Far removed from the world of learning as a youth, he is described as a shepherd, but he was motivated to study Torah by contemplating the world around him and by his wife Raḥel, daughter of the rich Kalba' Savu'a'. Several traditions relate how 'Aqiva' left his wife for twelve or thirteen years to study with the aforementioned teachers, returning with thousands of students, to whom he publicly expressed his gratitude for his wife's support and encouragement, saying, "Much hardship has she endured with me for the sake of the Torah" (Avot de-Rabbi Natan 6).

'Aqiva' flourished as a scholar and teacher at the end of the first century CE. He traveled with Gamli'el II to Rome and was sent by the patriarch to Babylonia. Following Gamli'el's death, 'Aqiva' played a crucial role in scholarly and public life. Traditions speak of his large number of pupils (300; 12,000; 24,000, according to different sources), including all of the outstanding authorities of the next generation. He enthusiastically supported the Bar Kokhba' Revolt, the only sage on record to have done so, calling Shim'on *bar Kokhba' "the king Messiah" (for which he was criticized by his fellow rabbis; Y., Ta'an. 4.7-8).

'Aqiva' emphasized love for God and for one's fellow man, declaring the commandment to "Love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev. 19.18) to be the great principle of the Torah. Like all of the sages, 'Aqiva' understood the Song of Songs to be an allegory for the love relationship between Israel and God (ensuring its incorporation into the biblical canon) but went even further in his praise of the book ("all Scripture is holy, but the Song of Songs is the Holy of Holies" [Yad. 3.5]), evidently considering the Song of Songs to be a mystical text; this may have influenced his views on marital love: "When husband and wife are worthy, the divine presence [shekhinah] abides with them" (Sot. 17a).

His role in halakhah was central. Many sources stress that the arrangement of halakhot in the Mishnah follows his own. Rabbi Yoḥanan ruled that any anonymous opinion in a mishnah is the majority opinion and attributed anonymous opinions to his teacher, R. 'Aqiva' (San. 86a). 'Aqiva's' rulings, or those of his students, are found throughout the Mishnah and even more so in the baraitot of both Talmuds. He based halakhic teachings on his interpretations of the Bible and derived laws from apparently superfluous words in the text, considering not only the content but also the language to be divine (see HERMENEUTICS), unlike his colleague R. Yishma'e'l ben Elisha', for whom a stylistic repetition was not a source of halakhah. The methods of interpretation of R. 'Aqiva' were possibly related to his mystical beliefs about the nature of the Torah.

No single event in the lives of the sages received as much attention in the sources as the martyrdom of 'Aqiva' during the Hadrianic persecutions, which inspired the concept of qiddush ha-Shem, the willingness to lay down one's life to sanctify God's name. Hadrian had forbidden the study of the Torah, but 'Aqiva' continued to teach; even while imprisoned in Caesarea, he continued to issue halakhic rulings. He was fayed to death when he was approximately ninety years old and was buried in Antipatris. The account of his martyrdom has been incorporated into the liturgy of Yom Kippur and Tish'ah be-'Av, in the dirge of the *Ten Martyrs.

AQUILA (2d cent. CE), proselyte who translated the Hebrew Bible into Greek while revising an earlier Greek translation, namely, that of *Theodotion. Theodotion's version was extremely literal and included numerous syntactical errors. It was influenced by Palestinian rabbinical exegesis, in particular the principles of interpretation of R. *'Aqiva' ben Yosef. The translation was meant to meet the demand for a version more in accord with the spirit of Judaism than the *Septuagint, since the latter translation had become the basis for the Holy Writ and beliefs of the Christian community. Aquila strove to avoid renderings that had become part of the Christian vocabulary. His version was widely used by Jews in Greek-speaking countries, and it is quoted in the Talmud. Aquila's version was also transmitted as part of Origen's Hexapla, but on the whole, very little of his translation has been preserved. The Talmud identified Aquila with Onkelos (see TARGUM).

'ARAKHIN (עֲרָכִין; Values or Worths), tractate in the Mishnah order Qodashim, consisting of nine chapters, with related material to be found in the Tosefta and the Talmud Bavli. 'Arakhin deals with the laws of vows to the Temple concerning persons or land (Lv. 27). Persons may not themselves be consecrated, but their monetary worth may be pledged to the Sanctuary, and the tractate outlines different methods of evaluating the monetary worth of a person. The consecration of land or immovable properties in Erets Yisra'el is subject to various restrictions outlined in 'Arakhin, designed primarily to safeguard the special bond between a person and his home or ancestral inheritance. The text of the Talmud Bavli tractate was translated into English by Leo Jung in the Soncino Talmud. See also ESTIMATES.

ARAMA, YITSHAQ (c.1420–1494), Spanish rabbi. He was among the Jews expelled from Spain in 1492, and he died in Naples or Salonika. Influenced by Christian example, he adopted the practice of delivering philosophical sermons, and his discourses on the weekly Torah readings and the Five Scrolls form the basis for his best-known work, 'Aqedat Yitshaq. The work has 105 chapters, each divided into two parts: in the first, he examines a philosophical idea in the light of biblical and rabbinical texts; the second part is a biblical commentary in which the difficulties and questions from the text are resolved with the help of the philosophical approach expounded in the first part. Arama believed that God could suspend the laws of nature and perform miracles. The natural world is ruled by the laws of nature, but humans, created in the image of God, also have power over nature. Although Arama had a philosophical bent, he put religious truth before philosophical truth. He believed in various methods of Bible interpretation but stressed that the plain meaning was primary. He postulated three basic Jewish tenets, namely, belief in Creation, in the Torah, and in reward and punishment in a future world. His book was extremely popular and was imitated by subsequent philosophic preachers. It was first printed in Salonika in 1582; a condensed English translation by E. Munk appeared in Jerusalem in 1986. Arama wrote commentaries on Proverbs and on the Five Scrolls, as well as a polemic on the relationship between religion and philosophy.

ARAMAIC, North Semitic language closely related to Hebrew. Its written use is documented in Syria from the ninth century BCE; it appears slightly later in Babylonia, where it seems gradually to have ousted the Babylonian-Assyrian language from everyday speech. Under the Achaemenids, Aramaic became the administrative language of the western half of the Persian empire (Imperial Aramaic), and as such appears in the documents of the Jewish military colony at Elephantine (see YEB) in Egypt (6th cent. BCE). In all probability the use of Aramaic in portions of the biblical books of Ezra and Daniel also represents this Imperial Aramaic, although Biblical Aramaic is somewhat modernized in spelling and grammar. The use of Aramaic as a trade language (lingua franca) and as the everyday language of mixed populations spread widely. In Second Temple Palestine, Aramaic replaced Hebrew as the language of everyday speech. It was probably brought back from Babylonia by the returning exiles. The original Canaanite script of early Hebrew was changed to the more widespread Aramaic (square) script. Documents of the period could be written in either language, sometimes even a mixture; the Jewish marriage document, the *ketubbah, then formulated, is still written in Aramaic. The vernacular of Palestine was probably Aramaic. The Aramaic translations of the Bible (see TARGUM) may have been for the benefit of those who did not understand Hebrew or may have been viewed as a commentary on the Bible, containing additional material and read in Aramaic to distinguish it from the original text, which was always read first. In some places local Aramaic dialects developed into literary languages, the most important being Syriac. Among Jews, a number of such literary dialects evolved at various places and times: early Judean Aramaic, preserved in inscriptions and in some texts of the Dead Sea Scrolls; the Aramaic of the Targums, which differs from one to the other; the Galilean dialect of the Talmud Yerushalmi; Samaritan Aramaic; the Aramaic of the Talmud Bavli; the later Babylonian Aramaic of the ge'onim; the Aramaic of the Zohar; and the modern spoken Aramaic of the Kurdish Jews of northern Iraq, particularly the Zakho dialect, which was used in religious works. As a language of religious importance, Aramaic has been considered only slightly inferior to Hebrew. Although, according to the rabbis, "the ministering angels do not understand Aramaic" (Shab. 12b), Aramaic penetrated into, for example, the *Qaddish, the *Kol Nidrei, and the Haggadah of Pesah (Ha' Lahma' Anya'). The Aramaic Targum Onkelos to the Torah acquired a sanctity almost equal to that of the original, expressed in the halakhic obligation to read the weekly portion in private "twice in Hebrew, once in the Targum." When, in the tenth century, the community of Fez abolished the recitation of the Targum, the scholar Yehudah ibn Quraish wrote a treatise pointing out the importance of this reading. Under the influence of the Zohar, Aramaic became the principal language of Jewish mysticism. The Lurianic movement and Hasidism introduced further Aramaic prayers into the liturgy. Above all, the position of Aramaic was assured by its use in both the Talmud Bavli and the Talmud Yerushalmi.

ARAMEANS, group of *Aramaic-speaking Semitic tribes who settled in the Fertile Crescent, particularly in the Syrian region, in the last two centuries of the second millennium BCE. They established a number of kingdoms north of Israel, among them, Aram-Zobah (defeated by King David), and Aram-Damascus (often called simply Aram), the principal Aramic state during the ninth and eighth centuries BCE. The Arameans adopted the Phoenician alphabet and carried it throughout the Near East and, via the Persians, to India; their scribes in the service of the kings of Assyria made Aramaic the international language of diplomacy and commerce.

When Sargon II of Assyria (721–705) successfully put down the revolt led by Jehobad of Hamath, the Arameans ceased to exist as a nation. From that time on the designation Aramean, as applied, for example, to Jews in fifth-century BCE Elephantine (see YEB), referred to persons whose spoken language was Aramaic.

Apart from spreading their language to the extent that it became the international tongue of western Asia even before the Persian period, the Syrian Arameans exercised comparatively little cultural influence on the surrounding peoples; this applied equally to their religion, though exceptions can be found; for example, in the introduction of the Damascus cult in Jerusalem by Ahaz (2 Kgs. 16ff.; 2 Chr. 28.3) and in the Elephantine papyri. The Arameans worshiped both their own traditional gods and those of the areas in which they settled (e.g., Phoenician, Hittite, and Assyrian deities); the chief god of the Syrian Arameans was Hadad. Although the Israelites and Arameans were bitter enemies from the time of David and many conflicts between them are recorded in Kings, they were regarded as a single family in patriarchal times; Aram was the homeland of Abraham, to which his family looked for their wives (cf. Dt. 26.5). At one time it appears that the Israelite religion exercised a certain influence in Aram (see the story of Naaman in 2 Kgs. 5 and the names of certain Aramean rulers, for example, Jehobad).

ARBA' AMMOT (אַרְבַּע אַמּוֹת; four cubits), one of the classical measures of distance. An ammah is a halakhic measure of distance of between eighteen and twenty-four inches, the distance between the elbow and fingers of an average-size person. Four ammot are thus between seventy-two and ninety-six inches. The measure of four ammot is the applicable distance of control over one's property, place, and courtyard. Thus, the area around a person within a radius of four ammot has the same legal status as his property, assuming he has physical dominion over it. The Talmud Bavli states that one acquires control over items within four ammot even without express intent to acquire possession, whereas the Talmud Yerushalmi requires an express declaration of ownership in order to acquire possession of property within this distance.

ARBITRATION (Heb. borerut), the determining of a dispute between parties by a mediator chosen or agreed to by them. The Talmud discusses whether in civil disputes the application of the strict letter of the law (the method said to be favored by Moses) is preferable to an attempt to reach a compromise between disputing parties (said to be favored by Aaron). Both views are argued with considerable vigor; in the end, however, R. Yosei's view, that "it is forbidden to effect a compromise, and whosoever does so is a sinner," is rejected in favor of the view that "to effect a compromise is praiseworthy" (San. 6b). The law of arbitration is a consequence of this ruling (Shulḥan 'Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 12.2). Arbitration takes place either before a duly constituted beit din, with the litigants given the right to demand the disqualification of any of the rabbis, or through what is called zabla' ve-zabla' (a phrase made up of the initial letters of the sentence, "One chooses [an arbitrator] to represent him, and the other does likewise"), whereby each litigant chooses an arbitrator, and these two arbitrators agree on a third arbitrator, independent of the wishes of the litigants. The decision of the arbitrators is final. In most western battei din, rabbis rule on disputes in accordance with the arbitration laws of their respective countries, so that their decisions are enforceable in the civil court.

In the State of Israel, a law of arbitration based in part upon Jewish law was adopted in 1968.

ARCHISYNAGOGOS (Gr.; head of the synagogue), title of the honorary official who supervised the religious aspects of synagogue affairs; used frequently in Hellenistic and Roman Jewish communities during the last centuries BCE until about 300 CE (the Talmud Bavli translates the title as parnas*). The archisynagogos was the spiritual head of the community and was considered inferior only to the talmid hakham* in Jewish learning. The archisynagogos was responsible for regulating services, selecting the ba'al qeri'ah*, ba'al tefillah*, and those who would preach. The archisynagogos may have been responsible for constructing the synagogue building. He represented the community in its dealings with the secular authorities. He was not necessarily a person of great learning, but his office demanded an extensive acquaintance with ritual and liturgical practice. It is possible that once elected he served until retirement or death. The title might even have been hereditary, passed down from father to son. It is also found as a title of honor applied to women and even children.

ARISTOBULUS (2d cent. BCE), Jewish philosopher who lived in Egypt probably during the reign of Ptolemy VI Philometor (180-145) and of whose works only fragments survive. From these fragments, Aristobulus emerges as an exegete eager to expound on the wisdom of the Torah and present it to Jewish and non-Jewish readers. He explained, for example, that seemingly anthropomorphic biblical expressions (e.g., "the hand of God") should not be taken literally but interpreted allegorically (hand actually means power), since God has no physical form. While Aristobulus borrowed his ideas and his interpretive techniques from various Greek philosophers, he insisted that the Greek writers themselves, including Homer, Hesiod, Pythagoras, Socrates, and Plato, had been familiar with the Bible (which they consulted in Greek translations supposedly prepared long before the *Septuagint) and borrowed many of its precepts.

ARISTOTELIANISM, a philosophy that entered Jewish circles during the ninth and tenth centuries, largely through Arabic translations; later medieval Jewish philosophers also benefited from Hebrew translations of Arabic editions. Although the available versions were somewhat abbreviated, they preserved Aristotle's basic intent. Jewish reaction to Aristotle was, therefore, based on accurate understanding. Aristotle's influence on Jewish theology and philosophy first became predominant in the work of Avraham *ibn Daud in the twelfth century and reached its fruition and classic statement in the work of Moses *Maimonides, to whom Aristotle had "reached the highest degree of intellectual perfection open to man," except for prophetic inspiration.

The effects of Aristotelianism on Jewish thought were profound and lasting. Aristotle's philosophy gave new scope and discipline to the reasoning capacities of the mind, and the medieval Jewish philosophers were quick to apply it to the basic notions of religion (revelation, faith versus knowledge, immortality, etc.). On the one hand, Aristotelianism offered the possibility of a purer, less primitively anthropomorphic conception of God; on the other hand, it was admitted, even by Maimonides, to harbor dangers. Jewish rationalism wholeheartedly adopted Aristotle's views on the incorporeality, pure actuality, and eternity of God, but it had to reject his theory of the eternity of the universe and of God as the unmoved mover. God the creator could not be considered coeval with the universe, and God as an active force was not the philosopher's passive and unmoved mover. Since Aristotle's teachings could not be held to disprove the biblical view of God's creativity, it was maintained that Judaism was intellectually justified in retaining its ancient position of believing in creatio ex nihilo.

Aristotle's influence proved effective in changing both the general mood of Jewish philosophy and some of its particulars. Jewish philosophers now went to great pains to prove what in its own terms required no proof, namely, revelation. In so important an issue as individual providence, Maimonides supports Aristotelian views as against Jewish tradition, in holding that divine providence operates on behalf of the human species rather than the individual. Maimonides explains miracles by building them into the original divine order of things. Through Maimonides, Aristotelianism exerted a continuing influence on Jewish thought until the seventeenth century.

ARK, SYNAGOGUE. See ARON HA-QODESH.

ARK OF NOAH. God commanded *Noah (Gn. 6.14–16) to build an enormous three-storied ark of gopher wood coated with bitumen. By inhabiting the ark, Noah, his family, and specimens of all animal life were saved from the *Flood. A parallel Babylonian legend refers to an ark of considerably larger proportions built by Utnapishtim in order to escape the evil design of the gods. The main difference between the craft in the Mesopotamian epics and the ark in the biblical narrative is that the latter is rudderless and floats on the waters without the aid of a helmsman (who is brought aboard in the Mesopotamian narrative), since God is the protector of Noah and his family. Rabbinic literature (e.g., San. 108b) adds more details to the biblical description of the ark and elaborates on the moral concern of the story. The ark is said to have been built from cedars planted a hundred twenty years before the flood in order to grant humanity an ample opportunity for repentance.

ARK OF THE COVENANT (Heb. aron [chest] ha-berit, short form of aron ha-berit YHVH [Ark of the Covenant of the LORD], also called aron ha-'edut [Ark of the Testimony], aron YHVH [Ark of the LORD], and aron ha-Elohim [Ark of God]), essentially a portable chest; the most sacred object in biblical religion, the primary purpose of which was to represent the presence of God (Ex. 25.10–22, 37.1–9). Though rabbinic interpretation and medieval commentaries tended to unite the separate biblical traditions of the Ark into a single account, three distinct schools of thought can be detected.

According to the Priestly tradition, the Ark was built of acacia wood and measured 2.5 × 2.5 × 1.5 cubits. It was overlaid inside and out with pure gold, and its top was surrounded by a gold rim. Two carrying poles were inserted into gold rings on the sides of the Ark and were never to be removed. The 'edut (testimony) received from God (Ex. 25.21, 40.20; Lv. 16.13) was placed in the Ark. The 'edut is never precisely described, though in Exodus 31.18, 32.15, and 34.29 it seems to be associated with the tablets of the Law. In any case, it must have been some piece of physical evidence of Moses' meeting with God, and it lent its name to the Tabernacle as a whole ("the Tabernacle of the 'edut"; Ex. 38.21; Nm. 1.50). An inseparable part of the Ark was its elaborate lid, the solid gold kapporet (etymology unclear: some translate simply "cover"; others, "mercy seat"). This consisted of two golden cherubim with outspread wings, upon which the divine Majesty was said to be enthroned. The Ark was permanently kept shrouded in the darkness of the inaccessible inner sanctum; view and touch were prohibited and presumed fatal. Even for transport from place to place, extreme precautions were taken in order to prevent unauthorized approach to, or sight of, the Ark (Nm. 4.1–20). Both as a sort of divine footstool and throne (see, e.g., Jer 3.16–17; 1 Chr. 28.2) and as a receptacle for the "relic" of God's revelation, the Ark has its counterparts in ancient Near Eastern tradition; for instance, it is thought that treaty documents were occasionally deposited at the feet of the image of the deity. A third role, however, seems to be exclusively biblical: the Ark served as the meeting place between God and Moses, the divine voice emanating from between the wings of the cherubim and dictating all of the commands of the Law (Ex. 25.22; Lv. 1.1; Nm. 7.89; see GIVING OF THE TORAH).

The non-Priestly, "epic" tradition pictures the Ark more as a divine palladium, upon which the warrior God "rides" seated upon his cherubim (1 Sm. 4.4). No mention is made of a Tabernacle or of anything placed in the Ark; the Ark was carried in the open, in full view of the Israelites but at a distance ahead of the camp, on their march through the wilderness (Nm. 10.33–36) and in their battles of conquest (Nm. 14.44; Jos. 6). It was believed to be extremely powerful (Ps. 132.8): as long as it remained positioned in the Jordan River, the waters ceased their flow (Jos. 3–4); when it was captured by the Philistines, Israel was defeated in battle, but the Philistines suffered a dire plague until they returned the Ark to the Israelite camp (1 Sm. 4–6); and when touched or gazed upon by unauthorized persons, it struck them dead (1 Sm. 6.19; 2 Sm. 6.6–8). This view, too, is paralleled in ancient Near Eastern texts. The Ark was housed in a series of temporary tents; eventually King David had it brought to Jerusalem (2 Sm. 6), where it was later installed in the innermost sanctum of the Solomonic Temple (2 Sm. 7; 1 Kgs. 6.19, 8.1–11).

Deuteronomy relates that Moses constructed a simple wooden ark, for the sole purpose of housing the tablets of the Law. He assigned to the Levites the sacred task of carrying the Ark (Dt. 10.1–8); later, at the end of Moses' lifetime, the Torah book he wrote was also deposited in the Ark, alongside the tablets, entrusted to the safekeeping of the Levites (Dt. 31.9, 25–26). Deuteronomy thus anticipates the role of the Holy Ark (aron ha-qodesh*) in later Judaism, though the term "Holy Ark" appears in the Bible only once, at the end of Chronicles (2 Chr. 35.3). The Ark ultimately disappeared; there was no Ark in the Second Temple.

ARMILOS, eschatological figure who appears in geonic literature. The origin of the name, of which there are many variants, is obscure. It may be a corruption of Romulus, the mythical founder of Rome, or of Ahri-man, the Persian god of evil, who wages incessant war against Ahura Mazda, the spirit of good. Sa'adyah Ga'on, in his summary of eschatological traditions (Emunot ve-De'ot 8.6), describes Armilos as the king of Edom (Christian Rome), who at the end of days will slay the Messiah, Son of Joseph, conquer Jerusalem, and cruelly persecute the Jewish people until his final defeat by the Messiah, Son of David. A similar account is given by Ha'i Ga'on, who regards the war with Armilos as preceding that with Gog and Magog. Other sources (Midrash va-Yosha', Nistarot de-Rabbi Shim'on ben Yohai) refer to Armilos as the successor to Gog and Magog. Armilos is depicted as a monstrosity: his head is bald, his forehead leprous; one of his eyes is large, the other small; he is deaf in the right ear; his right arm is maimed; his left hand is two-and-a-half-ells long. In some late pseudepigraphs, Armilos is said to be the horrendous offspring of evil men, or Satan. Armilos claims to be the Messiah, or even God, and is accepted as such by the sons of Esau but is rejected by the Jews. In the ensuing struggle, the Ephraimite Messiah and a million Jews are slain, but Armilos is vanquished by God or the Davidic Messiah. In addition to Ezekiel's Gog and Magog, and the Persian Ahura Mazda and Ahriman, the composite Armilos legend appears to have been influenced by the Christian Christ and Antichrist and certain pagan myths.

ARON HA-QODESH (אֲרוֹן הַקֹּדֶשׁ; among Sephardim called Heikhal [pronounced Ekhal in some Spanish and Portuguese communities]). Originally the term aron referred to the *Ark of the Covenant in the Tabernacle, and thereafter in the Temple, in which the two tablets of the Law were kept (Ex. 25.10ff., 37.1ff.). Over the course of time, it came to be used for the shrine or closet—often in a specially built recess—in which the Torah scrolls are kept in the *synagogue. There was often a niche on either side of the ark for prayer books. In Talmudic times, the ark was referred to as tevah (chest; Ta'an 2.1) and was portable, carried (sometimes wheeled) into the synagogue only when needed for the service. It is the custom in the west to build the ark into (or leave it free-standing in front of) the wall facing east, in the direction of Jerusalem. In Israel the ark is placed in the direction of the Temple mount. Hence the ark is the synagogue's most important architectural feature and is usually beautifully designed and ornamented. In Ashkenazi and some other synagogues, a curtain (parokhet; Ex. 27.21) is hung before the ark. In front of it is a raised platform reached by steps (see BIMAH). The platform was used by priests when pronouncing Birkat ha-Kohanim, while solemn oaths were sworn before the sacred ark. In modern times, originally in Reform temples, the platform was enlarged to incorporate the reader's desk and a lectern, an arrangement that eventually was employed also by Conservative and many Orthodox congregations. In Classical Reform temples, the ark was not necessarily in or along the wall facing Jerusalem. The eternal lamp (ner tamid*) is placed above the ark. The tablets of the Law are a popular decoration of the ark and the parokhet. The opening of the synagogue ark (see PETIḤAH) for the purpose of taking out or returning the Torah scrolls on the occasion of public reading is conducted in solemn ceremony, with the congregation rising to its feet. The ark is regarded by Jewish law to be the holiest part of the synagogue, to the extent that one may not sell an ark even to build a synagogue (Meg. 3.1)—such an action would be considered a "decline in holiness" (Rashi on Meg. 26a). The ark plays a central role in prayer, in addition to its use as the receptacle for the Torah scrolls. Thus it is customary to open the ark for the recitation of several of the more important prayers, with the congregation rising to its feet. In some ancient and North African and eastern synagogues, multiple arks (two or three or even more) are placed next to each other along the eastern wall.

ARRABY MOOR, official title of the chief rabbi of Portugal, dating back to at least the thirteenth century. In addition to his religious duties, the araby moor was charged with overseeing all communal funds and the funds of orphans that had been entrusted to guardians. He was also responsible for the conduct of all Jewish leaders—both laymen and rabbis. To prevent him from assuming too much power, he was not permitted to appoint rabbis without the approval of the community involved or to waive the payment of any taxes or levies. The last araby moor, Simon Maimi, was tortured to death in 1497, in an attempt to force him along with all other Portuguese Jews to convert. The position of araby moor was largely analogous to that of the rab de la corte* in Spain.

ART. The earliest written records of Judaism's attitude toward art are to be found in the Bible. The passages concerning the building of the Tabernacle (Ex. 31.1–6, 35.30–36.2) emphasize the importance of its esthetic component. Its chief architect, Bezalel, is endowed with divine wisdom and inspiration that enables him to fulfill God's mandate. This positive approach toward art is moderated by other biblical statements that suggest that the creation of certain images may constitute a form of idolatry. The most significant texts to deal with this theme are: the second commandment (Ex. 20.4), which decrees "You shall not make for yourself a sculptured image or any likeness of what is in the heavens above, or on the earth below, or in the waters under the earth" and (Ex. 20.20) "With Me, therefore, you shall not make any gods of silver, nor shall you make for yourselves any gods of gold."

The conflicting biblical attitudes toward art are reflected in the divergent views expressed by the rabbis regarding various forms of art throughout the centuries. Because the second commandment's statement concerning the creation of graven images is immediately followed by the statement "You shall not bow down to them nor serve them," the rabbis interpreted the second commandment as an injunction against art made for the purpose of idolatry. Despite a popular misconception, based on the second commandment, that denied the existence of art among the Jewish people, art produced and owned for decorative purposes was never comprehensively prohibited by rabbinical authorities. Early rabbinic discussions concerning the permissibility of images centered on the text of Exodus 20.20. In interpreting this passage, the rabbis prohibited the depiction of angels, dragons, the sun, moon and stars, as well as the four figures of the divine chariot from the prophet's vision (Ez. 1). These images were singled out because they were considered to be the attendants of God and because the viewer might be tempted to worship them ('A. Z. 42b-43b). Under certain circumstances, however, these forbidden images were permitted. The Talmud relates that for educational purposes, R. Gamli'el was permitted to use diagrams with illustrations of the moon (R. ha-Sh. 24a-24b). This Talmudic passage also includes a discussion concerning the depiction of the human face, which was prohibited because man was created in the image of God. Although the sources do not deal explicitly with the prohibition against the representation of God in material form, it appears to have been understood that the depiction of the deity was strictly forbidden (most probably based on Dt. 4.15-19).

The rabbis further distinguished between two-dimensional and three-dimensional art. With the exception of representations of the "attendants" of God, creating two-dimensional images on paintings, tapestries and illuminated manuscripts was deemed permissible. Three-dimensional images, however, such as signet rings and sculpture, elicited more controversy because of the idea that a three-dimensional art object appears lifelike and may cause the viewer to venerate it in a manner bordering on idolatry. *Maimonides ruled that all sculpture is permitted, except for the attendants of God and the human figure (Mishneh Torah, Sefer Madda, 'Avodah Zarah 3.10). This was the position of many other prominent rabbis, including *Ya'aqov ben Asher, who systematically laid out these prohibitions in his legal code (Arba'ah Turim, Yoreh De'ah 141). He added the further clarification that it is only a fully sculpted human figure, comprising both head and torso, that is prohibited.

The rabbinic approach to synagogue decoration varied dramatically at different times and in different places. Beginning in the first century, synagogues in Erets Yisra'el and throughout the Diaspora were often elaborately decorated. The walls of the synagogue of Dura-Europos, in Syria (3d cent. CE), were adorned with an extensive cycle of biblical illustrations. Additionally, many synagogues, built from the fourth through the sixth centuries, contain mosaic floors filled with both Jewish and Greco-Roman elements, including images of biblical personalities, mythological figures and zodiacal illustrations. An indirect rabbinic stamp of approval for this practice can be found in a genizah fragment published by J. N. Epstein (Tarbiz 3 [1931]). This text, of a previously unknown passage from the Talmud Yerushalmi

('A. Z. 42c-d) states that "in the days of Rav Yoḥanan [3d cent.] they began to paint on walls and he did not prevent them" and "in the days of Rav Abun [4th cent.] they began to make designs on mosaics and he did not prevent them."

Other rabbis were less tolerant. In the twelfth century, Elyaqim ben Yosef of Mainz insisted that the stained glass windows be removed from a synagogue in Cologne because they contained two-dimensional images of lions and serpents (Mordekhai, 'Avodah Zarah 840). Rabbi Yosef Karo, quoting R. Me'ir of Padua, expressed concern that it may appear as though Jews were bowing down to the images which decorated the synagogue. He consequently suggested that all sculptured images which directly faced the worshipers be eliminated (Avqat Rokhel 63, 65). With regard to tapestries, he ruled that a curtain hung before a Torah ark may contain images, even human, provided that the image was not heavily embroidered and thus remained only two-dimensional (Avqat Rokhel 66). Rabbi Mosheh Trani, his colleague, decreed that it was improper for a Torah ark to be decorated with two carved lions (She'elot u-Teshuvot 30). Even the rabbinic authorities, who technically permitted two-dimensional art, expressed concern that the decorative images may distract the attention of the worshiper from his prayers. Maimonides recommended that if an individual is standing in prayer before a decorated wall or tapestry, he should avert his eyes so as not to disturb his concentration (Teshuvot ha-Rambam 215 [Jerusalem, 1958-1961]). Similarly, R. Yitsḥaq ben Mosheh of Vienna recalled seeing in his youth, images of trees and birds covering the walls of the synagogue of Meissen. He believed that such decoration ought to be forbidden as the pictures detracted from concentration on prayers (Or Zaru'a, 'Avodah Zarah 43b). Medieval rabbinic authorities voiced comparable concerns regarding illuminated Hebrew manuscripts. Although R. Me'ir of Rothenburg did not directly prohibit the practice of illustrating Hebrew manuscripts, he strongly discouraged the decoration of prayer books because he believed that the worshiper would be unable to concentrate properly on his prayers (T., Yoma 54a). Nevertheless, many of the extant medieval Hebrew prayer books are replete with decorative and figurative images.

An examination of a variety of art objects produced and owned by Jews reveals that the actual practice of the Jews may have been at variance with rabbinic consensus (see CEREMONIAL OBJECTS; TORAH ORNAMENTS). In the seventeenth century, R. Avraham di Botton of Salonika was questioned concerning the growing phenomenon of decorated ketubbot* (marriage contracts). He stated that even though these documents may contain images of the bride and groom, as well as depictions of the sun and the moon, they need not be destroyed (Lehem Rav 15). This view was reiterated in the eighteenth century by R. Yitsḥaq Lampronti, the chief rabbi of Ferrara. Recent rabbinical rulings by R. Mosheh *Feinstein in his work Iggerot Mosheh (Yoreh De'ah II 55) and by R. Avraham Yitsḥaq Kook (see KOOK FAMILY) in his work Iggerot ha-Re'ayah (vol. 1, 10) demonstrate the continuing attention given to the issue of art and images on the part of Orthodox rabbis. The prevailing tendency today is toward a liberal interpretation of the laws regarding painting and sculpture.

Despite the ambivalence expressed by rabbinic authorities throughout history, art has played a critical role in enhancing the Jewish religious experience. Jews expressed themselves through a variety of art forms, including synagogue architecture and decoration, ceremonial objects, manuscript illumination, paintings, and funerary art. The diversity of art objects extant indicates that Jews have consistently adopted and adapted the artistic elements of the dominant culture in which they lived. Moreover, the prevailing artistic attitudes of the host country frequently played an important role in defining the concurrent Jewish approach to art. In Islamic regions where depiction of the human figure was frowned upon, or even prohibited outright, Jews conformed to popular custom and avoided the use of figures as well. In European countries, however, where no such stricture was imposed, Jews often created figural art.

The Temple and its implements have served as a source of imagery for many works of Jewish art in subsequent centuries. The only known artifact extant from the First Temple is a miniature carved ivory pomegranate with an inscription dedicating it to the house of the Lord. Coins minted by Jews during the First Jewish Revolt (66–70) contain a representation of the façade of the Temple on the obverse side; on the reverse, a lulav and etrog are depicted. Other early artifacts of Jewish art consist primarily of funerary art. Gold-glass discovered in Roman catacombs of the third and fourth centuries was decorated with Jewish symbols such as the Menorah, the Ark, and various Temple implements. Additional examples of Jewish funerary art include ossuaries and sarcophagi that were embellished with floral motifs and symbolic religious elements. The earliest extant decorated Hebrew manuscripts were produced in the late tenth and early eleventh centuries. These works, written in Egypt, contain elaborately ornamented pages, but no figural art, an influence of the surrounding Islamic culture. Beginning with the thirteenth century, almost all decorated Hebrew manuscripts were produced in western Europe, especially in Germany, France, Italy and on the Iberian Peninsula. These books, comprising Bibles, liturgical works, legal codes, and philosophical, literary and medical texts, constitute the largest body of Jewish artistic expression from the Middle Ages. Many of these books contain figural imagery, in keeping with the artistic norms of the European countries in which they were produced. Ceremonial objects, including Sabbath lamps, Hanukkah lamps, circumcision tools, Purim and Pesah objects, ceremonial cups, and Torah ornaments were created by Jews or commissioned from contemporary artists. Paintings of rabbinic figures are extant from the seventeenth century and were widely disseminated in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The nineteenth century also ushered in a popular demand by middle-class Jews for genre paintings depicting Jewish festivals, ceremonies, and smaller details of daily Jewish life. In the contemporary period, Jews have continued to integrate art into all aspects of their religious life, and artists have incorporated modern techniques and styles into the ceremonial objects currently being produced.

ARTAPANUS (2d cent. BCE), Jewish writer from Egypt about whom very little is known and of whose work, On the Jews, only a few abridged fragments survive. These fragments deal with the Egyptian phases in the lives of Abraham, Joseph, and especially Moses and are of a highly legendary character. Artapanus's main aim seems to have been to stress the Jews' contribution to Egyptian culture: Abraham taught the Egyptian king astrology; Joseph embarked on extensive agrarian reforms; and Moses invented boats and weapons, taught the Greek mystic poet Orpheus, conquered Ethiopia, taught the natives to circumcise themselves, and, most surprising, taught the Egyptians how to worship their sacred animals. Subsequently Moses led the Jews across the Red Sea and out of Egypt. Artapanus's work, which is unique in its mixture of Jewish, Egyptian, and Greek elements, may have been known in an abridged form to *Josephus Flavius.

ARTIFICIAL REPRODUCTION TECHNIQUES. The first reference to artificial insemination in Judaism appears in the Talmud, in a passage dealing with the permissibility of a marriage between a high priest and a pregnant virgin (Hag. 15a). The Talmud attributes the virgin's pregnant condition to bathing in water into which a man's semen had previously been ejaculated. Apparently the marriage is permitted, and the conclusion is that artificial insemination by a donor (AID) does not constitute adultery or any other form of prohibited sexual relationship, since it does not involve active sexual intercourse. According to the majority of modern authorities, therefore, a child who is the product of AID is not a mamzer*. Nevertheless the practice is generally frowned upon, because of its wider implications, that is, the possibility of incest between the AID child and the sperm donor's offspring. Another implication of AID is that the child follows the lineage of the donor, and not that of the mother's husband. The AID son of a kohen will not therefore be a kohen, nor will his mother be exempt from the law of the levirate marriage in the event of her husband's death. The preservation of secrecy regarding an AID individual's conception is clearly incompatible with the requirements of Jewish law, and this fact accounts for a large part of the rabbinic opposition to the practice. Even so, based on a rabbinic ruling of Elliot N. Dorff, the Conservative Movement has permitted donor insemination on condition that either the identity of the donor be made known to the couple and child or, short of that, that enough information about his genetic makeup and character be made known to them as possible. This condition is not only imposed in an effort to avoid the possibility of incurring the genetic diseases or defects that come with consanguineous unions; it is also intended for the psychological benefits of giving the child information about his or her genetic roots and a better understanding of some of his or her interests and talents. Moreover, the Conservative ruling requires the couple to undergo counseling to deal with the psychological issues that arise from the asymmetry of their genetic relationship to the child: the spouse who did not contribute biologically to the creation of the child may experience jealousy and feelings of alienation from the other spouse or from the child, and so counseling is necessary. According to the Conservative ruling, though, neither of these issues is sufficient to prohibit donor insemination or egg donation. Orthodox decisors permit artificial insemination by the husband, although some authorities only permit it as a last resort. According to one authority, the mitsvah to "be fruitful and multiply" is not fulfilled except by means of sexual intercourse, but most maintain that it is. Surrogacy is the subject of debate among contemporary halakhic authorities, since, in addition to problems such as the possibility of incest, the issue of establishing maternity also arises where the fertilized egg is placed into the womb of a surrogate mother during gestation. Some authorities adopt the view that the method by which the child came into the world is irrelevant to the fulfillment of the mitsvah of procreation, and a prohibition on in vitro fertilization would prevent the husband from carrying out a religious obligation and threaten the continuation of the marriage. In general, Reform Judaism allows for artificial reproduction techniques. Fetal reduction is permitted according to Jewish law. See also SURROGACY.

ARYEH LEIB OF SHPOLA (1725–1811), popular leader of Ukrainian Hasidism. A man of relatively little education, he served as beadle in Zlotopolye, a small town in Podolia. In his later years he attracted a significant following as a saint and wonderworker. During his youth, he had once met Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov and had reportedly received his blessing. From Zlotopolye he moved to nearby Shpola and became known as the Shpolar Zayde (Grandfather of Shpola). When *Nahman of Bratslav moved to Zlotopolye in 1800, he came into direct conflict with the Shpolar Zayde, and fierce verbal battles ensued between the two leaders. It is possible that Nahman chose Zlotopolye precisely to show his opposition to the popular "tsaddiqism" that the Shpolar Zayde represented. The conflict died down after Nahman moved to Bratslav in 1802. Aryeh Leib of Shpola typified the simple Hasidic holy man, more highly reputed for miracles than for learning, a well-known figure especially within the Ukrainian heartland of Hasidism.

ASAPHITES, temple guild of singers and musicians headed by Asaph, the son of Berechiah, a Levite, who, together with his relatives Heman, son of Joel, and Ethan, son of Kushaiah, was put in charge of providing both instrumental and vocal music to accompany the procession of the Ark of the Covenant from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15.17–24). According to 1 Chronicles 15.19 and 16.5, Asaph was among the cymbal players, while according to 1 Chronicles 16.7, King David put Asaph in charge of the music, both vocal and instrumental, that accompanied the daily sacrificial worship "before the Ark of the Covenant." The First Book of Chronicles 25.2 mentions the sons of Asaph, or Asaphites, who were members of the guild. The authorship of Psalms 50 and 73 through 83 is attributed to the members of this guild. In Ezra 2.41 (Neh. 7.44) temple singers and Asaphites are synonymous.

'ASARAH BE-TEVET (עֲשָׂרָה בְּטֵבֶת), the tenth day of the Hebrew month of Tevet and one of four minor fasts relating to the destruction of the Temple. In Zechariah 8.19 it is referred to as "the fast of the tenth [month]," counting Nisan as the first month. Historically, the fast of Tevet commemorates the beginning of the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem in 586 BCE, which led to the capture of the city and the destruction of the First Temple (2 Kgs. 25.1; Jer. 52.4; Ez. 24.2). Like other minor fasts (except *Tish'ah be-Av), the fast of Tevet begins at sunrise on the morning of the day itself. Selihot are read during the morning services. The appointed Torah readings for the day are Exodus 32.11–14 and Exodus 34.1–10 in the morning and afternoon, and in the Ashkenazi tradition Isaiah 55.6–8 is the haftarah* in the afternoon service. The fast of Tevet is the only fast that may be observed on a Friday, because of the reference in Ezekiel 24.2 to "this self-same day," which stresses the precise date of the enemy siege.

In recent years, the Israeli chief rabbinate declared 'Asarah be-Tevet as "World Qaddish Day," a day on which *Qaddish and memorial prayers are to be recited for the victims of the Holocaust whose dates of death are unknown.

ASCENSION OF ISAIAH, apocryphal work of composite origin, extant only in an Ethiopic version, although Greek, Latin, and Slavonic fragments have also been found. In its present form, the book is the work of a Christian author, but it is based in part on earlier Jewish material. Its first half (chaps. 1–5) describes how Isaiah was executed by King Manasseh, who had the prophet sawed in half with a wooden saw. The description includes a detailed account of Isaiah's prophecy, in which he foretold future events, including the arrival of Jesus. While the prophecy is, at least in part, a Christian interpolation, the story of Isaiah's martyrdom is also echoed in the Talmud, and there is little doubt concerning the work's Jewish origin. It probably was written in Hebrew, sometime between the second century BCE and the first century CE. The second part of the Ascension of Isaiah (chaps. 6–11), describing Isaiah's vision, is entirely Christian in origin.

ASCETICISM, the term is derived from a Greek word, meaning "exercise" or "training," used in connection with athletics. Philosophers then applied the word to moral and spiritual training, and from there it passed into religious usage, signifying the practice of religious austerities to expiate past sins or to achieve spiritual perfection. The dominant tendency in Judaism does not encourage asceticism, since the body is not considered as inherently evil. The pleasures of this world should not be suppressed but enjoyed in moderation and with gratitude to God. The only ascetic practice formally prescribed is fasting. The *flogging that pious persons undergo on the eve of Yom Kippur is not so much ascetic flagellation as a symbolic expiation of transgressions for which the law prescribes the punishment of stripes; moreover, the ceremony is not general but is left to personal piety. According to one rabbinic dictum, man will be accountable at his judgment for permissible pleasures deliberately rejected (Y., Kid. 4.12). A similar view is expressed by R. El'azar ha-Qappar, who explains the sin-offering of the *Nazirite (Nm. 6.11) as an expiation of his guilt in "denying himself the use of wine which the Torah permits," adding that "if a man who only denies himself wine is termed a sinner, how much more so is this true of one who is an ascetic in all things" (Naz. 19a). One of the main forms of asceticism, *celibacy, is ruled out by the first precept, "Be fruitful and multiply" (Gn. 1.28), and celibates are traditionally barred from certain religious functions. When under the crushing blow of the destruction of the Temple, "large numbers in Israel adopted ascetic practices, binding themselves neither to eat meat nor to drink wine," R. Yehoshu'a ben Hananyah opposed them vigorously (B. B. 60b). Ascetic tendencies nevertheless existed at all periods and often dominated Jewish piety, especially in certain sectarian circles. The ascetic practices adopted by the *Essenes and related sects in the Second Temple period went far beyond the discipline of holiness enjoined by the Pharisees. *Karaitic asceticism was exemplified by the *Avelei Tsiyyon. Medieval moralist and mystical literature bears witness to the increasing importance of the ascetic ideal. The subject is discussed at some length in Hovot ha-Levavot by *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda'. Asceticism, he holds, is necessary for the purpose of controlling man's passions and purifying his soul from earthly dross. Only an ascetic can achieve that solitude and abandonment to God that leads to the ultimate purpose of the religious life, the perfect love of God. Bahya agrees that Nazirites and saints are a minority, a kind of spiritual counterpoise to the majority who tend to lose themselves to the world, and he concludes that the form of asceticism most in keeping with the precepts of the Torah consists in leading a life of moderation while participating in the world with all its struggles and temptations. Moses *Maimonides' teaching of the Golden Mean (Hilkhot De'ot 2) is strongly influenced by Aristotelian ethics, and his doctrine of moderation is far less severely ascetic than the widely read penitential tracts of *Yonah ben Avraham Gerondi, for example. Mystic circles have always practiced ascetic disciplines, and the preparations of the Merkavah mystics involved strict fasts and other practices. It was mainly the *Kabbalah, particularly in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, that developed traditional asceticism into a system of mortification in which penitential and mystical motives combined. Much of the ascetic tradition survived also in *Hasidism, in spite of the original Hasidic teaching that communion with God was to be attained not through mortification but through *joy. Modern Jewish writers, in keeping with the tendency of the age, generally emphasize the affirmation of *life in Judaism and treat asceticism as an alien or at least marginal phenomenon.

'ASEH (אָסע; do!), a positive commandment; normally the term refers to a positive biblical commandment as opposed to a positive rabbinic commandment. Most positive commandments entail an action, such as praying, waving a lulav, or repaying debts; however, there are a number of positive commandments the primary purpose of which is to prevent an activity. These commandments are referred to as issurei 'aseh. Other positive commandments merely correct violations of negative commandments, such as the obligation to return what one has stolen. There is no sacrificial penitence explicitly mentioned in the Bible for the nonfulfillment of a positive commandment, although some assert that an 'olah sacrifice is brought in such a case. There are 248 positive commandments among the 613 mitsvot in the Pentateuch according to calculations performed in the Middle Ages. See also COMMANDMENTS, 613; Lo' TA'ASEH; MITZVAH.

'ASERET HA-DIBBEROT. See TEN COMMANDMENTS.

'ASERET YEMEI TESHUVAH (עֲשֶׂרֶת יְמֵי תְשׁוּבָה; Ten Days of Repentance), penitential period commencing with *Ro'sh ha-Shanah and concluding with *Yom Kippur. According to the Mishnah (R. ha-Sh. 1.2), 1 Tishrei (New Year) is the Day of Judgment. The Talmud, however, explains (R. ha-Sh. 16b) that on Ro'sh ha-Shanah final judgment is passed only on the "perfectly righteous" and the "utterly wicked"; judgment of all others is suspended until Yom Kippur on the tenth of the month. As a result, the entire ten-day period became one of penitence, in anticipation of that final judgment. Only slight changes are made in the liturgy for the days between the two festivals. The reading of seliḥot* continues during these days. Prayers for life are inserted in the 'Amidah; the wording of the third and eighth benedictions is changed to emphasize the concept of the sovereignty of God; and the 'Amidah is followed by the recitation of *Avinu Malkenu. The ten days constitute a period of solemnity though not of mourning; fasting, where it is practiced, has a purely penitential character. It became customary prior to Yom Kippur to visit cemeteries, to make contributions to charity, and, among some penitents, to undergo a symbolic flagellation. The Sabbath during these days between Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur is called Shabbat Shuvah (see SABBATHS, SPECIAL).

ASHAMNU (אָשָׁמְנוּ; We Have Trespassed), an ancient litany of *confession listing twenty-four sins in alphabetical order; also referred to as Viddui Zuta (the Small Confession). The alphabetic arrangement dates from geonic times, tracing back to amoraic formulations of confession. It is now said in all synagogue services on Yom Kippur and is part of almost all public confessions. The worshiper beats his or her breast upon reciting each sin as an expression of contrition.

ASHER, the eighth of Jacob's children and his second by Zilpah, Leah's maidservant (Gn. 30.12–13). The official territorial allotment of the tribe of Asher was along the plain of Acre, extending into present-day Lebanon (Jos. 19.24–31), an area which was said to be rich in bread (Gn. 49.20) and oil (Dt. 33.24). From the references to Asher in the inscriptions of the Egyptian kings Seti I and Ramses II (14th–13th cents.) it would appear that Asher was one of the earliest settled tribes in Canaan. Yet, over the course of time, the Asherites did not maintain a firm hold in the north, and major Asherite clans amalgamated with the central hill-country tribes of Benjamin and Ephraim. This phenomenon is highlighted primarily by the genealogy list in 1 Chronicles 7.30–40, in which the eponyms Serah, Malchiel, Shelesh, and Shual all correspond to known locations in Ephraimite or Benjaminite territory.

ASHERAH, name of Canaanite mother goddess, the consort of El. In a popular fertility cult she appears as the female counterpart of Baal. Many clay female figurines found throughout the Levant are assumed to represent Asherah. In the Bible the term asherah generally refers to a wooden pole or tree planted as a cultic installation beside altars and steles (matsevoth) at shrines (bamot). The injunction to destroy the asherot is explicit in Deuteronomy (7.5, 12.3) and Exodus (34.13) and was carried out by certain reforming kings (i.e., Asa, Hezekiah, and Josiah). Opinion is divided on the extent and nature of Asherah worship in Israel. Her cult was especially active during the reigns of Ahab (1 Kgs. 16.32–33) and Manasseh (2 Kgs. 21.7). A number of inscriptions from Kuntilet Ajrud in northern Sinai mention "Yahweh and his Asherah," referring either to a consort or a cultic object.

ASHER BEN DAVID (13th cent.), kabbalist and the nephew of R. Yitshaq ben Avraham ha-Nahor, leader of the early kabbalistic school in southern France at the beginning of the thirteenth century. According to an epistle of R. Yitshaq, Asher was sent by his uncle to Gerona in Catalonia to join and direct the kabbalists in that center. Rabbi Yitshaq was critical of them for publishing their teachings, and Asher was probably sent to prevent them from doing that. He was one of the first kabbalists to include ethical teachings in his writings, a practice that became dominant in the Gerona school. He wrote a treatise on the *thirteen attributes, Perush Shelosh-Esreh ha-Middot, which includes both kabbalistic and ethical teachings, and several other works of a similar character.

ASHER BEN MESHULLAM OF LUNEL (12th cent.), southern French rabbinical scholar, known as the Ro'sh of Lunel. He devoted himself to continual study, fasted, refrained from eating meat, and was not concerned with worldly matters. Nonetheless, he was praised for his positive attitude toward science by Yehudah ibn Tibbon, who copied an ethical work for him. Some of Asher's responsa and decisions have been preserved in the writings of later rabbis, and he wrote a treatise on the laws of excommunication and an essay on the laws of the festivals. His Sefer ha-Mattanot was apparently part of a comprehensive work dealing with the entirety of Jewish civil law.

ASHER BEN SHA'UL OF LUNEL (12th–13th cent.), French rabbinic scholar. Asher, younger brother of kabbalist Ya'aqov Nazir, should not be confused with Asher ben Meshullam of Lunel. Asher ben Sha'ul is the author of Sefer ha-Minhagot, of which only a part has been published from an incomplete manuscript. The second book of its kind written in Europe, and an invaluable aid to migrating populations, it cataloged the local customs of Narbonne and Lunel, tracing their sources to the Talmud and Midrash, to the writings of the ge'onim, and to French and Spanish rabbinic authorities.

ASHER BEN YEHI'EL (c.1250–1327), codifier; also known as Ro'sh and Asheri. The leading pupil of R. *Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg, he was regarded as the spiritual leader of German Jewry after R. Me'ir's death; but when conditions in Germany grew too difficult, he left the country and from 1305 headed the rabbinical academy in Toledo, Spain. His authority was recognized by Jews of all communities, and his responsa (of which over 1,000 have been published) constitute a rich source of the halakhic development and Jewish history of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. His simple and logical glosses on the Talmud were collected and printed in all subsequent editions of the Talmud. His legal decisions were noted for their intellectual independence and rigor; he ruled that a dayyan must give decisions on the basis of the Talmud alone, while later authorities could be quoted only as additional support. He bitterly opposed any attempt to give secular subjects precedence over religious ones and prohibited secular studies to students under the age of twenty-five. In his teachings, Asher combined the acumen of the Ashkenazi tosafists with the logic and orderliness of the Spanish scholars. His chief halakhic work, the compendium Pispei ha-Ro'sh, covers all halakhic practices of his time and was the basis for all subsequent codes, including the authoritative Arba'ah Turim of his son *Ya'aqov ben Asher.

ASHI (c.352–427), Babylonian amora' regarded as the spiritual head of the Babylonian community and for fifty-two years head of the *Sura academy, which he re-established at Mata Mehasya. His great achievement was the redaction of the *Talmud Bavli on the basis of the amoraic discussions of the Mishnah. He is credited with having produced two versions of this redaction (B. B. 157b), which according to tradition appeared thirty years apart. The amoraic traditions Ashi received were fixed and edited but lacked any order or arrangement; he clarified and sifted the various versions to determine their final form with the assistance of the circle of scholars that he established in Mata Mehasya. Further additions—including Ashi's views—and changes were introduced before the compilation was definitively concluded, but the form underwent no material modification. Hence, according to Bava Metsi'a 86a, "Rav Ashi and Ravina end[ed] the [period of] decision [hora'ah]," which is generally understood to mean that subsequent authorities are duty-bound to follow their legal rulings. Ashi himself owned numerous estates (Git. 49a; Mo'ed Q. 12b; Ned. 62b) and lived in luxury (Ber. 31b). His wealth, status, and the positive political and economic situation of the Jews under Yesdegard II permitted Ashi to devote his life to his formidable project. He did this in a spirit of humbleness (San. 7b) and devotion to his studies as well as his students (B. B. 3b). There is ongoing scholarly discussion as to the extent of his editorial activity and which stratum of the Talmudic text is the result of his redaction and which of subsequent generations of amora'im and the later savora'im.

ASHKAVAH (אֲשָׁכָוָה; Laying to Rest), Sephardi term for the prayer for the dead, also called Hashkavah, corresponding to the Ashkenazi *Yizkor. It is said on the Sabbath, festivals, and Mondays and Thursdays (see SHENI VA-HAMISHI) by an individual, not as part of the congregational liturgy, after he has been called to the reading of the Torah. It is also recited after burial and on anniversaries of death (both at the cemetery and in the synagogue), where it corresponds to the Ashkenazi

*El Male' Raḥamim. Different texts are recited for men and for women.

ASHKENAZI, BETSAL'EL (1520–1591), rabbi and Talmudic scholar in Cairo and Jerusalem; one of the outstanding authorities of the sixteenth century. Born to an Ashkenazi family in Erets Yisra'el, he studied in Jerusalem and in Cairo under *David ben Shelomoh ibn Avi Zimra, whom he succeeded as chief rabbi of Cairo. In Cairo Ashkenazi founded a yeshivah that numbered Yitshaq *Luria among its pupils. As chief rabbi Ashkenazi became embroiled in a conflict with the nagid (head of the Egyptian Jewish community), as a result of which the office of nagid was abolished. In 1588 he went to Jerusalem where he was appointed chief rabbi. He traveled widely as an emissary, and under his influence Purim was fixed as a day for sending contributions to Jews in the Holy Land.

His best-known work is Shittah Mequbbetset (also called Asefet Zeqenim; sections of which have been published, but not the entire work), a compilation of comments on the Talmud by Ashkenazi and Sephardi scholars from the end of the geonic period onward, which has preserved much early material otherwise unknown. Both this work and his introduction to Talmudic study, Kelalei ha-Talmud (published by A. Marx in Festschrift David Hoffman [Berlin, 1914]), exhibit the characteristics of Ashkenazi, as distinct from Sephardi, Talmudic scholarship: compilations, notes, comments, and critical rather than unified, methodical expositions. Ashkenazi also studied and copied old manuscripts, publishing glosses on the Talmud and early commentators and often throwing light on correct textual readings. His responsa (Venice, 1595) reflect his social and judicial activities as chief rabbi. The first two responsa deal with the laws of tithes and terumot and reflect the rabbinical preoccupation with agricultural laws at that time in Erets Yisra'el.

ASHKENAZI, ELI'EZER BEN ELIYAHU (1513–1586), rabbinic scholar, legal decisor, and exegete. After studying with R. Yosef Taitazak in Salonika, he went to Egypt, where he served as a rabbi and judge from 1539 to 1561. He then lived in Famagusta, Cyprus, for fifteen years, served as rabbi in Cremona, traveled subsequently to Venice, and ultimately settled in Poland, where he served several communities, including Kraków. He published a commentary to the Book of Esther (Yosef Legah; Verona, 1576) and Ma'aseh Adonai (Venice, 1583), which seeks to find the morals of the stories in the Pentateuch. Ashkenazi brought expressions of Sephardi rationalism to Europe. Italian scholars, such as Eliyyahu of Pesaro and 'Azaryah ben Mosheh dei Rossi, noted his competence in languages and the sciences in addition to his Talmudic erudition, and his legal opinions were sought in Poland.

ASHKENAZI, TSEVI HIRSCH (1660–1718), rabbi and Talmudic scholar; known as Ḥakham Tsevi. Born in Moravia, he pursued his Talmudic studies in Salonika, where he came under the influence of Sephardi teachers and their methods. He served as hakham in Sarajevo, founded a study group in Altona, and was rabbi in Hamburg and Wandsbek from 1707 through 1709. In 1710 he was appointed chief rabbi of the Ashkenazi community of Amsterdam but became embroiled in quarrels with lay leaders of his own as well as the Sephardi community and was forced to leave in 1714. He died in Lwów shortly after being appointed rabbi there.

His collected responsa touch upon some of the most celebrated and controversial cases to confront the European rabbinate; for example, the nature of a *golem and whether it can be counted in a minyan, David *Nieto's "pantheist" sermon, questions pertaining to the differences between Ashkenazi and Sephardi custom, and the regulation of Jewish communal organizations.

When the Shabbatean theologian Nehemyah Ḥayon arrived in Amsterdam, Ashkenazi, together with Mosheh Ḥagiz (see ḤAGIZ FAMILY), conducted a campaign against him that involved rabbis all over Europe and the East. Ya'aqov *Emden, Ashkenazi's son, continued his father's anti-Shabbateanism. Ashkenazi's responsa are to be found in Responsa Ḥakham Tsevi (1712); Divrei Meshullam (1783); and Decision del Zevi Asqunazi, con su Bet Din . . . ASHKENAZI, YEHUDAH (18th cent.), *dayyan in Tiktin, Lithuania; son of Shim'on Ashkenazi, a scribe in Frankfurt am Main. Yehudah Ashkenazi is best known as the author of Ba'er Heitev, a commentary on the Shulḥan 'Arukh*. First published along with the Amsterdam edition of the Shulḥan 'Arukh in 1742, Ba'er Heitev is a digest of the major commentators to the Shulḥan 'Arukh who preceded Ashkenazi, along with the explanations, novellae, and rulings of other halakhists. Modern printed editions of the Shulḥan 'Arukh carry sections from Ashkenazi's Ba'er Heitev or Orah Ḥayyim and Even ha-'Ezer. The commentary by the same name and similar format to Yoreh De'ah and Ḥoshen Mishpat is the work of R. Zekharyah Mendel ben Aryeh Leib.

ASHKENAZI, YOSEF (1525–1572), rabbi in Europe and Erets Yisra'el and critical commentator on the Mishnah*, whose glosses are noted in such works as Shelomoh Adeni's Melekheth Shelomoh and Ḥayyim Yosef

David Azulai's Birkei Yosef. His devotion to Mishnah study earned him the title Tanna' of Safed, and he is said to have studied Mishnah with R. ASHKENAZIM. The name Ashkenaz is first mentioned in the genealogical table of the descendants of Noah (Gn. 10.3) as that of the eldest son of Gomer the son of Japheth. Although the Targum and the Midrash, probably on grounds of assonance, identify the third son, Togarmah, with Germany, in the geonic period (which began in the 9th cent.) the name Ashkenaz became identified with Germany (as Sefarad in Ob. 1.20 was identified with Spain). In tenth-century Christian Europe, Jewish communal and social life as well as Jewish scholarship developed in the three Rhineland communities of Speyer, Worms, and Mayence. From there, they spread westward to France through Rashi and his descendants and eastward to Germany and Bohemia, establishing a unity of custom, ritual, and law differing from the parallel tradition developing in what was then Muslim Europe—Spain. As a result, the word Ashkenaz, from having a purely geographical connotation, became applied to a religious and cultural tradition of those who followed the custom that had its origin among German Jews. With the drift of German Jews over the eastern borders of their country into the Slavonic lands in the sixteenth century and the adoption by the Jews in those countries of the traditions (and language; see YIDDISH) of the German Jews, the word Ashkenazi received an even wider connotation. The distinctions are not fundamental—all liturgies have much in common—but there are differences in wording or prayers and in the additional prayers (piyyutim, etc.) introduced. The Ashkenazi pronunciation of *Hebrew differs from the Sephardi, and their musical traditions also diverge. The deviations in practices are so considerable that Ashkenazim could not accept Yosef Karo's codification, the Shulhan 'Arukh, based on Sephardi custom, until it was supplemented by Mosheh *Isserles's Mappah. Although in the purely liturgical sphere there is a difference between the Ashkenazi ritual and the Polish variation, the word is generally applied to all Jews of European origin and customs—that is, to all Jews of the western tradition (apart from comparatively small groups of Jews of Spanish and Portuguese origin and tradition)—in the same way as the name Sephardi is generally applied to all Jews of eastern countries who follow the parallel Spanish tradition. Thus the Jewish communities of the United States, England, and the countries of the British Commonwealth are mainly Ashkenazi because of the largely Polish derivation of these communities. These two main divisions of world Jewry have persisted to the present. The Ashkenazi tradition was of intense devotion to *study, expressed most visibly in their yeshivot, and in the rigid observance of halakhah. However, with the advent of emancipation, the non-Orthodox movements emerged in Ashkenazi milieus. In parts of the western world, such as Latin America and France, the differences between Ashkenazim and Sephardim are still a factor in Jewish communal life, although these are lessening, partly as a consequence of intermarriage between the two communities. Many new prayer books, especially non-Orthodox, freely choose from both traditions.

Despite the efforts to weld the Jews of the State of Israel into an entity, the division into Ashkenazim and Sephardim remains marked in certain spheres. Israeli legislation provides for both an Ashkenazi and a Sephardi chief rabbi, and this is carried down to the rabbinate in the towns of Israel. Liturgical differences remain, although in the Israeli army a unified version of the prayers has been worked out. Before World War II, 90 percent of world Jewry was Ashkenazi, but as a result of the Holocaust and low Ashkenazi birthrates, this has dropped to under 80 percent. The population of Israel is almost equally divided between Ashkenazim and non-Ashkenazim.

ASHREI (אשרי; Happy Are They), the alphabetic Psalm 145, read daily in the Shafarit and Minḥah services, prefixed by two verses that begin with the word ashrei (hence, the reading is commonly called by that name) and ending with Psalm 115.18. The Talmud quotes the saying of R. Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos: "Whoever recites the 145th Psalm thrice daily is assured of entering the world to come" (Ber. 4b); the addition of the two introductory verses with the threefold repetition of the word ashrei may be connected with this. The line from the first introductory verse, "Happy are they who dwell in your house," may explain the ancient pious custom of spending an hour in the synagogue prior to the service. While each verse of Psalm 145 begins with a successive letter of the alphabet, the verse beginning with the letter nun is missing. However, the Septuagint, the Syriac translation of the psalm, and a text of the psalm found in the *Dead Sea Scrolls include such a verse. Ashrei incorporates congregational responses indicating its liturgical use in the Second Temple. The prayer is sometimes read responsively by the reader and congregation.

ASIDEANS. See HASIDEANS.

ASMAKHTA' (Aram.; אַסְמַחְתָּא; support), Talmudic term used in two unrelated contexts, in oral law and in civil law.

In Oral Law. An asmakhta' is a scriptural verse cited in support of an oral law but not meant to imply that that particular oral law actually derives from a scriptural verse. An asmakhta merely indicates some tie, however slight, between rabbinic legislation and scripture, thus demonstrating that rabbinic law was foreseen and alluded to in the Bible.

In Civil Law. An asmakhta is an undertaking that is legally flawed because of the lack of serious, deliberate intent (gemirat da'at) on the part of the promisor. Such flawed stipulations are those that are considered unreasonable and are connected with conditions of a contract. Thus, one who agrees to pay an exorbitant fine if he does not fulfill a specific condition of a contract is not bound by his stipulation, since he is considered to have promised without really intending to pay the exorbitant fine.

ASMODEUS (Heb. Ashmeda'i), name of an evil spirit. He is first mentioned in the Book of Tobit as the king of the demons, who fell in love with Sarah, daughter of Raguel, and slew all those who wished to marry her until Tobit, instructed by the angel Raphael (Asmodeus's chief antagonist), rendered him harmless and married her. A long account of Ashmeda'i appears in the Talmud (Git. 68a–b), relating how Solomon succeeded in capturing him and forcing him into service for the building of the Temple. Later aggadic legend depicts Asmodeus as a merry trickster rather than an evil demon, while according to some sources his influence is actually beneficent and is directed to guarding the moral order of the universe. The name Asmodeus seems to be derived from the Persian aesma daeva, the Zoroastrian “spirit of anger.”

ASSAF, SIMḤAH (1889–1953), rabbinic scholar and Jewish historian. Assaf was born in Luban, Belorussia, studied at the yeshivah in Tels, and was ordained in 1910. From 1914 to 1919 he taught at a modern yeshivah in Odessa, which he headed from 1915 to 1919. He then spent two years traveling and studying in Paris and Germany before moving to Jerusalem in 1921 as an instructor in Talmud at the Mizrahi Teachers' Seminary. When the Hebrew University of Jerusalem opened in 1925, Assaf was appointed lecturer on the geonic period; he became a full professor in 1936. He was active in administrative matters at the Hebrew University, serving as chairman of the Institute of Jewish Studies, as dean of humanities, and from 1948 to 1950 as rector. He also played an important role in public affairs after the establishment of the State of Israel, serving as a justice on the Supreme Court.

Assaf published several important critical editions of manuscripts and responsa of the geonic period, but his most important work is Meqorot le-Toledot ha-Hinnukh be-Yisra'el (1525–1943), a four-volume anthology of sources relating to Jewish education, exploring social and cultural history.

ASSAULT. The act of inflicting physical harm on another is punishable in Jewish law by lashes and violates the biblical prohibition found in Deuteronomy 25.3. The victim may also be entitled to compensation. Since Jewish law does not normally authorize two punishments for the same illicit act, the Talmud (Mak. 4b) derives from both hermeneutic rules and rules of logic that compensation is to be paid and lashes forgone. In reality, lashes were only administered in assault cases in which no monetary damages were due. In addition, Talmudic sages decreed in specific cases that additional fines were to be paid by one who commits assault.

By the Middle Ages, numerous taqqanot governed the different types of damages assessable in cases of assault. Although the Talmud appears to deny any post-Talmud beit din the authority to punish physically one who commits assault, such punishments were frequently meted out by medieval decisors under their exigency jurisdictional authority. For example, Yehudah ben Asher ordered the hands cut off of an assailant who assaulted a judge on a rabbinical court (Zirḥon Yehudah 58).

In order to be liable for monetary damages in the case of assault, no criminal intent need be demonstrated, although there is a dispute among the classical decisors as to whether one is liable for damage caused to another when there was no negligence at all.

Included in a special category of people who were exempt from paying damages caused by their assault were licensed doctors, a father or teacher disciplining a child, and a court officer in the course of his duties. So, too, one who consented to be assaulted waived his financial claim against his assailant.

ASSEMBLY, GREAT. See KENESET HA-GEDOLAH.

ASSEMBLY OF JEWISH NOTABLES, gathering in Paris, from 26 July 1806 through 6 April 1807, of one hundred and eleven Jewish lay leaders and rabbis summoned by Napoléon Bonaparte “to revive among Jews the civil morality weakened during their long debasement.” Believing that the emperor had their best interests at heart, leaders of French Jewry had earlier submitted a blueprint for the establishment of “rabbinical seminaries and other communal improvements. Before the assembly, however, Napoléon attacked the Jews as “a nation within a nation” that must be reformed through exceptional laws aimed at curbing their “evil practices” and transforming them into loyal “French citizens of the Mosaic faith.” With much pomp and circumstance, he therefore convened an “Assembly of the Israelites of France and the Kingdom of Italy” to give these deputies the appearance of willing collaborators.

The opening session, deliberately held on a Sabbath to test the assembly's religious character, produced two opposing camps—one "philosophic" and largely composed of Jews of Portuguese origin, the other "rabbinic" (Orthodox) and made up of Jews from Alsace-Lorraine, Avignon, and Italy. Abraham Furtado, the freethinking Bordeaux deputy, was elected president and secretly was told how Napoléon wished twelve questions (posed by the imperial commissioners) to be answered. During the months that followed, however, it was Joseph David Sinzheim, Strasbourg's erudite chief rabbi, who formulated authoritative replies on the Talmudic basis of dina' de-malkhuta' dina'* (the law of the land must be upheld when there is no clash with halakhah). The patriotism of French Jews was accordingly reemphasized, though they were forced to surrender their juridical autonomy; no religious sanction was given to mixed marriages. Once Napoléon became aware that the assembly's resolutions needed a supreme religious authority to make them operative, thus impelling Jews to "look upon France as their Jerusalem," he devised the mustering of a French Sanhedrin (see SANHEDRIN, FRENCH).

ASSI (3d cent.), Babylonian amora' from the town of Hutsal, near Nehardea. His authority was widely recognized throughout Babylonia, and a number of his ordinances are quoted in the Talmud. He appears to have headed his own academy, called Sidra' de-Assi (Y., Beits. 1.7). He was a contemporary of *Rav and often differed from him; many of their controversies having been recorded. He died shortly after Rav, that is, after 248 (Nid. 36b).

ASSI (3d–4th cent.), Palestinian amora' who, together with his colleague R. *Ammi bar Natan, were known to the Babylonian rabbis of the time as "the Palestinian judges." He was of Babylonian origin and studied in his youth during the lifetime of Shemu'el (died 254). He must have reached Palestine in the middle of the third century, since he studied under R. Hanina' and R. Yehoshu'a ben Levi, who probably died in the 250s. However, his main mentor was Yoḥanan (died 278), and after his death, with R. 'Ammi, he became the leading figure in the Tiberian rabbinate. He was a pious and charitable man, who had a special relationship with proselytes (Y., Hag. 1.7).

ASSIMILATION. The Talmud relates that during the captivity in Egypt the large majority of ancient Hebrews assimilated into Egyptian society; only a minority left Egypt for the desert and for their ultimate destination, the Promised Land. On the other hand, so long as Jewish independence prevailed, in the days of both the First and Second Temples, the Jewish majority assimilated many minorities into the Jewish people and the Jewish religion. The biblical Book of Ruth even makes the heroine of the story, who chose to follow her former mother-in-law to the land of the Jews from her native Moab, into the great-grandmother of King David.

The Hellenizers, whom the Maccabees defeated in Judea in the second century BCE, preferred Hellenistic culture and pagan religion to the ways and faith of their own people. Much more often, however, assimilation does not result from choice but is caused by force. For many centuries Jews were a persecuted minority, especially in Europe, and their religion was said to be the "synagogue of Satan." Conventional accounts of Jewish history in the Middle Ages are full of admiration for those who resisted conversion; many became martyrs rather than abjure their faith. In fact, even taking into account the murder of thousands by the Crusaders and other persecutors, the Jewish community in Europe was reduced to no more than ten or twenty thousand in the twelfth century because so many Jews chose to abandon this dangerous identity. This choice was always available in the Middle Ages: it was safe to convert to the majority religion and become part of the majority culture; remaining a Jew represented danger and the inevitability of persecution. No adequate study exists of the numbers of Jews who, generation after generation, fell away, but the proportion was significant.

The nature of assimilation changed in the seventeenth century. The purpose of the state was redefined in Holland and, soon, in the rest of western Europe. Government no longer existed to promote the true faith; it aimed to increase the wealth of the state. Therefore, Jews who brought money with them, or who were likely to increase economic activity, were allowed into major port cities and other economic centers. These Jews were soon mixing socially with non-Jews of their economic station. Through conversion and intermarriage, a number of great Jewish fortunes became the source of the wealth of titled families all over Europe. In the eighteenth century, the most modern ideologies made assimilation a virtue. The Enlightenment offered a vision of a regenerated society, free of ancient prejudices, in which everyone could participate as an equal. Jews were being asked to enter this brave new world by giving up their religion and identity. The enlighteners were as critical of Christianity as they were of Judaism, but the situation for Jews was different. Even after Jews and Christians would have abandoned their religion for a new society governed by reason, Frenchmen and Germans would still be living within their own culture. Jews would enter this new society only by leaving their minority culture behind.

In the nineteenth century, belonging to the organized Jewish community was no longer compulsory; it had become a voluntary act. *Reform Judaism proposed the near total abandonment of Jewish ethnic culture. Antisemitism, however, did not disappear in the new age; it became more virulent as the nineteenth century wore on. Some Jews turned to Zionism to normalize the Jews by reestablishing their own state. Even as they differed in their prescriptions for dealing with the threat of antisemitism, Reform Jews and Zionists agreed that the central problem of the Jews was their safety and their economic and political equality, not the preservation of their own culture. The majority of Jews, even so, clung to their inherited culture. Religion remained a stronger force among the Jewish masses, especially in eastern Europe, than any of the modern ideologies.

In the turbulent twentieth century, a third of world Jewry moved to new homes in the era of mass migration, a third were murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators during World War II, and the Jewish population of the new State of Israel grew from six hundred thousand to four million. At the end of this century, the clashing forces of assimilation and Jewish continuity remain powerful and intense.

ASSUMPTION OF MOSES, pseudepigraphous work known also as The Testament of Moses and extant, in mutilated form, in one Latin manuscript. The Latin text is a translation from a lost Greek version, but it is unclear whether Greek was the original language or a translation from a lost Hebrew or Aramaic original. As the work refers to Herod and his children, it probably was written in the early first century CE, and Erets Yisra'el is its most likely place of origin. It describes Moses' farewell words to Joshua, including a description of Israel's future history from the entry into Erets Yisra'el to the Roman period, the final judgment, and the salvation of Israel. This historical description is followed by Moses' attempt to encourage Joshua, who is terrified of the task entrusted to him.

ASSYRIA, an ancient region in Mesopotamia. It first appears in the historical record in the middle of the third millennium BCE in the form of a few autonomous city-states, chief among them Aššur and Nineveh (cf. Gn. 10.11–12), both located on the upper-middle Tigris (cf. Gn. 2.14). Both of these cities were part of the Old Akkadian empire of Sargon of Agade (c.2334–2279). While this foreign domination of Aššur continued under the Sumerian Third Dynasty of Ur (c.2112–2004), a turning point occurred at the end of that period when Aššur regained its independence and embarked upon a new age of political stability and economic prosperity marked especially by intensive commercialization. This period came to an end as a result of the Amorite invasion, when Aššur was conquered and an Amorite kingdom was established in all of Assyria (see AMORITES). This kingdom did not endure long, and most of its important territories and finally Aššur itself were eventually conquered by *Hammurabi of Babylon (1792–1750; see BABYLONIA). Sometime after the death of Hammurabi, Aššur and the other cities of Assyria regained their independence but came under the heavy influence of Hurrian expansionism; the major Assyrian site bearing witness to Hurrian influence is the city of Nuzi, which has yielded more than thirty-five hundred cuneiform documents. The period of the "dark ages" in Assyrian history continued for almost four centuries. The "awakening" of Assyria as a political and military power under Aššur-uballit I (1363–1328) and his successors was the prelude to the establishment of the Neo-Assyrian empire (911–609), the largest and most powerful empire the ancient Near East had yet seen. It is almost exclusively with reference to this empire that references to Assyria appear in the Bible. From the time of Shalmaneser III (858–824), the Hebrew people fought frequently against the Assyrians, and it was the armies of Assyria under Shalmaneser V and Sargon II that brought to an end the kingdom of Israel and deported many of its inhabitants. The prophets characterized the succeeding Assyrian invasions as divine scourges. Isaiah saw Assyria as the rod of divine ire destined to rule the earth but be broken by Israel (Is. 10.5ff.). His intuition was fulfilled in the sudden arrest of Assyrian progress before the gates of Jerusalem (701 BCE), and the subsequent Assyrian withdrawal probably assisted the prophet in impressing on the people his monotheistic message. Isaiah, Micah, and Zephaniah all looked on Assyria as the final enemy prior to the establishment of divine rule on earth.

ASSYRIAN EXILE, the mass deportation of Israelites from the northern kingdom of Israel to Assyria. An Assyrian policy of deportation of captive peoples is first attested in the ninth century, but only in the mid-eighth century, under Tiglath-pileser III, was there a two-way exchange of populations designed to prevent rebellion of conquered nations. The first recorded exile of Israelites from their land took place in 732 BCE after Pekah, king of the northern kingdom of Israel, joined the Arameans in rebellion against Assyria. Tiglath-pileser conquered the bulk of the kingdom of Israel, including Galilee and Gilead (2 Kgs. 15.29). Archaeological evidence of destruction is widespread at northern sites, such as Hazor and Megiddo, while Assyrian inscriptions list exiled captives. The territory of northern Israel was reduced to the territory of Samaria and its environs on Mount Ephraim. A few years later, Israel's last king, Hoshea, joined the Egyptians in an anti-Assyrian alliance. In response, Tiglath-pileser's son, Shalmaneser V, in 722 besieged Samaria and by 721 had conquered it (2 Kgs. 17.6). The Israelites from that region were exiled by his successor, Sargon II, in 720. Sargon's annals record 27,290 exiles. They were resettled on Assyrian lands, while captives of other nations were settled in Samaria (see SAMARITANS). A number of Assyrian documents contain biblical names probably belonging to exiles. The striking growth of Jerusalem at that time indicates that many belonging to the so-called ten lost tribes fled into Judah before the deportations. Others may have returned from Babylonia with the Judeans in 538 BCE. The theological evaluation of the Deuteronomist presents the Assyrian exile as punishment for the nation's idolatrous practices. Most of the exiles presumably assimilated into the peoples among whom they were settled, but legends of the survival of the lost tribes have continued to the present (see TRIBES OF ISRAEL).

ASTROLOGY, study that assumes and professes to interpret the influence of heavenly bodies on human affairs. According to the Talmud, R. Hanina' said, "The planet of a person decides whether he shall be wise or wealthy, and Israel has its planet." Rabbi Yoḥanan said, "Israel has no planet; as it is written [Jer. 10.2]: 'Thus says the Lord, Learn not the way of the heathens, and be not dismayed at the signs of the heaven, for the heathens are dismayed by them'" (Shab.156a). The opponents of astrological belief (R.Yoḥanan, R. Yehudah, Rav) confine themselves to denying this influence on Israel but do not deny its efficacy for others. The Midrash (Gn. Rab. 44.14) interprets Genesis.15.5 as meaning, "And he took him outside the scope of astrology," and has God say to Abraham, "You are a prophet and not an astrologer." There is ample evidence, however, that the more rational view was not accepted, despite the definite element of *determinism and absence of free will inherent in this belief. The sages held that by observance of the Torah the Jew could change the destiny decreed by the constellations.

Belief in astrology has been widespread throughout the ages, not only among the common people. References to it as both valid and reliable abound in rabbinical literature, and it was accepted without question by medieval authorities. In fact, it was held that, unlike animals, every human being is born under the influence of a particular planet (Shab. 53b, 146a). Rava' stated explicitly that "Length of life, children, and sustenance depend not on merit but on one's planet" (Mo'ed Q. 28a), and "lucky" days and periods are often taken into account. Among the outstanding medieval thinkers who endorsed astrology were Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, Shelomoh ibn Gabirol, Avraham bar Ḥayya' (who was criticized by Yehudah ben Barzillai al-Bargeloni for relying "on a Chaldean custom"), Avraham ibn Ezra, Nahmanides, as well as the kabbalists. The only medieval authority roundly condemning belief in astrology was *Maimonides, who included it in his code among such prohibited superstitions as witchcraft, sorcery, and soothsaying. Maimonides concluded his chapter on superstitions with one of his few statements in the Mishneh Torah in which he allowed his own views to prevail over the statements of the Talmud: "These and similar things are all lies and deceit . . . It is not fitting for Israel to be attracted by these follies or to believe that they have any efficacy. Whosoever believes that they are possible, though the Torah has forbidden their practice, is but a fool" (Hilkhot 'Akkum 11.16). The universal Jewish phrase of congratulation, mazzal tov (good luck; literally, a good constellation), is a relic of the belief in astrology. See also ZODIAC.

ASTRONOMY, like all sciences in ancient and medieval times, was studied for its religious implications, but for the Jews there was never any question of star worship; the stars as part of the heavenly host are themselves conceived as worshiping God. The stars also influenced terrestrial events (see ASTROLOGY). The Bible contains no reference to the science of astronomy, but many references show a knowledge of astronomy. The apocryphal Book of Enoch devotes several chapters to movements of heavenly bodies and to determining the relative length of nights and days. The necessity for the accurate fixation of the *calendar for purposes of determining the dates of the festivals made the authorities of the Mishnaic period adept in astronomy. Their main expertise was in determining which months were to be regarded as plene (full months of thirty days) and which as having only twenty-nine days. A full month was called "a month big with foetus" ('ubbar), and since the prerogative of fixing the new moon was jealously guarded by the Sanhedrin, the general name for astronomical calculations was sod ha-'ibbur (the secret of intercalation). Notable astronomers in Talmudic times included R. Yehoshu'a ben Ḥananyah, whose statement that a certain star "rises once in seventy years" has been taken to refer to Halley's comet, fifteen hundred years before its "official" discovery (Hor. 10a), and Shemu'el, who claimed that "the paths of heaven are as clear to me as the paths of [my native] Nehardea" but nevertheless pleaded ignorance of the incidence of comets (Ber. 58b). The Talmudic sages regarded a knowledge of astronomy as highly desirable for the study of Torah and even saw it as a religious duty for the wise (based on Ps. 19.1–2; cf. Shab. 75a). In the Middle Ages, the Jews, especially in Spain, were among the outstanding astronomers. See also COSMOLOGY.

ASUFI (אָסוּפִי), Talmudic term for a child found abandoned in a public place. The mystery surrounding the child's origin casts doubt on its lineage and it is, therefore, considered a "doubtful mamzer" with the result that he or she can marry neither a Jew nor another mamzer (Kid. 74a). The stigma of mamzerut, however, only applies to an asufi if there is no hint of parental care in the circumstances of the child's abandonment. Circumcision or abandonment in a safe public place, such as a synagogue, are evidence of such care, and the child is then treated as a regular Jew of untainted lineage (Kid. 73b; Maimonides, Laws of Forbidden Intercourse 15.31; Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 4.31).

ASYLUM. Biblical law grants the right of asylum to one who has committed accidental manslaughter. Almost immediately following the biblical command "You shall not murder" (Ex. 20.13) is the law "Whoever fatally strikes a person shall be put to death" (Ex. 21.12). This is followed by the double provision regulating asylum: "If, however, he did not do it by design . . . I will assign you a place to which he can flee, but if anyone schemes against his fellow, killing him deliberately, you must remove him from my altar" (Ex. 21.13–14). Biblical law thus recognizes two immutable principles: one who commits involuntary homicide is provided by God himself with a place of refuge; but the deliberate murderer cannot take refuge anywhere, not even at the altar in the Temple. This is distinct from the widespread view in the ancient world that altars grant those who touch them immunity from harm by conveying sanctity (see Adonijah's successful attempt in 1 Kgs. 1.50–51 and Joab's unsuccessful one in 1 Kgs. 2.28–34)—an idea that Torah law rejects.

All shedding of human blood must be expiated by the shedding of the blood of the killer, otherwise the spilled blood will leave an indelible stain on the land (Gn. 9.6; Nm. 35.33–34), endangering its inhabitants. This postulate stems from the theological premise that since man is created in God's image, the killing of a human being is tantamount to the murder of God. Yet there are times when this form of expiation is impossible or unthinkable (for example, when the killer is unknown [Dt. 21.1–9]; or when the killing takes place in war [Nm. 31]). Even in the case of an accidental killing, the victim's closest relatives, his "blood avengers, may attempt to realize their right to exact vengeance. Biblical law therefore provides an escape for the killer; he may take refuge in a designated asylum city ('ir miqlat). So long as he remains there, the blood avenger may not harm him; if he leaves, the blood avenger may kill him with impunity.

In order to guarantee that the right of asylum would be enjoyed only by those entitled to it, the law stipulates that only after the court has determined that the killing was accidental may the killer reside securely in the city of refuge. Furthermore, a deliberate murderer may not seek refuge, even in exchange for payment of a fine.

However, some death, even a symbolic one, is necessary to atone for the blood of the innocent victim. For this reason the law of Numbers 35 requires that the killer be confined to the asylum city until the death of the incumbent high priest. As the ritual representative of all Israel, his death formally atones for all unexpiated killing that has taken place during his tenure, after which the homicide may leave the city of refuge.

The land was divided into three equal parts, with one asylum city assigned to each district (Dt. 19.3). Ultimately, six cities were set aside for refuge, three on each side of the Jordan (Nm. 35.13–15; Dt. 4.41–43, 19.1–10). The Talmud Bavli interprets Numbers 35.6 to mean that all forty-eight Levitical cities were to be considered cities of refuge. The subject is treated in Talmud tractate Makkot*. There is no evidence of asylum after the First Temple period.

ATHALIAH (Heb. 'Atalyah; r. 842–836 BCE), queen of Judah. She was the disputed daughter of Omri, king of Israel, or Ahab (2 Kgs. 8.18), and she was the wife of Jehoram, king of Judah, and mother of his son and successor Ahaziah (2 Kgs. 8.26; 2 Chr. 22.2). According to 2 Kings 11 (cf. 2 Chr. 22–24), after her son was killed by Jehu, she killed all the candidates for succession but one, Ahaziah's infant son, Joash, and reigned for six years. She was responsible for introducing Baal worship during the reign of both her husband and son. A priestly coup in her seventh regnal year, led by Jehoiada and carried out in the Jerusalem Temple, enthroned Joash. Athaliah rushed to the Temple to try and stop the ceremony but was removed and killed.

ATHALTA' DI-GE'ULLAH (Aram.; אַתְּחַלְתָּא דִּי-גֵ'וּלְלָהּ, beginning of the redemption), Talmudic term (Meg. 17b) synonymous with the concepts of the ingathering of the *exiles and the restoration of the Jewish people to its land. Rabbinic sources compare Israel's future redemption to dawn breaking slowly on the horizon, then spreading its radiance far and wide (Y., Ber. 1.1; Sg. Rab. 6.16). This idea inspired Religious Zionist thinkers, such as Avraham Yitshaq Kook (see KOOK FAMILY), who spoke of the Balfour Declaration (1917) and Jewish settlement in Erets Yisra'el in terms of athalta' di-ge'ullah. A kindred expression, "the dawn of our redemption," has been used in the *Tefillah le-Shalom ha-Medinah.

ATONEMENT, a doctrine resting on the belief that there exists a relationship between individuals and God according to which God looks favorably on people and desires their well-being. That relationship is disturbed when humans fail to act in accordance with the will of God. God does not, however, desire the perdition of people for upsetting that relationship: "As I live, says the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked but that the wicked turn from his way and live. Turn you, turn you from your evil ways" (Ez. 33.11). Thus God desires the restoration of the desirable norm through the forgiveness of sin. Forgiveness depends on people's expiation of their sin, and it is that expiation that constitutes atonement. Atonement can be effected in a number of ways. It can be achieved through the payment of compensation for wrong committed, through suffering, or through the performance of certain rituals, but all of these presuppose accompanying *repentance and the rectification of one's way of life. The Hebrew word for atonement (kapparah) is derived from a legal term signifying "ransom" or "compensation" (paid, for example, by the owner of an ox that has gored a man [Ex. 21.30]) and from there passed into ritual and theological use. The Talmud insists that sacrifices were accepted as atonement only for those sins committed in ignorance or unwittingly, but that for those committed deliberately, no sacrifice could avail. Thus, an element of repentance was introduced into the sacrificial rite, which was an act of contrition. Among the common people, however, a tendency developed to regard the sacrifice in itself as a propitiatory offering that would avert divine wrath for a sin committed deliberately, and sacrificing could serve as an atonement for all sins. The prophets inveighed sharply against this belief, stressing instead the moral aspects in such passages as "Shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves a year old? He has showed you, O man, what is good, and what does the Lord require of you, but to do justly, and love mercy and walk humbly with your God" (Mi. 6.6–8) or the statement of Hosea, "Instead of bulls we will pay [the offering of] our lips" (Hos. 14.3). With the destruction of the Temple and the automatic abolition of the sacrificial system, these and similar verses formed the basis of the doctrine of the existence of alternatives to the sacrificial system. These alternative means of atonement can be effected through suffering, repentance, prayer, and good works. In the first category come the statements that "sufferings wipe out transgressions" (Y., San. 10) and "death wipes out transgressions" (Shev. 8b), though "death expiates together with repentance" (Yoma' 8.8).

Repentance, which must always include verbal *confession (viddui), is the broad highway to atonement, and rabbinical literature is replete with references to the efficacy of repentance; the effectiveness of *Yom Kippur depends on sincere repentance, and a preparatory ten-day period is assigned to suitable preparation (see 'ASERET YEMEI TESHUVAH). This applies, however, only to sins committed against God; atonement for a wrong against a fellow human involves the seeking of forgiveness and appropriate restitution (Yoma' 8.9). Virtually every aspect of "good works" is mentioned as a means of atonement, for instance, "now that there are no sacrifices, a man's table acts as an atonement" (Ber. 58a); "acts of kindness bring atonement" (R. ha-Sh. 18a); "Charity brings atonement" (B. B. 9a); and "good works avert the evil decree" (Ta'an. 16a). Repentance must at all times be accompanied by change of conduct, and sincerity is a basic component of atonement. Generally speaking, the doctrine of vicarious atonement plays very little role in Judaism, although suggestions of it are not entirely absent, as in the statement, "the death of the righteous atones [for the world]" (Lv. Rab. 20.7).

ATSILUT (אֲצִילוּת; emanation), term used by rationalists, esoterics, and mystics as a Hebrew translation of the philosophical (essentially Neoplatonic) concept of *emanation. The term is already found in the poetry of Shelomoh ibn Gabirol and Yehudah ha-Levi, and it appears throughout Yehudah ibn Tibbon's (see IBN TIBBON FAMILY) translations into Hebrew of philosophical works in the second half of the twelfth century. Rabbi Avraham ibn Ezra (followed by some Ashkenazi Hasidim) used the root d v q rather than a t s l to convey the same concept. Atsilut appears in the late-twelfth-century Baraiyta de-Yosef ben 'Uzzi'el and other treatises of the Unique Cherub circle, as well as in the works of the early kabbalists (but not in Sefer ha-Bahir).

The Hebrew term, when used by the kabbalists, is an example of the transformation of a philosophical term into a mystical symbol, which expresses the interrelationship between higher and lower divine powers. Among rationalists, the term denotes the actual process of evolvment of one spiritual realm from another. A treatise entitled Atsilut, of unknown authorship and date, reflects the older, pre-fourteenth century Kabbalah.

ATTAH EHAD (אַתָּה עֶחָד; You Are One), prayer of geonic origin that introduces the intermediate benediction in the Sabbath afternoon *'Amidah. While emphasizing the threefold uniqueness of God the Creator, his people Israel, and the holy day of rest, Attah Ehad also underlines the spiritual reward that Sabbath-observant Jews will have in the afterlife. It is based on a Midrashic interpretation of 1 Chronicles 17.21 (see tosafot to Hag. 3b). The sentence relating that the patriarchs enjoyed and rested on the Sabbath derives from a Talmudic tradition (Yoma' 28b; Gn. Rab. 11. 7–9).

ATTAH HAR'ETA LA-DA'AT (אַתָּה הָרַעְתָּ לָדַעַת), "It has been clearly shown to you [that the Lord, he is God . . .]", phrase introducing the biblical verses chanted responsively before all Torah scrolls are removed from the synagogue ark and carried in processions (haqqafot*) on the eve and morning of *Simḥat Torah. These verses, first recited by the cantor (or other worshipers in turn), are then repeated by the entire congregation. Ashkenazim chant them to a melody recalling the cantillation used for the Esther scroll on *Purim. A shorter sequence is read when Torah scrolls are taken from the ark on Sabbaths and other holy days. In the Sephardi, 'Adot ha-Mizrah, and Hasidic rites, this shorter sequence also begins with Attah Har'eta (Dt. 4.35); in the Ashkenazi rite it opens with Ein Kamokhah (Ps. 86.8).

ATTAH NOTEN YAD (אַתָּה נוֹתֵן יָד), a prayer in the confession (viddui) for the *Ne'ilah service of Yom Kippur, beginning, "You stretch forth your hand to sinners, and your right hand is extended to receive transgressors." This is followed by the prayer, Attah Hivdalta (You Have Set Apart). Both poems share a common theme: God always stands ready to forgive sinners if they repent in sincerity and turn away from violence and oppression. To that end, he has established Yom Kippur, because it is not his will to destroy evil-doers, but to pardon them once they return to him. These prayers, mentioned in Yoma' 87b, are found in all traditional and modern prayer books.

ATTAR FAMILY, a family of rabbis in Morocco.

Ḥayyim ibn Mosheh ibn Attar (1696–1743), rabbi and kabbalist. He was born in Salé, Morocco, to a family of Spanish origin. He settled in the important center of Meknes, where he became a kabbalist. Catastrophic events, including anti-Jewish decrees and a famine, awakened in him a determination to go to Erets Yisra'el. En route, in 1739, he was delayed in Leghorn, where he stayed to establish a large yeshivah. In 1741 he left Italy for Acre and eventually settled in Jerusalem, where he founded the Midrash Keneset Yisra'el, whose students were noted for their piety and asceticism, which included devotion to prayer and to making pilgrimages to the graves of famous rabbis. His yeshivah had an advanced and an elementary department, and 'Attar headed the former. He died only a year after reaching Jerusalem, but the yeshivah continued until 1866.

His Ri'shon le-Tsiyyon (Constantinople, 1750) was based on his educational method, which concentrated on the study of the poseqim*, particularly Maimonides. Or ha-Ḥayyim (Venice, 1742) is a commentary on the Pentateuch that was especially popular in Poland, where it was influential in Hasidic circles. Attar held that tradition should be accepted uncritically. Peri To'ar (Amsterdam, 1742) is his commentary on the Shulḥan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah.

Yehudah ben Ya'aqov ibn Attar (1655–1733), grandson of Ḥayyim ibn Mosheh ibn Attar; Moroccan rabbinical authority. He was born in Fez and earned his livelihood as a craftsman. In his early thirties he was already recognized throughout northern Morocco as an outstanding rabbi. After a short period in Meknes (1701–1704), he returned to Fez and became av beit din (head of the rabbinic court). One of his distinguished disciples, Ya'aqov *ibn Zur, described him as the greatest rabbi in the Arab world and praised him as an innovator in halakhah, particularly expert in the laws of ritual slaughter, and a fine preacher (darshan). In collaboration with Ya'aqov ibn Zur, Yehudah ibn Attar issued ordinances designed to protect the lower social classes. His published works include a collection of responsa called Beit Yehudah (Jerusalem, 1989), Minḥat Yehudah (Meknes, 1940), and Meqor Ḥayyim (Jerusalem, 1898), a compendium of the customs of the Fez community in matters of ritual slaughter.

AUFUFEN (Yi. oyfrufn; to be called up [to the Torah reading]), among Yiddish- and German-speaking Ashkenazi Jews, the calling up to the reading of the Torah of a groom on the Sabbath preceding his wedding. This festive occasion is often followed by a collation tendered by the groom's parents. In some Ashkenazi communities, the Aufufen is held two weeks before the wedding, while in Eastern communities, the groom is called to the reading of the Torah on the Sabbath after his marriage.

AUSTRITTSGEMEINDE (Ger.; secession community), German Neo-Orthodox community. In Germany in the second half of the nineteenth century, for tax purposes and other reasons, members of each religion had to belong to that religion's communal structure. Because the majority of German Jews of that era had adopted Reform Judaism, those Jews who still remained Orthodox felt themselves increasingly alienated from the local structure but were prevented by law from leaving it—unless they declared themselves as being “without religion.” Finally in 1876, despite opposition of the Reform Jews in Germany, the Prussian parliament passed its Austrittsgesetz (secession law), which specified that “a Jew is permitted to leave his local congregation, for religious reasons, without leaving Judaism.” This paved the way for a separate Orthodox communal structure, the Austrittsgemeinde, which at first consisted of the Adass Jeshurun congregation of Frankfurt, led by R. Samson Raphael Hirsch, and a number of small congregations in other locations. Although Hirsch led those who had left the organized community, not all Orthodox rabbis followed his lead. Indeed, the majority of Orthodox Jews remained within the general community structure, after receiving assurances that the community would guarantee them the independence to meet their religious needs. As Jews who belonged to the Austrittsgemeinde fled the German antisemitism of the 1930s, they established synagogues in different places, notably in New York and in Johannesburg, that bore the name Adass Jeshurun and that propagated the religious ideology of Samson Raphael Hirsch.

AUTO-DA-FÉ. See INQUISITION.

AUTONOMY, a form of self-government in which Jews, even though not living in their own sovereign land, were granted the right to control much of their own lives in the religious, judicial, and social spheres. The autonomy that Jews enjoyed at various times during the two thousand years of exile was almost always a group autonomy—individuals who belonged to the group were allowed certain specified rights—as opposed to territorial autonomy, in which those living in a certain territory have rights within that particular area. In most cases, whatever autonomy Jews enjoyed was the result of a grant by the governing authorities, which could be withdrawn at any moment. As early as the Greek and Roman eras, Jews in cities with large Jewish populations, such as Alexandria, enjoyed a considerable degree of freedom in shaping their lives. Later, in the Middle Ages, Jews were frequently granted various rights of self-rule by the reigning monarch or ecclesiastic, often after having made a direct contribution to the ruler's coffers or having provided some other benefit or service to him or his government. Jews generally enjoyed the right to determine for themselves those matters that affected them internally but were restricted in those areas that impinged on their contacts with others, such as trade or litigation with non-Jews. Certain actions that might be construed as “insulting” to the Christian religion were often forbidden. Thus there were regions where Jews were prohibited from leaving their homes during Christian religious processions or on certain Christian holy days.

In Islamic lands, Jews as well as Christians were considered “Peoples of the Book” and enjoyed a similar autonomy. A noteworthy example was Babylonia, where the head of the Jewish community (the exilarch) held a position of high honor in the general society, and the ga'on, the head of the academy, was recognized by the Sassanian rulers and subsequently by the caliphate.

Historically, Jewish life has been regulated by various autonomous bodies. Rabbinic courts of law were empowered to adjudicate in cases in which both litigants were Jews and to force their decision upon the litigants, using if necessary the threat of social and religious ostracism to ensure compliance. Jewish communal authorities had the right to assess each Jew his share of the communal tax burden and then force him to pay. The most powerful autonomous body until the *Emancipation was the qehillah, the local community council, which by means of taqqanot* (enactments) filled an ongoing legislative function within each community.

A change occurred with emancipation, when Jews were granted the rights and duties of all other citizens. Those Jewish communal organizations that now exist in the Diaspora are voluntary autonomous associations. See also COMMUNITY.

AUTOPSIES. The dissection of a corpse counters various biblical prohibitions (Hul. 11b; B. B. 154a) and is only permitted for the sake of saving human life or if civil law requires it to resolve a legal matter. The leading rabbinic responsum in this area is by R. Yehezqel Landau, who was prepared to permit a post-mortem examination on the victim of a bladder disease if the results would be immediately beneficial for another patient suffering from the same illness. Since the chances of such a direct and immediate benefit were very remote, Landau did not allow the autopsy in this particular case. According to R. Ya'akov Ettlinger, it is permissible to carry out a post-mortem if the deceased had freely consented to such a procedure during his lifetime. Modern authorities permit autopsies for the purpose of establishing the cause of death and in the case of hereditary diseases. Corneal grafts are also permitted. Rabbi Moshe Feinstein allowed post-mortem needle biopsies of various organs, since such procedures do not constitute desecration of a corpse. It is also permissible to remove samples of blood through a needle puncture and to carry out a post-mortem peritoneoscopy. The trend among modern halakhists is to relax the strict prohibition on post-mortems that are not immediately therapeutic in nature but are nevertheless reasonably likely to be instrumental in the saving of human life. All body parts used in a post-mortem must, wherever possible, be returned to the family for burial. In the State of Israel, since the passage of the Anatomy and Physiology Act in 1953, autopsies have been the subject of intensive parliamentary and public debate. This law gives fairly wide powers to physicians to order an autopsy, but in practice the wishes of the family are taken into account when an autopsy is under consideration. In general, Reform Judaism permits autopsies.

AV (אָב), fifth month of the Jewish religious year, eleventh of the civil year. The rabbis said "When Av comes in, gladness must be diminished" (Ta'an. 4.6), and the month is also called Menaḥem (Comforter). "Av" either is a reference to the divine father (av) comforting his people after the destruction of the Temple, which took place in that month, or to the name of the Messiah, who, tradition says, will be born on 9 Av. Av always has thirty days, and its zodiacal sign is Leo; the name of the month is not mentioned in the Bible and is derived from the Akkadian language.

One Av is the date observed as the anniversary of the death of Aaron. The first nine days of Av (see BEIN HAMETSARIM) are a sorrowful period culminating with 9 Av, *Tish'ah be-'Av, a fast day commemorating, among other Jewish calamities, the destruction of both Temples. The Sabbath before 9 Av was at one time known as the Sabbath of Punishment and later as the Sabbath of Vision (Shabbat Ḥazon, from the opening word of the prophetic portion from the Book of Isaiah). It became customary during these nine days not to eat meat or drink wine (except on the Sabbath) or perform marriages; however, festivities—such as a circumcision feast—are observed as usual during this period. Fifteen Av was a day of rejoicing in the Second Temple period (see TU BE-'AV).

AVADDON (אָבַדּוֹן; place of destruction), a poetic synonym for the nether world. Etymologically, avaddon is derived from the verb meaning "to be destroyed," together with the appended nominal suffix meaning "place of." Avaddon occurs only six times in the Bible, in Psalms (88.12), Proverbs (15.11, 27.21), and Job (26.6, 28.22, 31.12). Just as the other terms for the nether world are personified (e.g., Is. 5.14, 28.15, 18; Hb. 2.5), avaddon is similarly personified as insatiable (Prv. 27.21; cf. Is. 5.14 and Hb. 2.5), bearing witness (Jb. 28.22; cf. Ps. 44.2), and even naked (Jb. 26.6; cf. Prv. 15.11 and Jb. 24.7).

'AVADIM, minor tractate, consisting of three chapters, compiled (probably in Palestine) during the period of the ge'onim, dealing with the laws of *slavery. Laws regarding slaves follow the halakhic division of slaves into three categories: Hebrew manservants, Hebrew maid-servants, and "Canaanite" (i.e., gentile) slaves. Laws discussed include the forms of acquisition and manumission of slaves as well as the mutual obligations of slave and master. The tension between the slave as chattel and as personality governs many of the laws in this tractate.

'AVADIM HAYINU (אָבַדִּים הָיִינוּ; "we were slaves"), the first words of the answer to the four questions (mah nish'tannah*) in the *Pesah *Seder (see HAGGADAH OF PESAH). As prescribed in Mishnah Pesahim 10.4, the response to the questions must "begin with humiliation and conclude with glory." According to Shemu'el (3d cent. CE), the first requirement is fulfilled by the clause 'Avadim hayinu, "We were slaves to Pharaoh in Egypt," and the second requirement by the remainder of the sentence, "and the Lord our God brought us out . . .," a happy culmination to the degradation of servitude (Pes. 116a). The passage concludes with the reminder that God's liberation affected not only the Hebrew slaves in Egypt but also their descendants to the very present and that, therefore, it is proper to look upon Pesah not as a single episode in Jewish history but, instead, as a symbol of God's repeated deliverance of his people.

AVELEI TSIYYON (אֲבֵלֵי צִיּוֹן; Mourners for Zion [based on Is. 61.3]), groups of Jews who, after the destruction of the Second Temple, observed daily mourning customs and ascetic practices and devoted much time to praying for the redemption of Zion. The Talmud (B.B. 60b) refers to the custom of ascetics who abstained from meat and wine as a sign of mourning. After the Arab conquest of Jerusalem in the seventh century CE, Jews were allowed to settle again in Jerusalem, which encouraged a revival of messianic feelings and of the Avelei Tsiyyon. The group in Jerusalem lived in great poverty and was dependent on donations from Diaspora communities. Groups of Avelei Tsiyyon also existed in Germany, Italy, Yemen, and other eastern countries. Most of the *Karaites who established an important community in Jerusalem in the tenth and eleventh centuries adopted the group's customs and developed special mourning practices and liturgies. Karaite leaders, such as Daniyye' ben Mosheh al-*Qumisi and *Sahl ben Matsliaḥ, wrote to the Karaites in the Diaspora encouraging them to come to Jerusalem in order to live as ascetics and pray for the redemption. Almost all traces of the Avelei Tsiyyon in Palestine were lost after the conquest of Palestine by the Seljuks in 1071 and the Crusaders in 1099, although the twelfth-century traveler Benjamin of Tudela reports that he heard of similar groups in Yemen and Germany.

AV HA-RAHAMIM (אָב הָרַחֲמִים; Merciful Father), martyrs' memorial dirge; probably composed after the Crusader massacres between 1096 and 1099. It is found only in the Ashkenazi rite. The prayer, whose author is unknown, was originally said twice a year (on the Sabbaths before Shavu'ot and before Tish'ah be-'Av), but it later became customary to recite it every Sabbath (with certain exceptions, varying in different communities). It calls on God to avenge the Jews who have been murdered, thus expressing the frustration of a powerless community in the face of disaster. A short prayer with the same opening is recited in certain Orthodox synagogues before the reading of the Torah.

The author, an otherwise unknown Binyamin, portrays Zion as a dove trapped by a snare, sitting desolate, and crying out for relief from suffering.

AVINU MALKENU (אָבִינוּ מַלְכֵנוּ; Our Father, Our King), litany of supplication recited during the Aseret Yemei Teshuvah* (except on Sabbath and the afternoon service prior to Yom Kippur) and on fast days (except Tish'ah be-'Av); each line begins with the words avinu malkenu. The Talmud (Ta'an. 25b) relates that the basic formula was recited by R. 'Aqiva' on the occasion of a drought. Avinu Malkenu created a new pattern of petitionary prayer by connecting the most intimate and the most formal epithets applying to God (father, king in the opening formula) and confession of sins* (in the opening and concluding line) with the confession of faith and the plea for divine grace. This basic pattern was later elaborated on, and by geonic times the prayer contained some twenty-nine verses (and later, in the Ashkenazi rite, forty-four). In Reform usage, the prayer is recited only on Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur and sometimes modified in translation and even in the Hebrew to avoid the biblical and rabbinic description of God as father and king in the light of feminist criticism.

AVINU SHE-BA-SHAMAYIM (אָבִינוּ שֶׁבַּשְׁמַיִם; "Our Father, who is in heaven"), a phrase that occurs only once in the traditional siddur (prayer book*) as the beginning of an invocation: in the last paragraph of the Morning Benedictions (see BIRKHOT HA-SHAHAR). The old liturgists may have avoided this usage because it is the beginning of the Lord's Prayer (Mt. 6.9) that Jesus taught to his disciples. Occasionally occurring in the siddur is the formula, "May it be the will of our Father who is in heaven . . ." Liturgical variants of Avinu she-ba-shamayim are Eloheni she-ba-shamayim, "Our God who is in heaven," and, in Aramaic, Maran di-vi-shemaya', "Our Master who is in heaven." Much more common is the invocation Avinu malkenu*, "Our Father, our King." The Yiddish equivalent has been much used in Hasidic prayers and petitions.

AVIV (אָבִיב), Abib in English Bible translations (cf. Dt. 16.1), is the first month of the year according to biblical nomenclature, corresponding to the Hebrew month of Nisan*. The word probably originally referred to the season of the ripening of the corn and was later applied to the spring season in general.

'AVODAH (עֲבוּדָה), the sacred service; usually applied to the service performed by the priests in the Temple* and, more specifically, to the service conducted by the high priest* on Yom Kippur*. This is described in Leviticus 16.2–34, and a liturgical and poetic version is included in the Musaf* service for Yom Kippur. The basis for this version is passages from Yoma' (which gives a lengthy description of the 'Avodah, elaborated in both Talmuds) together with appropriate piyyutim (called 'Avodah; see PIYYUT), which vary between the Ashkenazi, Sephardi, and other rites. The Reform liturgy confines its 'Avodah section to the high priest's confession.

The 'Avodah on Yom Kippur was the most important religious function of the high priest and the most awesome moment of the Temple ritual. It was the sole occasion that he entered the Holy of Holies, where he sought atonement three times, first for himself, then for the priestly family, and finally for the entire people of Israel. It was also the only time that he uttered the Tetragrammaton, the ineffable name of God (YHVH). The 'Avodah as the Temple sacrifice generally led to several rabbinic statements that indicate its centrality until the Temple fell and made sacrifice impossible. The rabbis said that the world stands on three things: Torah, 'Avodah, and kindness (Avot 1.2). With the destruction of the Second Temple, it was laid down that "prayer is 'avodah" (Pirquei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer, 16). The Talmudic phrase

"What is 'avodah in the heart? It is prayer" (Ta'an, 2a) led to the common appellation of prayer as "'avodah in the heart."

'AVODAH ZARAH (עֲבוֹדָה זָרָה; Idolatrous Worship), tractate in Mishnah order Neziqin, consisting of five chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and in both Talmuds. It deals with laws concerning the prohibition against idolatry and the attitude to be adopted toward objects and people associated with idolatrous practices. Founded upon biblical strictures, the tractate seeks to apply these principles to the reality of life under pagan Roman domination. The Mishnah extends its discussion of idolatry to include the broader issue of demarcating the permissible boundaries of Jewish intercourse with pagans in the commercial and cultural spheres. Certain forms of social intercourse—intermarriage, for example—were strictly prohibited.

Other laws in this tractate delineate objects and places that are to be regarded as idolatrous as well as the prohibitions that attach to them. Special attention is devoted to the subject of wine belonging to or touched by a pagan, due to the special significance of wine in worship and in social contacts. An edition of the manuscript in the library of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America was published by S. Abramson in 1957. The Talmud Bavli tractate was translated into English by A. Mishcon and A. Cohen in the Soncino Talmud (1935).

AVOT (אָבוֹת; Fathers), name of a prayer and of a Mishnaic tractate.

Prayer. Avot is the first blessing in the 'Amidah, so called because of its reference to "the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob"; the eulogy of "God of our fathers"; and its concluding reference to God as the "shield of Abraham." The prayer invokes the merits of the ancestors (see ZEKHUT AVOT). According to rabbinic legend, the blessing was instituted by Abraham when escaping from Ur. In certain contemporary non-Orthodox liturgies, references are added to the *matriarchs.

• Ismar Elbogen, Jewish Liturgy: A Comprehensive History, translated by Raymond P. Scheindlin (Philadelphia, 1993). Avrohom Chaim Feuer, Shemoneh Esrei: The Amidah/The Eighteen Blessings (Brooklyn, N.Y., 1990).

Tractate. The tractate Avot, in Mishnah order Neziqin, is also known as Pirquei Avot. It contains five chapters, to which was added, probably in geonic times, a sixth chapter, "Pereq Qinyan Torah," containing teachings in praise of Torah study. There is no parallel Tosefta'; however, the minor tractate Avot de-Rabbi Natan* serves as a kind of Tosefta' to Avot. It has no gemara' in either Talmud, but there exists a nineteenth-century collection of related Talmudic material known as Massehet Avot 'im Talmud Bavli ve-Yerushalmi. The name Avot is thought to derive from a title commonly accorded to leading sages, whose aphorisms, containing ethical and spiritual wisdom, are collected in the tractate. Alternatively, the title Avot may be understood to mean fundamental principles (cf. Shab. 1.1; B. Q. 1.1).

Avot is the sole Mishnaic tractate devoid of halakhic content; nor does it contain aggadic narrative. It may have been placed in Neziqin as a juxtaposition to the discussion of judiciary matters, legal character, and the ethical teachings of the judges and spiritual leaders of the community. Bava' Qamma' 30a suggests that scrupulous observance of neziqin (monetary laws) and of the precepts of Avot are pathways to piety.

The major themes of Avot include the centrality of Torah study and its relation to observance of commandments, freedom of choice, divine providence, divine and human justice, reward and punishment, the world to come, and the nature of a pious personality. The first two chapters present the chain of transmission of the oral law from Moses to the Men of the *Keneset ha-Gedolah and include rabbinic teachings and aphorisms in chronological order, listing eminent teachers, among whom the patriarchal descendants of Hillel and R. Yohanan ben Zakk'ai and his disciples are prominently featured. This structure serves to emphasize the close connection between legal and ethical authority in rabbinic thinking. In the following two chapters, the chronological structure is abandoned and the maxims of the rabbis are arranged according to thematic, associative, and mnemonic principles characteristic of the Mishnah as a whole. The bulk of the fifth chapter comprises statements based on numerical teachings, opening with ten sayings by means of which the world was created and concluding with four types of rabbinic students.

A mark of Avot's popularity and influence is its inclusion in the liturgical recitations of many communities and in many editions of the traditional prayer book. As a result, Avot has been reproduced and reprinted more often than any other Talmudic work and has been translated into many languages. English translations are to be found in prayer books and standard translations of the Mishnah.

AVOT DE-RABBI NATAN, a minor tractate that serves as a companion volume to tractate Avot. Similar in form to the Tosefta', it relates to much of the material in Avot and largely follows the same order as Avot. Avot de-Rabbi Natan is traditionally ascribed to the second-century tanna' R. Natan ha-Bavli, even though he preceded R. Yehudah ha-Nasi', redactor of the Mishnah. This discrepancy as well as the appearance in Avot de-Rabbi Natan of many later sages and a good deal of clearly later material may be explained by assuming that the material in Avot de-Rabbi Natan underwent numerous redactions and that the earliest redaction of it corresponded to a pre-Mishnaic redaction of tractate Avot. This may further account for the existence of Avot de-Rabbi Natan in two versions, A and B, first published together in a scientific edition by Solomon Schechter in 1887.

In addition to the maxims and teachings of the sages, which complement the material found in Avot, Avot de-Rabbi Natan also contains a great deal of Midrashic material, including lengthy digressions on such topics as the creation of Adam and Eve, Adam and Eve and the serpent, and the deaths of Moses and Aaron. There are many biographical anecdotes about the sages, some of which provide important insights into their thinking. Prominent issues discussed in Avot de-Rabbi Natan include the dispute between Beit Hillel and Beit Shamm'ai about whether Torah study should be the province of the elite or broadly based; the Sadducean denial of the world to come; the character and teachings of Elisha' ben Avuyah; the siege of Jerusalem; and the religious performances that filled the spiritual gap left by the destruction of the Temple. English translations of Avot de-Rabbi Natan have been done by Judah Goldin (The Fathers According to Rabbi Nathan [version A; New Haven, 1955]) and Anthony J. Saldarini (The Fathers According to Rabbi Nathan [version B; Leiden, 1975]).

An English translation of the tractate also appears in The Minor Tractates of the Talmud (Soncino edition, 1966).

AVOT MELA'KHOT (אבות מלאכות), the thirty-nine chief categories of work or creative activity forbidden on the *Sabbath. These general categories have been divided into many different subcategories, which are called toladot (progeny, i.e., secondary prohibitions). The importance of determining whether a particular prohibited activity is an av (father, i.e., primary prohibition) or a toladah is limited to the forms of sacrificial penitence required during Temple times and whether multiple violations require multiple acts of penitence or a single act of penitence.

According to R. Ḥanina' bar Ḥama', the avot mela'khot are "based on the work done to create the Tabernacle. Rabbi Yonatan ben Eli'ezer in the name of Rabbi Shim'on ben Yosei ben Laqunya' states that the thirty-nine categories are based on the number of times that the word mela'khah [and its cognates] appears in the Bible" (Shab. 49b). Yet other origins for the number thirty-nine can also be found. The thirty-nine prohibited categories are: plowing, sowing, reaping, gathering sheaves, threshing, winnowing, separating, grinding, sifting, kneading, baking, shearing, bleaching, combing, dyeing, spinning, making a warp, making a thread, weaving threads, splitting threads, knotting, untying a knot, sewing, tearing, trapping, slaughtering, skinning, tanning, ruling lines, scraping hides, cutting to size, writing, erasing, building, destroying, finishing a job, lighting fire, extinguishing a fire, and carrying.

AVRAHAM BAR ḤAYYA' (died c.1136), philosopher and polymath in Spain. He lived in Barcelona, but little is known about his life apart from his having occupied a leading position in the Jewish, and perhaps in the general, community. He wrote in Hebrew on astronomy and astrology, mathematics, geography, optics, and music. As a translator from Arabic to Latin he collaborated with the Christian scholar Plato of Tivoli, who introduced the Ptolemaic system to the western world. His philosophical works were the first to be written in Hebrew, and Avraham bar Ḥayya' had to coin much of the terminology. His choice of a type of Mishnaic Hebrew was highly influential in the development of the language.

His two main philosophical works are Megillat ha-Megalleh (edited by A. Poznanski [1921]), an eschatological work written to determine the end of time (concluding that the Messiah would appear some time between 1136 and 1448, the latter year being the date for the resurrection of the dead), and Hegyon ha-Nefesh ha-'Atsuva (edited by G. Wigoder [1971]), dealing with ethical and philosophical problems supported by proofs adduced from homiletic exegesis of the Bible. The main topics of the latter are creation, repentance, good and evil, and the saintly life. Two of the book's four sections are based on expositions of the prophetic portions read on Yom Kippur.

Unlike many other medieval philosophers, Avraham bar Ḥayya' does not seek proofs for the existence of God, which he assumes, as he does creation ex nihilo. His work to reconcile Jewish cosmogony and other non-Jewish philosophies has usually been classified as Neoplatonic (notably his theory of emanations and doctrine of light) with an element of Aristotelianism (L. D. Stitskin, however [in Judaism as a Philosophy], claims that he was the first Jewish Aristotelian, notably in his theories of form and matter and of potentiality and actuality). The scientific work of Avraham bar Ḥayya' is frequently quoted by Christian scholars, although it was his philosophic and eschatological writings that influenced Jewish thinkers throughout the Middle Ages. Moreover, he was a source for kabbalistic writers, including the author of the Sefer ha-Bahir*, and members of the Ḥasidei Ashkenaz*.

AVRAHAM BEN 'AZRI'EL (13th cent.), Bohemian Talmudist; a student of the Hasidei Ashkenaz. His Arugat ha-Bosem, written c.1234, includes extensive comments on Sabbath and festival piyyutim and on penitential prayers. The work demonstrates the author's extensive learning in all branches of rabbinic literature; however, because of its prolixity, it was virtually forgotten until its discovery by Abraham *Berliner in 1874. Its importance was then recognized as a source for the teachings of the ri'shonim.

AVRAHAM BEN DAVID OF POSQUIÈRES (c.1120–1198), southern French Talmudist, also known as Rabad III. Menaḥem *Me'iri referred to him as "the greatest of commentators." His explications of the Talmud and conceptual formulations revealed originality of his keen powers of analytical thinking. Although only two complete original commentaries have been recently published from manuscripts, many of his other commentaries can be reconstructed by means of extensive quotations in later medieval works. He was particularly expert at composing topical essays in which he analyzed pertinent halakhic texts and formulated final halakhic decisions. These include essays on the four species for Sukkot (Hilkhot Lulav); his code on tractate Yadayim, Perush Yadayim; his Hibbur Harsha'ot; Issur Mashehu (which deals with the dietary laws [published in part in Sifron shel Ri'shonim, edited by S. Asaf (Jerusalem, 1935)]); and Ba'alei Nefesh (Venice, 1602; Jerusalem, 1964, which includes Hilkhot Lulav, Hibbur Harsha'ot and Perush Yadayim). Ba'alei Nefesh deals for the most part with family purity, and the last chapter suggests the means by which a man could attain self-control and purity of heart in sexual matters. Avraham also wrote a comprehensive commentary to the Midreshei Halakhah, but only his commentary to the Sifra on Leviticus is extant (Constantinople, 1523; Vienna, 1862). Likewise he penned scholarly commentaries to the Mishnaic tractates of Eduyyot and Qinnim (which appear in standard editions of Talmud). He is also known for his critical notes (hassagot) on the works of Yitshaq Alfasi, Zerahyah ha-Levi, and Maimonides. His critique of the venerable codifier Alfasi was deferential but objective. However, his strictures of Zerahyah were acrimonious, reflecting a lifelong literary quarrel between them. Avraham accused Zerahyah of plagiarism, undue reliance upon northern French commentaries, and ineptness. Avraham's review, written at the end of his life, of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah reflects a critical attitude toward philosophy. Avraham was influential in the dissemination of Kabbalah in southern France, and one or two kabbalistic works have been attributed to him. His son and grandsons were involved in kabbalistic studies, and they claimed to have been his disciples in this field. Dozens of responsa by Avraham (Y. Kafaḥ, ed. [Jerusalem, 1964]) demonstrate his role as community leader in southern France. He was constantly asked to adjudicate legal problems, and his decisions were regarded as authoritative. He ran his own rabbinical academy in Posquières.

AVRAHAM BEN DOV BER OF MEZHIRECH (c.1741–1776), Hasidic rabbi; son of *Dov Ber of Mezhi-rech, the second central leader of the Hasidic movement. Growing up in the circle of his father's disciples, Avraham was known as the study partner of R. *Shneur Zalman of Lyady. Legend has it that he was a master of secret lore, perhaps learned from his father, which he imparted to Shneur Zalman, who in turn was his teacher when it came to the revealed Torah. Avraham heightened the ascetic tendencies of his father, turning away from the rejection of asceticism that characterized Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov's approach to life. He was an inner-directed and otherworldly person. Thus, he did not leave disciples or lead a community, despite a great attachment to the ideal of the tsaddiq, as is evident in his surviving writings. His early death was considered a great tragedy among the disciples of his father. His teachings were collected in Hesed le-Avraham (Chernovtsy, 1851).

AVRAHAM BEN ELI'EZER HA-LEVI (1460–1528), kabbalist in Spain before the expulsion of 1492, who after that time wandered in many communities of Italy, Greece, Turkey, and Egypt, finally settling in Jerusalem in 1514. In his many treatises, he described the transformation of the *Kabbalah, during and immediately after the period of the expulsion, into an intense messianic and apocalyptic system of thought. His writings are dedicated to the elucidation of the date of the redemption, expounding biblical and kabbalistic sources. He wrote commentaries on Daniel; on the "Heleq" chapter in the Talmud (San. 10), which has strong eschatological elements; and on the apocalyptic "prophecy of the child," which was famous at the end of the fifteenth century. In his Iggeret Sod ha-Ge'ullah, written in Jerusalem in 1521, he presented his proof that the *Messiah would come in the following decade and called for repentance in preparation. Most of his writings were not printed, but sections of his treatises have been published by Gershom Gerhard Scholem.

AVRAHAM BEN ELIYYAHU OF VILNA (1750–1808), scholar; son of R. *Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna (the Vilna Ga'on), the greatest Talmudist of his time. In addition to publishing a few of his father's works, in which he incorporated some of his father's oral teachings, Avraham was a significant scholar in his own right. His major field of interest was Midrashic literature. In this area he published Rav Pe'alim (1894), a commentary on over one hundred different midrashim. He also published an edition of Midrash Aggadat be-Re'shit (Vilna, 1802), commentaries on the Book of Psalms and Targum Onkelos, and Gevulot Erets (Berlin, 1821), a work devoted to geography. AVRAHAM BEN MOSHEH BEN MAIMON (1186–1237), religious philosopher; temporal and spiritual head of the Jewish community in Egypt, succeeding his father, Moses *Maimonides. Like his father, with whom he studied philosophy and medicine, he was a physician to the royal court. He was responsible for many enactments, one of which, prohibiting the issuing of a ban of excommunication by a single rabbi, became generally accepted. He was the author of rabbinic responsa (edited by A. Freimann [Jerusalem, 1938]); a commentary on the Torah (only the commentary on Genesis and Exodus has been preserved, edited by Ernest Wiesenberg [London, 1959]); philosophical writings defending his father's thought, notably Milhamot Adonai (edited by Re'uven M. Margalio [Jerusalem, 1953]) on the subject of God's incorporeity; and Kitab al-Abidin (only partly preserved, Eng. translation by Samuel Rosenblatt, The High Ways to Perfection of Abraham Maimonides, 2 vols. [New York, 1927]), an encyclopedic work on religion, ethics, and philosophy. This last, divided into four books, is a commentary on the saying of R. *Shim'on ha-Tsaddiq: "The world rests on three things: Torah, the worship of God, and charity" (Avot 1.2). It is informed by deep mystical piety, and it reflects, as do some of his practices, the influence of Sufism. This led him to modify some of the philosophical and ethical ideas of his father, although in general he followed his father's rationalism. Avraham expounds the "highways to perfection" taught by revelation, which lead humans to communion with God; these include asceticism, mastery of the passions, and concentration of all one's thoughts upon God.

AVRAHAM BEN NATAN OF LUNEL (c.1155–c.1215), Provençal Talmudic scholar. A kinsman of Yitshaq Abba' Mari of Marseilles, Avraham studied under Avraham ben David of Posquières and with the scholars of Lunel, then traveled north to study under the noted tosafist R. Yitshaq of Dampierre, and finally settled in Toledo, Spain, where he became a member of the rabbinical court. During his extensive travels in Provence and northern France, Germany, England, and Spain, he observed local customs, particularly those dealing with synagogue and prayer ritual, and recorded them in a work entitled Minhag 'Olam (popularly known as Sefer ha-Minhag; originally published in Constantinople in 1519 and republished in Berlin in 1855 [edited by A. N. Goldberg]). The book, the first of its kind in Europe, explains the origin and development of various customs according to rabbinic sources and became a handbook for migrant Jews in unfamiliar locales. Avraham also wrote a commentary to the tractate Kallah Rabbati, a brief code on dietary laws and the laws of ritual slaughter, and some responsa.

Avraham Av Beit Din (Ravi Abad, also known as Rabad II). He was the author of Sefer ha-Eshkol (edited by Shalom and Hanokh Albeck [1935–1958]), an abbreviated version of *Yehudah ben Barzillai al-Bargeloni's Sefer ha-Ittim and the first major work of codification to appear in southern France. This volume influenced subsequent halakhic literature. A collection of Avraham's responsa has been published (edited by Y. He also wrote a commentary to the Talmud, but only part of one tractate is extant.

AVRAHAM BEN YOSHIYYA'HU YERUSHALMI (c.1685–1734), *Karaite scholar and author. He lived in Chufut-Kale, Crimea, although he reports that he wandered elsewhere, and evidently supported himself by teaching children and serving as a cantor. According to common Karaite practice, his father was given the cognomen Yerushalmi after making a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Avraham's son and grandson, Shemu'el and Binyamin Aga, respectively, were communal leaders of the Crimean Karaites and served as minters and treasury agents to the Tatar khans. Most of Avraham's theological treatise Emunah Omen, completed in 1712 (published in 1846), is devoted to an exploration of the differences between the Karaite and Rabbanite conception of the fundamentals of law, concluding that the disagreement is actually small. He demonstrates an exceptionally broad and respectful acquaintance with Talmudic and medieval Rabbanite literature, although he opposed the study of secular sciences. His other works include Sha'ol Sha'al, on the laws of ritual slaughter; a short sermon; and two liturgical poems found in Karaite prayer books.

AVRAHAM GERSHON OF KUTÓW (died 1761), rabbi and kabbalist. He was a member of the rabbinic court and probably of the pietistic kloyz* circle in Brody during the 1740s. In 1747 he settled in the Holy Land, living first in Hebron and then from 1753 in Jerusalem, where he was a member of the mostly Sephardi Beit El kabbalistic conventicle. His sister Hannah was the wife of Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer Ba'al Shem Tov*, and R. Gershon Kitover, as Avraham Gershon was also known, figures prominently in the legends collected in Shivhei ha-Besht*. A letter from the Ba'al Shem Tov to R. Gershon is one of the most important sources about the religious life of the founder of Hasidism.

AVRAHAM HA-LEVI (1640–1717), rabbinical scholar born in Cairo, who became the halakhic authority of Egyptian Jewry in his time, a period known as dor de'ah (generation of knowledge). Egypt was famous for its sages, and Avraham, as head of the rabbinic court (av beit din), was respected throughout the Middle East and as far away as Morocco and Italy. He was considered, along with David ben Shelomoh ibn Avi Zimra* (Radbaz) and Ya'aqov Castro (Mahariqash), as one of the three pillars of Egyptian learning. He was cited by the leading Ashkenazi and Sephardi authorities. His responsa were published after his death by Moshe Tawil in Ginnet Veradim (Constantinople, 1716–1717); Pinhas 'Ovadyah has edited a modern edition (Jerusalem, 1991). Avraham was especially noted for his expertise on divorce, fighting, and, among other things, those who tried to escape the rabbinical authorities by recourse to Muslim shariah. His Ya'ir Nativ on divorce customs is printed as part of Ginnet Veradim.

AVRAHAM YEHOSHU'A HESCHEL (died 1825), Hasidic master and author; known as the Apter Rebbe. One of the most powerful Hasidic leaders of his generation, he was a disciple of Elimelekh of Lyzhansk and Yehi'el Mikha'el of Zloczów. Avraham began his career as a rabbi of Kolbuszowa but became famous as the rabbi of Opatów (Apta). He also spent a number of years as rabbi of Jassy. The last part of his life was spent in Medzhibozh (Podolia), where Hasidism's founder, the Ba'al Shem Tov, had his center. Here Avraham achieved his greatest renown, opposing the Haskalah, mediating Hasidic disputes, and raising funds for the Hasidic community in Erets Yisra'el. He was at heart a mystic, and typical of the school of the Maggid of Mezhibezh, his sermons were often delivered in ecstatic states of inspiration. Like other Hasidic masters, he claimed knowledge of previous lives and would regale his followers with reminiscences of events from the biblical and early rabbinic periods. He explained that the reason for his many incarnations was to perfect the attribute of love. Collections of his homilies were printed posthumously. The most famous of these is Ohev Yisra'el (Lover of Israel), named after the epithet that he requested for his tombstone.

AVREKH (אַבְרֵךְ; young man), originally a term applied to Joseph by the Egyptians (Gn. 41.43), which the Midrash (Gn. Rab. 90.3) homiletically interpreted as "av [an elder] in wisdom and rakh [young] in years." The term is now used for a married yeshivah student who has not yet entered the labor market and is still studying in a kolel*.

AVTALYON (1st cent. BCE), colleague of Shema'yah*. Together they constituted the fourth of the zugot* (pairs) in the chain of transmission outlined in Pirkei 'Avot, where they are said to have received the tradition from Yehudah ben Tabb'ai* and Shim'on ben Shetaḥ*. While Shema'yah was the nasi', Avtalyon was the av beit din of the supreme rabbinic court. Both are said to have been descendants of proselytes (Git. 57b; San. 96b). Some scholars identify Avtalyon with the Pollio mentioned by Josephus as being one of the Pharisaic leaders during the time of Herod* (Antiquities of the Jews 15.1–4, 370). According to a variant reading in Antiquities of the Jews (14.172), it was Avtalyon, and not Sameas (Shema'yah?) who was the "upright man and for this reason superior to fear," who denounced Hyrcanus and his colleagues in the Sanhedrin* for their cowardice in refusing to judge Herod. Some hold that his exhortation, "Scholars be careful with your words, lest you incur the penalty of exile and be banished to a place of evil waters (i.e., heretical teachings), and the disciples who follow you into exile are likely to drink of them and die" (Avot 1.11), reflects contemporary conditions and refers to the punishments meted out by the regime. The allusion may also refer to Avtalyon's teacher, who fled to Alexandria during the reign of Alexander Yannai, as well as to the Herodian persecutions of his own time.

AVTINAS, family whose duty it was to mix the incense* in the Temple (Sheq. 5.1). Originally the family was denounced for refusing to teach the manufacturing of incense to others (Yoma' 3.11). The sages sent to Alexandria for skilled perfumers; however, they were unable to make the column of smoke from the incense rise in a vertical shaft, as had the Avtinah family. The sages then agreed to double their remuneration (Yoma' 38a). A later generation explained that the reason they had refused to divulge their secret formula was that they believed the Temple would soon be destroyed, and they feared that their incense would be used for idolatry.

AYASH, YEHUDAH (1700–1759), Algerian rabbinical authority. Born in Almahdia, he was taken by his father, himself a noted rabbi, to Algiers, where he studied with Rabbi Rafa'el Tseror. Upon Tseror's death in 1728, Ayash succeeded him as av beit din of Algiers. Ayash was an influential figure by virtue of his daily expositions in any place where Torah was studied, and on Sabbaths masses crowded the central synagogue to hear his sermons. He cooperated closely with the Jewish leader Rafa'el Ya'aqov Bus'ara', who helped him publish his first book, Lehem Yehudah (Leghorn, vol. 1, 1745; vol. 2, 1758), devoted to comments on Maimonides. Following a dispute with community leaders, Ayash left for Leghorn, where he taught from 1756 to 1758, and continued to Erets Yisra'el. In Algiers he had published a responsum in his halakhic work Beit Yehudah (Leghorn, 1746) to the effect that if there is a conflict between 'aliyyah to Erets Yisra'el and the obligation to honor one's parents, the former takes precedence. He settled in Jerusalem, where he headed the Keneset Yisra'el Yeshivah founded by Hayyim ben Mosheh *Attar. Ayash's sons Ya'aqov Mosheh, Yehuda, and Avraham were distinguished rabbis, while his three grandsons served as emissaries of the Jerusalem community.

AYLLON, SHELOMOH BEN YA'AQOV (c.1660–1728), Sephardi rabbi. It is not certain whether he was born in Safed or Salonika. While in Leghorn, Italy, on behalf of the community of Safed, he maintained theological contacts with the Shabbatean rabbis Binyamin ha-Kohen and Avraham Rovigo. In 1689 he was nominated hakham of the Spanish-Portuguese community of London, a position he quit after ten years in office owing to personal disputes within the community. In 1700 he was elected hakham of the senior community of Amsterdam and head of the Ets Hayyim rabbinical school, where he served for twenty-eight years, admired by all community members. However, a bitter controversy took place between Ayllon and the hakham Tsevi Hirsch *Ashkenazi. Ayllon publicly supported Neḥemyah *Hayon, who was suspected, rightly as is now known, of Shabbateanism, while Ashkenazi criticized Hayon's writings and issued a ban against him. The controversy developed beyond theology into an Ashkenazi-Sephardi dispute, at the end of which Tsevi Hirsch Ashkenazi was compelled to leave Amsterdam. Ayllon's halakhic and kabbalistic writings are still in manuscript, but the latter shows that the accusation of being a clandestine Shabbatean believer was well-founded. In his tract he closely follows the teachings of *Natan of Gaza regarding the two primordial lights, or she-yesh bo maḥashavah (the intelligent light) and or she-'ein bo maḥashavah (the non-intelligent light), and the role of the Messiah in harmonizing them, as well as the Messiah's apotheosis.

'AZARAH (אָזָרָה), a late Hebrew term designating the surrounding rim of the altar (Ex. 43.14, 43.17, 43.20, 45.19) as well as the courtyard of the Temple (2 Chr. 4.9, 6.13). There were three courtyards in the Second Temple: the women's courtyard (ezrat nashim*), from which fifteen steps led up to the courtyard of the Israelites, which led in to the priest's courtyard. According to a tradition preserved in the Talmud Yerushalmi (Y., Ta'an. 4.2; cf. Sifrei on Deuteronomy 356), three Torah scrolls, bearing variant readings, were found in the Temple courtyard. The sages thereupon "confirmed the [reading found in] two [of the three scrolls] and abrogated the other." Underlying this tradition was the custom of depositing an official copy of the Torah in the Temple courtyard so that copyists could correct their versions on the basis of this canonical version. The same idea is reflected in the legend found in Avot de-Rabbi Natan* 19.19 and elsewhere, according to which Moses prepared thirteen copies of the Torah, one for each tribe of Israel and a thirteenth copy that was placed in the Ark of the Covenant. This last copy was, like the later scroll of the 'azarah, the official version against which all copies were to be compared.

AZAZEL, name mentioned in Leviticus 16 in connection with the ritual of Yom Kippur. The high priest would cast lots over two he-goats, designating one "for the Lord" and the other "for Azazel," and confess over the latter all the iniquities of the children of Israel. Thereafter this goat was sent away "by the hand of an appointed man into the wilderness." In Talmudic times the goat was thrown from the top of a precipice near Jerusalem, and if the tuft of scarlet wool fastened to it turned white (cf. Is. 1.18), this was taken as a sign of God's forgiveness. The meaning of the word azazel is variously explained: "the place of sending away [the goat]" (Septuagint); "scapegoat" (Vulgate); or "rugged mountain" (Talmud). The ritual is generally taken to symbolize the complete removal of the people's transgressions. The concept of azazel may have a pre-Israelite origin connected with the worship of se'irim—goatlike demons (cf. Lv. 17.7). In Judaism, it became the symbol of casting out of sinfulness from Israel's borders (cf. Lv. 14.1–7; Zec. 5.5–11). In apocalyptic and late aggadic as well as kabbalistic literature, Azazel is conceived of as a fallen angel and even as a prototype of *Satan. The term azazel (only Lv. 16.8, 10, 26) has also been understood as the personal name or epithet of a demythologized demon, popularly identified with the Canaanite god of death, Mot (in Ugaritic, Mt). However, its use in the Hebrew Bible is limited to priestly sanctioned participation (together with and on behalf of the God of Israel, cf. especially Lv. 16.7–8) in the annual Yom Kippur purification ritual.

AZHAROT (אֲזָרוֹת; exhortations), liturgical poems dealing with the enumeration and explanation of the 613 commandments (the numerical value of the word azharot in Hebrew is 613). These poems were called azharot after the initial word of an early composition of this nature dating from the geonic period. They were recited in the Shavu'ot liturgy, especially among the Sephardim, before Musaf but were transferred to Minḥah. Azharot were written by early payyetanim and by many famous medieval rabbis and poets including Sa'adyah Ga'on and Shelomoh ibn Gabirol (whose azharot were widely used among the Sephardim and Yemenites); however, these compositions also aroused opposition, such as that expressed by Avraham ibn Ezra, who compared a person who recites azharot to one who enumerates a list of herbs without any appreciation of their remedial properties.

AZIKRI, EL'AZAR BEN MOSHEH (1533–1600), kabbalist, commentator, preacher, and poet; an outstanding representative of Safed's spirituality in the sixteenth century. A disciple of R. Yosef Sagis and R. Mosheh *Cordovero, he was ordained by R. Ya'aqov *Berab in 1596. As the spiritual leader of two groups (havurot) of mystics and ascetics in Safed, Haverim Maqshivim and Sukkat Shalom, he wrote for them a kabbalistic ethical manual named Millei de-Shemayya' (Tel Aviv, 1991). This work is based on Azikri's own ecstatic religious experiences, which he recorded in his diary. This diary, written in a terse, enigmatic manner, was published in its entirety as Mitsfunot Tsefat (edited by M. Pachter [Jerusalem, 1994]). It reflects the inner world of an ecstatic kabbalist, dedicating himself to the path of ascent in the degrees of ecstatic contemplation, self-purification, and communion (devequt*) with God. In 1588 Azikri wrote his manual Haredim (Venice, 1601), which had an influence on Hasidism. Its most influential section, Divrei Kibbushin, is a compilation of chapters from Millei de-Shemayya'. Azikri's commentaries on some tractates of the Talmud Bavli as well as his many homiletic commentaries on the Pentateuch remain in manuscript form. His commentaries on Berakhot and Beitsah of the Talmud Yerushalmi were printed (Zhitomir, 1860; New York, 1967). His love poems (piyyutim) to God were included in almost all the editions of Haredim. The most popular of these poems, Yedid Nefesh*, is printed in the prayer books of almost all the Jewish communities in the world; in many of them, it opens the Friday evening *Qabbalat Shabbat service. There is an English translation by Nina Davis in Jewish Quarterly Review 9 (1896/1897): 290. See also KABBALAH; MYSTICISM.

'AZRI'EL OF GERONA (13th cent.), one of the leading kabbalists in Catalonia. His mystical works are based on the teachings of R. Yitshaq Saggi Nahor and the Sefer ha-Bahir*, combined with contemporary philosophical, mainly Neoplatonic terminology. His Perush ha-'Aggadot (Jerusalem, 1985) united ancient traditions with contemporary thought, offering a systematic amalgamation of the new kabbalistic symbolism with ancient Talmudic legends. His works influenced other Catalan kabbalists, including Moses *Nahmanides, and Spanish Kabbalah as a whole.

AZ ROV NISSIM (אַז רױב נִסִּים; Then You [Performed] Many Miracles), a piyyut* by Yann'ai (6th cent. CE), incorporated into the *Haggadah for the first evening of *Pesah and also recited in congregations following the German rite on Shabbat ha-Gadol (the Sabbath preceding Pesah) and the first day of Pesah. Az Rov Nissim is an alphabetical acrostic with the refrain after each three-line stanza, "And it came to pass at midnight." The poet cites twelve instances of God's intervention at night on Pesah to deliver his people. The final strophes look forward to Israel's final deliverance, which is also to take place at midnight. Many modern editors of the Haggadah have eliminated the poem because of its recondite allusions. It was given a free translation in verse form for the Reform Union Haggadah of 1923.

AZULAI, AVRAHAM (c.1570–1643), scholar, rabbi, and kabbalist. Born in Fez, he received a rabbinical education and studied medieval philosophy in its Aristotelian form. Under the influence of Mosheh Cordovero's Pardes Rimmonim, he chose Kabbalah as his special interest. Although acquainted with Lurianic Kabbalah, Azulai in the main adopted Cordovero's system. At an early age Azulai went to Erets Yisra'el and, after wandering between Hebron, Jerusalem, and Gaza, settled in Hebron, where he studied Cordovero's books and Lurianic manuscripts. There he wrote Or ha-Levanah, corrections to the text of the Zohar, as well as his magnum opus, Or ha-Ḥammah, a full commentary on the Zohar based on Cordovero's writings, to which he added Or ha-Ganuz, his own novellae on the Zohar, and Zoharei Ḥammah, based on Mosheh bar Mordekhai Galante's commentary on the Zohar. Two of Azulai's works, Ḥesed le-'Avraham (Amsterdam, 1685), a systematic analysis of Kabbalah, and Ba'alei Berit Avram, a commentary on the Bible (Jerusalem, 1982), exhibit a strong philosophical influence in their terminology and conceptual usage.

AZULAI, ḤAYYIM YOSEF DAVID (1724–1806), rabbinical scholar, kabbalist, and bibliographer; known by the acronym Ḥida'. Born in Jerusalem, he was sixteen years old when he wrote his first book, precursor to his Shem ha-Gedolim (1774, 1786), a vast guide to twenty-two hundred books and thirteen hundred rabbis. He traveled extensively as an emissary on behalf of the Jewish community in Erets Yisra'el. He was the first Jewish scholar to study the manuscripts of Italy and France. Azulai served as rabbi in Jerusalem, Hebron, Cairo, and, from 1778, in Leghorn. His literary diary, Ma'agal Tov (edited by A. Freimann [1921–1934]), is an invaluable account of his travels, experiences, and ideas. He was the author of over eighty books on halakhah and ethics and was a noted kabbalist, composing prayers that became part of Tefillat ha-Hodesh, a Sephardi prayer book in use since the mid-eighteenth century.

BA'AL NES (בַּעַל נֶס; miracle master), a holy man or saint. A ba'al nes may be a simple man or one who is acknowledged by the religious authorities, such as the tsaddiq, rabbi, or hakham. The ba'al nes is recognized by his capacity to perform miracles through prayer or because miracles happen to him (Nid. 31a). Many important religious figures are said to have had this capacity, including Maimonides, R. Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Ḥasid, Yitshaq Luria, the Ba'al Shem Tov, the Lubavitcher Rebbe, and Baba Sali, head of the Abi-Ḥasira dynasty, revered by Moroccan Jews. A story is told about R. Me'ir (2d cent.), who was called a ba'al nes after miraculously rescuing his sister-in-law from prison. The prison guard who helped R. Me'ir was to be executed for his complicity, but a moment before his execution he cried out "God of Rabbi Me'ir, deliver me" and was miraculously spared ('A. Z. 18b). It became customary for a person in trouble to repeat forty times the phrase "God of Rabbi Me'ir, deliver me," a folk tradition that is still practiced today in certain circles.

The title ba'al nes was attributed to another R. Me'ir who lived in Tiberias during the thirteenth century (see METR BA'AL HA-NES).

BA'AL QERI'AH (בַּעַל קְרִיָּאָה; master of reading; reader), Ashkenazi description of the person who reads the Torah in the synagogue (see QERI'AT HA-TORAH). Originally, each person who was called up would read his own portion if he were capable of doing so, and a ba'al qeri'ah would read the portion only for those unable to read it themselves. Later, in order to avoid embarrassing those incapable of reading their own portion, a single ba'al qeri'ah was instituted for all readings. Among Yemenites, it is still usual for individuals to read the portion for which they are called up. The Sephardi term for ba'al qeri'ah is qore.

BA'AL SHEM (בַּעַל שֵׁם; master of the [divine] name), a medieval term, first found in Hasidic literature (Sefer ha-Shem, MS, British Library 737; MS, St. Petersburg 82), describing a magician who is the "master of the holy name," by which means he performs supernatural acts. A ba'al Shem is characterized by his knowledge of secret, potent divine and angelic names, which enable him to force the celestial powers to perform his wishes. The term ba'al Shem is associated with people who were reputed to possess esoteric knowledge and hence were in demand as scribes of amulets and masters of popular medicine and magic (overcoming demons and spirits, discovering thieves, etc.). One of the most popular books of magical and medical formulas, Mifalot Elohim, is attributed to R. Yo'el Ba'al Shem. Another (legendary?) figure is that of R. Adam Ba'al Shem, who is described in Shivhei ha-Besht as the teacher of the *Ba'al Shem Tov, founder of the modern Hasidic movement. The Ba'al Shem Tov, himself, was a wandering healer and scribe of amulets (the appellation Ba'al Shem Tov [master of the good name] is a common one, and was not given to R. Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer in order to distinguish him from other magicians, as suggested by several of his biographers; it denotes the use of good names rather than those of the powers of evil).

BA'AL SHEM TOV, YISRA'EL BEN ELI'EZER (c.1700–1760), founder of *Hasidism; known by the acronym Besht. Little is known of his life, and few reliable biographical documents exist. According to legend, he was orphaned while a child and spent a great deal of his time in solitude and meditation in the woods and fields around his home in Podolia. For some years, he was assistant to a teacher and acted as sexton of the beit midrash. Until his hitgallut, an important concept in Hasidism signifying the revelation of one's true spiritual worth and message, he studied assiduously, acquiring wide knowledge of both the revealed law and secret lore, but concealed his knowledge, affecting the personality of a simple, unlettered Jew. He traveled in Podolia, Volhynia, and Galicia, where, by virtue of his prayers and *amulets, he achieved a reputation as a healer and a comforter to those in need; hence, the appellation *Ba'al Shem (or Ba'al Shem Tov [Master of the Good Name], abbreviated to Besht). The charms that he prepared contained only his own and his mother's name—Yisra'el son of Sarah—unlike the more traditional forms that always contained one of the holy names of God. Many legends grew around his personality and life, often described as a miraculous chain of events: that Elijah the prophet foretold his birth; that his soul was a spark from that of the Messiah; and that he was taught both exoteric and secret Torah by Elijah himself and by Ahijah the Shilonite, Elijah's teacher. In approximately 1740, the Ba'al Shem Tov settled in Medzhibozh, where he established a beit midrash that attracted many adherents. They came seeking his spiritual guidance in the worship of God, in order to receive his blessing, and to beseech his prayer and intercession for their spiritual and physical welfare. While drawing upon the kabbalistic doctrines of Yosef *Karo and Yitshaq *Luria, he invested them with new meaning and thus created an original and distinctive type of mysticism. The Ba'al Shem Tov did not commit his teachings to writing; they were handed down orally and preserved in numerous sayings recorded by his followers. His sayings imparted joy and warmth and warned against sadness and mortification that "stultify the heart." Even the most simple may serve the omnipresent God through inner joy. Many stories are found in Hasidic folklore describing the Ba'al Shem Tov and the great leaders of Hasidism at prayer. True prayer is pictured as a state that freed the personality from the trammels of the body and allowed the soul to cleave to God. When the Ba'al Shem Tov prayed, it was said that his entire body would tremble, that those present would be seized with shivering, and that the building would shake. The emphasis on *intent (kavvanah), which formed one of the major points of controversy (see MITNAGGEDIM) concerning the movement, was a further tenet of the Ba'al Shem Tov. Kavvanah, he said, is the "soul of the deed." The Ba'al Shem Tov argued that all things in the world are imbued with divine vitality and that this is the foundation of existence. The assumption of the omnipresence of God in all things and in all dimensions of existence becomes a criterion for reevaluating the whole of human experience. The Ba'al Shem Tov's beit midrash in Medzhibozh and the shrine erected over his grave became centers of pilgrimage. The writings of R. *Ya'akov Yosef ha-Kohen of Polonnoye, one of the Ba'al Shem Tov's students, include many of his sayings; another student, R. *Dov Ber of Mezhibezh, succeeded the Ba'al Shem Tov as the leader of Hasidism.

BA'AL TEFILLAH (בַּעַל הַתְּפִלָּה; master of prayer), Ashkenazi term designating the person who leads the prayers in the presence of a minyán*; also known as the sheliach tsibbur*. In ancient times, the ba'al tefillah would recite certain prayers on behalf of those congregants who did not know the texts; they would listen as the ba'al tefillah recited the prayers aloud and fulfill their ritual obligations by making appropriate responses (amen, barukh hu' u-varukh shemo, etc.). The advent of printed books did not eliminate this function, since some worshipers are still unfamiliar with the service. Today the ba'al tefillah may also serve as a kind of assistant *cantor, typically presiding at weekday services in a style less musically ornate than that of the hazzan.

BA'AL TEQI'AH (בַּעַל הַתְּקִיעָה; master of the shofar blowing), Ashkenazi designation for the person who blows the *shofar on *Ro'sh ha-Shanah on behalf of the congregants, in fulfillment of the commandment "In the seventh month, on the first day of the month . . . it will be a day of blowing the shofar for you" (Nm. 29.1). The ba'al teqi'ah (among Sephardim, simply called toqe'a) also blows the shofar at the end of *Yom Kippur and, in the Sephardi rite, on Hoshana'na Rabbah. Traditionally, any male congregant may blow the shofar, but preference was given to a pious man. It is customary among Ashkenazim for the ba'al teqi'ah to wear a kitel*. Before blowing the shofar, he recites special blessings for the occasion.

BA'AL TESHUVAH (בַּעַל הַתְּשׁוּבָה), a person who repents of non-observance of any of the mitsvot (see REPENTANCE). Such an individual is highly praised by the rabbis and must not be reminded of past misdeeds (Yoma 86b). Traditionally, a ba'al teshuvah (or hozer bi-teshuvah) was expected to express repentance by confession, fast and prayer, expressions of contrition, and resolutions not to repeat the sin(s). Rabbi Abbahu said that "in a place where the ba'al teshuvah stands not even the completely righteous has a place" (Ber. 34b). In recent decades, the term has been applied to Jews who move from a non-observant to an observant lifestyle. Since the 1970s, the phenomenon of non-religious Jews becoming strictly Orthodox has been called the Ba'al Teshuvah movement. Many of these individuals study in special Ba'al Teshuvah yeshivot in Israel and the United States.

BAAL WORSHIP, worship of Canaanite fertility and weather god. Baal (lord, master), also known as Hadad, is the son of El (head of the Canaanite pantheon) and the most prominent Canaanite deity, who resides on the coastal mountain Saphon. In Ugaritic texts from Ras Shamra, Baal is the mighty storm god who defeats the sea god, Yamm, and the dragon monster, Lotan. In an encounter with the god of the underworld, Mot, Baal dies, but his sister and consort, Anath, succeeds in bringing him back to life. This myth of the dying and rising god parallels nature's cycles of sterility and fertility. Baal's cult animal is the bull, and he is sometimes pictured in reliefs with a thunderbolt as spear and a mace. The name Baal is sometimes a part of a place name (e.g., Baal-hazor, Baal-hamon), which could indicate Baal's importance as a local deity. Baal worship frequently threatened the Israelites' pure worship of their God. Even before entering Canaan, Israel is said to have sinned by sacrificing to and participating in rites for Baal-peor (Nm. 25.1-9). According to the Book of Judges, the Israelites repeatedly forsook the Lord for Baal and *Asherah (Jgs. 2.13, 3.7). Prophets such as Hosea and Jeremiah often condemned the people for their allegiance to Baal. The threat of Baalism reached its height in the days of King Ahab and Jezebel. Elijah attempted to solve the problem by challenging the priests of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kgs. 18). A number of years later, King Jehu of Israel destroyed the Baal sanctuary in Samaria, along with Baal's priests and followers (2 Kgs. 10). When Judah was ruled by Queen Athaliah, there was a Baal shrine in Jerusalem (2 Kgs. 11.18). The Judean reformer kings Hezekiah and Josiah sought to eliminate Baalism. Since only a few biblical names belonging to Israelites contain a Baal theophoric element, and personal names on inscriptions and seals from the period of the divided monarchy are overwhelmingly Yahvistic, it seems that Baal worship was not as widespread in Israel as previously believed and that it rarely supplanted Yahvism. Some of Baal's attributes, however, were transferred to the God of Israel: Psalm 29 depicts Yahveh with many of the characteristics of the Canaanite storm god, and Baal's victory over the sea re-echoes in the triumphs of Israel's God (cf. Ps. 74.13–14; Jb. 7.12).

BABEL, TOWER OF. See TOWER OF BABEL.

BABYLONIA. The originally insignificant city-state of Babylon, located on the Euphrates, was elevated by *Hammurabi (r.1792–1750) and his dynasty (the first dynasty of Babylon) to the capital city and cultural metropolis of southern Mesopotamia. Eventually, all of southern Mesopotamia came to be known as Babylonia, while northern Mesopotamia was called *Assyria. The other major period of Babylonian supremacy was the Neo-Babylonian (or Chaldean) empire first established by Nabopolassar (r.625–605), which endured until the conquest of Babylon by *Cyrus II of Persia in 539 BCE, after which Babylon never regained independence. It appears that the original form of the name of the city-state was Babilla, one of the very old place names in Mesopotamian sources that originated neither in Sumerian nor Akkadian, the two main languages of Mesopotamian documents, but rather was derived from one of the languages spoken by the indigenous residents of Mesopotamia before the Sumerian arrival at the dawn of the historical period (the end of the fourth millennium BCE). The ancient Hebrews derived the Hebrew designation Bavel from the Hebrew verb b l l (mix together, confuse; in Gn. 11.7, 9 God confused the languages of the builders of the Tower of Babel). In the Bible, Babylon and its environs are also called Shinar (Gn. 10.10, 11.2, 14.1, 9; Jos. 7.21; Is. 11.11; Zec. 5.11; Dn. 1.2), a designation that also occurs in Egyptian and Akkadian documents as early as the fifteenth century BCE. Though its origin is still uncertain, some scholars think that it is a transliteration of one of the Sumerian terms for that region. The name Babel appears in the Bible in several contexts: as part of the prehistory of Israel described in Genesis 1–12, in the table of nations, referring here to Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh as the mainstays of Nimrod's kingdom (Gn. 10.10); in the etiological story of the founding of the city of Babylon based on the building of a ziggurat there (Gn. 11.1–9); in the story of the Chaldean ruler

Merodach-baladan, who sent envoys to Hezekiah to enlist the aid of Judah, apparently in an attempt to rebel against Assyria, after which the prophet Isaiah warned that Babylon would eventually sack Jerusalem and carry off as plunder all the treasures that Hezekiah had displayed before the Babylonians (2 Kgs. 20.12–19; Is. 39.1–8); in the story of the capture of Judah (597 BCE) and the destruction of the First Temple (587–586 BCE) by Nebuchadnezzar II (605–562), son of the founder of the Neo-Babylonian empire, who exiled the Judeans en masse to Babylon (2 Kgs. 24–25; Jer. 39–41, 52; 2 Chr. 36); and in the account of the capture of Babylon by Cyrus II of Persia (539 BCE) and the end of the Babylonian exile, when the last Babylonian king, Nabonidus (556–539), turned the majority of the people against him by attempting a religious revolution and replacing the patron deity and longtime chief god of Babylon, Marduk, with the moon god Sin as the head of the pantheon. Babylon lost its independence forever in a somewhat ignominious fashion, when Cyrus entered the city as the “legitimate” ruler “appointed” by Marduk, encountered no significant resistance, and proceeded to restore Marduk to his “rightful” place at the head of the Babylonian pantheon. Only the prophets of Israel must have been truly dismayed, for they had prophesied total destruction for Babylon as punishment from God (e.g., Is. 46; Jer. 50–51). Nevertheless, the final historical irony occurred one year later, in 538 BCE, when the very event that had one year earlier resulted in Babylon's extinction as an independent state now gave rise to the edict of Cyrus (Ez. 1.1–4, 6.1–5; 2 Chr. 36.22–23), allowing the Judeans to return to Zion, rebuild their Holy Temple, and restore their national identity, which the Babylonians had attempted to extinguish.

Only some of the exiles elected to return to Judah; the others remained in Babylonia (they made pilgrimages to Jerusalem), where a number of towns were completely populated by Jews. Under Parthian rule, they enjoyed extensive self-government and were headed by an *exilarch. Following the decline of Palestinian Jewry resulting from the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (c.132–135), rabbinic *academies were established in Babylonia. Initially these acknowledged the authority of the Palestinians, but as the latter declined, the Babylonian academies became the focus of Jewish learning and culture. The supreme expression was the *Talmud Bavli, which henceforth became the basis of study and decision-making throughout the Jewish world. The Babylonian academies remained the center of authority especially after the abolition of the Palestinian patriarchate in 425. During the period of the ge'onim (see GA'ON), all communities and rabbis turned to Babylonia for guidance and decisions on their religious problems (see RESPONSA). This hegemony lasted until the time of *Ha'i Ga'on, after which Babylonia was superseded by centers in the west.

BABYLONIAN EXILE, the period from 16 March 597 BCE, when significant numbers of Judahites were forcibly deported to Babylonia, until the edict of Cyrus in April 538, which allowed the Jews to return from Babylonia to Jerusalem for the purpose of rebuilding the Temple destroyed by the forces of the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar in August c.587. In 603 King Jehoiakim of Judah became Nebuchadnezzar's vassal. In 601, however, Jehoiakim rebelled (2 Kgs. 24.1), and in 598 Nebuchadnezzar's armies set out for Judah to put down the rebellion. A group of Judahites who sought to placate the Babylonians assassinated Jehoiakim and enthroned his son Jehoiachin in his place. Three months later Jerusalem surrendered, and Jehoiachin and most of the nobility and officialdom along with ten thousand able-bodied males were exiled to Babylonia (2 Kgs. 24.12-16). Among the exiles was the prophet *Ezekiel. Nebuchadnezzar installed Jehoiachin's uncle Zedekiah as king of Judah. Nevertheless biblical texts (Ez. 1; Jer. 27ff.), epigraphs from both Judah and Babylonia, and Nebuchadnezzar himself continued to regard Jehoiachin as the legitimate king of Judah. Between 595 and 594, civil unrest in Babylonia inspired the Judahites and other nations to renounce their loyalty to the Babylonian ruler. Although the prophets Jeremiah in Judah and Ezekiel in Babylonia sought to discourage the Jews from rebelling, in 589 King Zedekiah revolted, and Nebuchadnezzar responded by laying siege to Jerusalem, which he conquered in July 587. Zedekiah was captured and forced to witness the execution of his sons before he himself was blinded and carried away in chains to Babylon. A month later, on 7 Av (observed as a fast by Karaite Jews to this day; Rabbanite Jews fast instead on 9 Av), Nebuzaradan, the Babylonian king's chief official, burnt Solomon's Temple, destroyed the walls of Jerusalem, and carried away another 832 Jews into exile. The Babylonians then appointed Gedaliah as governor of Judah; however, he was assassinated by Judean nationalists (2 Kgs. 25); in putting down this final Judean rebellion Nebuzaradan exiled another 740 Jews (582). The majority of Judahites remained in the land of Judah, and their everyday life was not appreciably affected by the political events. The small number of exiles enumerated in 2 Kings and Jeremiah explains the small number of returnees enumerated in Ezra 2 (Neh. 7). With the destruction of the Temple and the Babylonian exile, which were believed to have been divine retribution for the nation's sins, the historical books of the Bible come to an end. Information concerning the lives of the exiles in Babylonia is sparse, but several facts are available. Most of the deportees lived in small communities (Ez. 3.15) headed by their own elders (Ez. 8.1, 14.1, 20.1), were encouraged to marry (Jer. 29.6), and owned their own houses (Jer. 29.5). It was probably during this period that the institution of the *synagogue emerged. The exiles, it is thought, came together to pray for the return to Zion and the rebuilding of the Temple and sought words of comfort from the prophets (Ezekiel, Deutero-Isaiah). The rabbis stated that during this period the square Hebrew script was adopted and the months of the year were given Babylonian names. Although Cyrus allowed the exiles to return, many chose to remain in Babylonia.

BACHARACH, NAFTALI (17th cent.), one of the most important kabbalists before the eruption of the Shabbatean movement; author of the influential work Emeq ha-Melekh (1648). Bacharach was born in Frankfurt and lived there most of his life, but he also visited Poland for several years and claimed to have visited Safed, where he said he received traditions from the school of Yitsh'ahq Luria; this claim, however, seems to be unfounded. He also claimed to be the original source of the traditions concerning Luria presented in the writings of Yosef Shelomoh *Del-Medigo, but the truth seems to be that, on the contrary, it was he who made use of the Italian scholar's writings. Emeq ha-Melekh is a systematic presentation of Lurianic Kabbalah, emphasizing its radical aspects and dwelling in detail on the powers of evil in the created and heavenly realms. The author presents the writings of R. Hayyim Vital as his main source, but actually he based his system on the writings of R. Yisra'el Sarug, who developed an original version of the Lurianic teachings. Emeq ha-Melekh greatly influenced Shabbatean authors in the seventeenth century and, later, Hasidic and Mitnagdic writers in the nineteenth century. But there was also severe criticism leveled against Bacharach, and his loyalty to the teachings of Luria was questioned. Among his critics were Mosheh Hagiz and Yeshayahu Bassan in the eighteenth century.

BACHARACH, YA'IR HAYYIM (1638-1702), German Talmudist and rabbi. An independent thinker, who often disagreed with earlier rabbinic authorities, Bacharach—who was well-versed in secular studies—declared in one of his responsa (Havvat Ya'ir, no. 9), "the chief of the Greek philosophers has written; Socrates is my friend, Plato is my friend, but the truth is my most beloved friend." Bacharach was strongly opposed to the use of elaborate pilpul to harmonize halakhic difficulties. He was an avid student of Kabbalah. Greatly interested, also, in the Shabbatean movement, he collected manuscripts concerning *Shabbetai Tsevi.

Bacharach wrote 'Ets Hayyim, a comprehensive three-part compendium of Jewish thought, and a collection of 238 responsa entitled Havvat Ya'ir (Frankfort, 1699). The title is a double entendre: in Hebrew, "the tents of Ya'ir" (Nm. 32.41); in German, "The Ya'ir of Havvah," a tribute to his grandmother Havvah. Most of Bacharach's other works remain in manuscript.

For the last three years of Bacharach's life, he served as the rabbi of Worms, a position previously held by both his father and grandfather.

Ordained as a rabbi at the Breslau Rabbinical Seminary in 1876, Bacher was named professor at the Landesrabbinschule in Budapest in 1877, where he remained for the rest of his life. Bacher was a versatile scholar and wrote over six hundred articles on a wide range of subjects, including biblical exegesis, Hebrew philology, and Judeo-Persian literature. He is best known for his pioneering six volumes on the aggadah*, Die Agada der babylonischen Amordrer (1878), as well as for Die Agada der Tannaiten (2 vols. BADHAN (בִּדְחָן), in Ashkenazi communities, a folk poet and singer in charge of wedding ceremonies and other religious feasts and celebrations. Entertaining at weddings is considered a commendable religious deed (a mitsvah) worthy of reward in the next world (Ta'an. 22a). The art of the badhan lies in his spontaneous improvisation of new songs and rhymed prose (derashah) for each celebration. He may deliver Talmudic-styled parodies, invite the celebrants to dance while deciphering their names by means of the technique of gimatriyah (the numerical value of the Hebrew letters), or create witty word plays about people's looks or character.

In recent generations, the performative range of the badhan has become more theatrical; he may even appear in different costumes for his various roles. In spite of the strong objection from rabbis and other religious community leaders, who consider the badhan's form of entertainment mocking and reckless, the custom has deep roots in Ashkenazi folklore and, although it has declined in the twentieth century, continues to the present.

BAECK, LEO (1873–1956), German Reform rabbi, scholar, theologian, and communal leader. Baeck was one of the towering figures of twentieth-century German-Jewish life. Beginning his rabbinate in Oppeln (1897–1907), he moved to Dusseldorf (1907–1912) and then to Berlin in 1912, where he remained until 1942. Influenced by Hermann Cohen and responding to Adolf von Harnack's The Essence of Christianity, Baeck presented, in The Essence of Judaism (German, 1905; English, 1936) and in subsequent works, such as The Pharisees (1947) and Judaism and Christianity (1958), a contrast between "classic religion," committed to moral action, and "romantic religion," committed to emotion. In classic religion (Judaism), one becomes free through the commandments; in romantic religion (Christianity), through grace. In This People Israel (New York, 1964), part of which was written in the concentration camp of Theresienstadt but which was completed a few days before his death, Baeck presented his vision of the religious role of the Jewish people, at the core of which lay morality. The key to Judaism is its polarity between "mystery" (the manifestation of the divine in humans) and commandments (the demands of ethical monotheism). The head of the liberal rabbinate in Germany from 1923, Baeck became the head of all German Jewry in 1933, after the Nazi decrees destroyed the legal status of German Jewry. Though he had a number of opportunities to escape from Germany, he remained at his post until he was deported in 1942 to the Theresienstadt concentration camp. After the war, he settled in London. In the 1950s he became a visiting professor at the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati.

BAER, YITZHAK (1888–1980), scholar of medieval history. Born in Halberstadt, Germany, Baer received his doctorate from Freiburg University in 1912. His greatest scholarly contribution lies in the field of Spanish-Jewish history, particularly during the Christian period. He undertook an exhaustive review of royal archives and Jewish communal records in Spain. This work resulted in his publication of two volumes of primary sources, Die Juden im christlichen Spanien (1929, 1936). Following his immigration to Palestine and appointment as professor of Jewish history at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Baer published a third volume on Spain, Toledot ha-Yehudim bi-Sefarad ha-Notsrit (Jerusalem, 1945; published in English as The History of the Jews in Christian Spain [Philadelphia, 1992]), a monumental narrative account of Jewish life in Christian Spain. His book Galut (Germany, 1936; New York, 1947) presented a highly schematic and lugubrious portrait of Jewish history in the Diaspora. Written in the early years of the Nazi reign in Germany, it underscored Baer's own Zionist inclinations, according to which Jewish life in Erets Yisra'el was superior to life outside it. Toward the end of his career, Baer embarked on a new field of historical research, the study of the Second Temple period. A Festschrift published in his honor in Jerusalem in 1961 includes a bibliography of his writings up to 1959.

BAḤUR (בַּחור; chosen one), in the Bible, refers to a picked soldier (1 Sm. 26.2) or a person in the prime of his youth and vigor (cf. Ecccl. 11.9, 12.1). Since the word was often juxtaposed with betulah (virgin; Dt. 32.5; Is. 62.5; Lam. 1.16), it was regarded in later Hebrew as the equivalent of an unmarried man (Ket. 7a). Its use is now largely confined to this meaning, as the general title given both to a bachelor and particularly to an (unmarried) yeshivah* student (Yi. bokher).

BAḤUR, ELIYYAHU. See LEVITA, ELIYYAHU.

BAḤYA, PSEUDO- (11th–12th cent.), anonymous author of Kitab Ma'ani al-Nafs. Although the work was ascribed to Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda'*, this ascription is now generally rejected since Kitab Ma'ani al-Nafs is completely Neoplatonist in its orientation, whereas Bahya' follows both Neoplatonism and the Kalam. Its author argues that the soul is a spiritual being, independent of the body. He divides the universe into ten emanations; namely, the active intellect or wisdom (shekhinah), the universal soul, nature, matter, the celestial sphere, stars, fire, air, water, and earth. Human beings are formed from all ten emanations, but the human soul is most nearly related to the universal soul and the active intellect. In its descent to the human body, it must pass through all the emanations, all of which leave traces of their influence—accounting for the differences in the human temperament. These impurities must be removed if the soul is to be reunited once more with its spiritual source. Nothing is known of the author, and his work was little known by later philosophers. The original Arabic was edited by Ignaz Goldziher and published in 1907 in Berlin; Isaac Broydé published a Hebrew translation (Torot ha-Nefesh) in 1896 in Paris.

BAḤYA BEN ASHER (died 1320), Bible commentator. Born in Saragossa, Spain, he served as judge (dayyan) in the rabbinical court and preacher (darshan) in that city. A disciple of Shelomoh ben Avraham Adret, Bahya was among the first writers to quote the Zohar. Although he refers to the Zohar as "The Midrash of Rabbi Shim'on bar Yoh'ai," he generally distinguishes it from rabbinic literature. Bahya's most important work was his commentary on the Torah, which has been reprinted in more than twenty editions since 1492 and in eleven supercommentaries known in full, from fragments, or from quotations. This commentary heavily influenced the Tse'edah u-Re'edah*. Bahya employs a fourfold method of interpretation associated with the acronym pardes*. These four levels of interpretation are peshat, contextual interpretation; derekh ha-Midrash, insights from the Midrash; derekh ha-sekkel, insights from philosophy; and derekh ha-Kabbalah, insights from the esoteric lore of the Jewish mystics. Bahya's other works are a commentary on Avot; Kad ha-Qemah (Constantinople, 1515), a collection of sixty sermons concerning the essentials of Jewish religious practice; and Shulhan shel Arba' (Mantua, 1514), a work in four chapters, the first three of which explain the halakhot pertaining to meals eaten in this world, while the fourth discusses the banquet of the righteous in the world to come. Bahya's works are especially important because of their numerous references to the kabbalistic works of Nahmanides' generation, while his Bible commentary helps to explain the meaning of mystical elements in Nahmanides' Bible commentary.

BAḤYA BEN YOSEF IBN PAQUDA' (11th cent.), philosopher and moralist; author of Hovot ha-Levavot (Duties of the Heart), one of the most popular works of spiritual and ethical guidance in Judaism. Little is known of Bahya's life, except that he lived in Muslim Spain and was a judge in a rabbinic court. It was perhaps in this capacity that he became sensitive to the dangers of emphasizing outward punctiliousness in the observance of law (the duties of the limbs) to the neglect of the inward, spiritual duties of the heart. The work of Bahya is modeled on Muslim mystical literature, which conducts the reader through the various stages of the inner life toward spiritual perfection and loving communion with God. His proof of God's essential attributes—his existence, unity, and eternity—as well as his proofs of creation are largely derived from Kalam*. Despite his indebtedness to Muslim mysticism and Arabic Neoplatonism, Hovot ha-Levavot is a classic of Jewish piety. In his understanding of human nature and the path to perfection, Bahya follows the Platonic tradition. The soul, of celestial origin, is placed by divine decree within the body, in whose service it is in danger of forgetting its supernatural calling. The growth of the soul is aided by the inspiration of reason (both a faculty residing in humans and a supernatural entity) and by the revealed Torah. The obligations imposed by the latter correspond to the blessings God has showered on humanity, especially on the Jew as a member of the chosen people; they also specify the general duties suggested by simple reason, and in particular the duty of gratitude toward the benefactor. The marvelous microcosmic nature of human beings serves a double purpose: that of leading people to God through the contemplation of creation, since God can be known in no other way; and that of inculcating the duty of gratitude toward the benefactor. One must fulfill all duties to God without wavering. Trust in God rests on two principles: God knows what is good for humanity better than does humanity itself; and while people are free with respect to their intentions and decisions, the realization of their acts is solely determined by the divine will. A strong spiritual life demands agreement between one's conscience and one's performance. Ascetic discipline leads to the uppermost rung of spirituality, which is the love of God. Baḥya eschews the more extreme forms of asceticism (for example, seclusion from society) but advocates a middle path: the true ascetic is one who is always with God while at the same time performing his duties within society. Belief in the afterlife is an important aspect of his system. Baḥya's work, written in Judeo-Arabic, has been translated into many languages, and Hovot ha-Levavot was one of the most frequently printed guides to Jewish spiritual life. It was translated into Hebrew by Yehudah ibn Tibbon in 1160 and was one of the first Hebrew books to be printed (Naples, 1489). It was translated into English by Moses Hyamson (1965) and Menahem Mansoor (1973). Baḥya also wrote a number of piyyutim.

BALAAM (Heb. Bil'am), son of Beor; a pagan seer from Pethor in northern Mesopotamia. According to the biblical account (Nm. 22–24), Balak, king of Moab, asked Balaam to curse the Israelites when they approached his country on their way from the wilderness to Canaan. Instead, Balaam uttered blessings under divine inspiration. Balaam is described both as a typical pagan soothsayer and as a genuine prophet of God. Talmudic tradition regards him as one of the prophets God raised among the nations, equal to Moses in prophetic power, but at the same time utterly wicked—on Balaam's advice the Midianites enticed Israel to immorality and idolatry of Baal-peor. The story of Balaam's ass is much debated between literalistic and allegoristic commentators; Maimonides, for example, held that Balaam dreamed that his ass spoke. The story is an example of early Israelite satire that demonstrates the power of God over that of a pagan seer, who sees (and speaks) only what God permits. The words of Balaam, "How goodly are your tents, O Jacob, and your dwelling places, O Israel" (Nm. 24.5), are the first words uttered each morning upon entering the synagogue. Balaam's statement, "A star shall come forth from Jacob and a scepter shall rise out of Israel" (Nm. 24.17), was widely interpreted as a messianic prediction; it was applied to Shim'on bar Kokhba' (Shim'on, son of the star), who led the second revolt against Rome (132–135).

BAL TASHHIT (בַּל תַּשְׁחִית; do not destroy), biblical prohibition against destroying fruit trees, even when laying siege to a city (Dt. 20.19–20), extended by the Talmud to cover all senseless destruction or waste (Shab. 129a; B. Q. 91b). The rabbis permitted destruction if there was an ultimately constructive objective (e.g., cutting trees for building or in order to let other trees grow).

BAMBERGER, SELIGMANN BAER (1807–1878), Bavarian rabbi and Orthodox leader in Germany. At an assembly of Jewish representatives convened by the Bavarian government in 1836, it was his firm stand that led to the Reform party's unexpected defeat. As district rabbi of Würzburg from 1840, Bamberger headed the yeshivah there and founded a seminary that trained hundreds of Jewish teachers. The "Würzburger Rav" (as he became known) spoke for a popular, countrified Orthodoxy and was one of the last great German Talmudists. His works comprised responsa and practical halakhah, but together with his son (Shim'on Simḥah), he also annotated Yitsḥaq ibn Ghayyat's Halakhot Kelulot (Sha'arei Simḥah [1861–1862]). During the 1870s, Bamberger opposed the secession of autonomous Orthodox communities (as advocated by Samson Raphael Hirsch), maintaining that Orthodox Jewry should present a united front and insist upon its rights within the framework of the general community. His collected responsa appeared in Yad ha-Levi (Jerusalem, 1965).

BA-MEH MADLIQIN (בַּמֶּה מַדְלִיקִין; "With what may one light [the Sabbath lamp]?"), the opening words of the second chapter of the Mishnah tractate Shabbat, recited during the Sabbath eve service—in some rites before the main part of the service, in others after the 'Amidah. It states which wicks and oils may (and may not) be used in the Sabbath lamp. The reading was originally introduced in geonic times, possibly as an anti-Karaite polemic. Ba-Meh Madliqin is not recited when the Sabbath coincides with or immediately follows a holiday.

BANET, MORDEKHAÏ (1753–1829), Moravian rabbi who served in Nikolsburg and Ludenburg, eventually rising to the position of district rabbi of Moravia. The head of a large and renowned yeshivah in Nikolsburg, his publications include Bi'ur Mordekhai (2 vols. [Vienna, 1805, 1813]), novellae on Sefer Mordekhai by R. *Mordekhai ben Hillel; Parashat Mordekhai (Szeged, 1889), a collection of responsa; and Maḥashevet Mordekhai (Mukachevo, 1908), homiletical insights on the Torah. Banet was a staunch opponent of the nascent religious reform movement in Europe. His responsum condemning the reformist Hamburg Temple prayer book is included in Eleh Divrei ha-Berit (Hamburg, 1819), a collection of such writings by leading traditionalists. He was also a leading critic of Sha'ul ben Tsevi Hirsch *Berlin's book Besamim Ro'sh (Berlin, 1793), which purported to contain previously unknown responsa of the eminent medieval halakhist R. Asher ben Yehi'el. Banet deduced that the work, in which R. Asher took positions remarkably similar to those enunciated by champions of the Enlightenment, was a forgery.

BANISHMENT, expulsion from one's normal residence. Biblical law legislates banishment only in the case of accidental slayers who find *asylum from blood vengeance in the cities of refuge; the rabbis, however, insisted that this banishment was no mere protective asylum, but had also an atoning function. Banishment from the land is the major punishment that God visits on his people (see EXILE), as it was a punishment in the cases of Adam and Cain. In the Second Temple period, banishment was occasionally decreed as a punishment in criminal cases. Banishment is not recognized in Jewish law as a normal form of punishment, though medieval courts resorted to it in order to rid the community of heretical individuals (see EXCOMMUNICATION). In some periods mystics would take up voluntary exile (galut) or wanderings (gerushim) to promote mystical atonement.

BAPTISM, ritual purification by total immersion in water (tevilah). During the Second Temple period, baptism was practiced by many pietist groups and sects (see ESENESES; JOHN THE BAPTIST). It was required of converts to Judaism and became the distinctive conversion rite of the Christian church (Mk. 1.9; Acts 2.38–41, 8.38, 19.3–5). The practice of total immersion has largely given way in Christianity to a ceremonial sprinkling of water. See also ABLUTION; HEMEROBAPTISTS; MIQVEH.

BAQQASHAH (תַּפִּלָּה; entreaty, supplication), name given to two types of piyyutim (see PIYYUT). The first consists of works written in prose or rhymed verse (by authors such as *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, *Baḥya ben Yosef ibn Paquda', and Shelomoh *ibn Gabirol) with philosophical or theological content, mainly for private meditation. The second type is a shorter composition in the style of Spanish liturgical poetry with a strict rhyming pattern (for example, Yitshaq ben Levi ibn Mar Sha'ul's Elohei 'al Tedineni and El'azar ben Mosheh *Azikri's later *Yedid Nefesh). Baqqashot is also the name given to a service of piyyutim printed at the commencement of Sephardi prayer books from the seventeenth century on and recited or sung by congregants before the Sabbath Shaḥarit service. In Syria (Aleppo and Damascus) and Morocco, and in related congregations in twentieth-century Erets Yisra'el, the singing of baqqashot developed into a more independent liturgical activity.

BARAIYTA' (Aram.; ܒܪܝܬܐ), a term referring to a tannaitic pericope appearing in the Talmud, which means "[a tannaitic statement] external [to the Mishnah]." It is used for Midrashic tannaitic material or, more frequently, for halakhic tannaitic material. Baraiyot are often parallel to pericopes of existing tannaitic works, such as the Tosefta'. Such baraiyot are rarely identical in wording to their parallels. Divergencies, rather than deriving from an independent source, usually resulted from editorial reworking (to achieve harmonization with the Mishnah, for example), especially in the Talmud Bavli. The Talmud Yerushalmi sometimes abbreviates baraiyot. Some baraiyot in the Talmud Bavli that have no parallels elsewhere may be post-tannaitic creations. The Talmud commonly accords tannaitic statements found in baraiyot equal authority to those in the Mishnah and often rules according to baraiyot against the Mishnah. Originally there was no special word to designate baraiyot; the Talmud Yerushalmi refers both to the Mishnah and to baraiyot with the word matnita'. Fourth-generation Babylonian amora'im increasingly introduced the term baraiyta', paralleling a growing tendency to award the Mishnah canonic status. The term was extended to the various tannaitic works themselves: the Tosefta' and the Midrash, for instance, were referred to as baraiyot, in contrast to the Mishnah.

BARAIYTA' DE-MELE'KHET HA-MISHKAN, an ancient work, containing tannaitic material, apparently compiled, like other baraiyot, after the redaction of the Mishnah. It describes the manner in which the Tabernacle was constructed. It is occasionally cited in the Talmud and by early post-Talmudic authorities. It was first published in Venice in 1608, and a critical edition was published by Meir Friedmann in 1908.

—AVRAHAM WALFISH

BARAIYTA' DE-NIDDAH, an ancient work containing aggadic and halakhic material relating to the laws of the menstrual woman (Lv. 15.19–33). It contains many stringent rulings, tending to follow the opinion of Beit Shamm'ai rather than that of Beit Hillel. Leading scholars believe that many of the book's rulings, although at variance with accepted Talmudic law, are rooted in ancient Palestinian rabbinic sources. It was first mentioned by Nahmanides and was published by C. M. Horowitz in 1890.

BARAIYTA' OF THIRTY-TWO RULES, an ancient work presenting thirty-two hermeneutic principles utilized in the aggadic interpretation of scripture, ascribed by tradition to R. Yosei ben El'azar the Galilean, a second-century tanna'. Some scholars, on the basis of linguistic proof and the existence in the work of later material, date the work to the period of the later ge'onim. Others differentiate between the original layer of the work, dating to the tannaitic period, containing only the rules themselves, and later layers, which added examples and applications of the rules. Some of the rules, such as gimatriyyah (calculating the numerical value of a word) and notariqon (interpretation of a word as an acrostic or breaking a word into two), while going far beyond normal exegetical understanding, were nonetheless common modes of interpreting literary texts, as well as dreams, during the time of the rabbis.

BARCELONA, DISPUTATION OF, Jewish-Christian public *disputation held in 1263. In the latter part of the thirteenth century, a Jewish convert to Christianity named Friar Paul Christian developed a fresh approach to *polemics, mining the Talmud and Midrash for statements demonstrating the truth of Christianity, just as the Hebrew Bible itself had been mined.

In Barcelona, Moses *Nahmanides, the most distinguished rabbi on the Iberian Peninsula, found himself face to face with Paul Christian in a public disputation initiated by Dominican friars and sponsored and attended by King James I of Aragon himself. The items on the agenda were not new; they included the propositions that the Messiah had already come, that he was both human and divine, that he suffered and was killed for the sins of mankind, and that the ceremonial law ended with his coming. What was novel was the claim that these propositions could be proved through a combination of biblical and Talmudic evidence.

Nahmanides attempted to abort the argument by maintaining that since the rabbis lived after the time of Jesus and manifestly refrained from embracing Christianity, the argument for a Christological Talmud was absurd. When the disputation proceeded anyway, he maintained that the Midrash, or the nonlegal corpus of the rabbis, was not doctrinally binding and that no argument based upon this material had the power to compel Jewish assent. Paul was not silenced; the debate went on to address a host of detailed issues and culminated in a public exchange between the two protagonists at Sabbath services in a Barcelona synagogue.

A Latin account of the disputation awards victory to Paul. Controversy surrounds the authenticity of the vigorous anti-Christian pronouncements that Nahmanides reports in his Hebrew narrative of the disputation. At the end of the Hebrew narrative, it is stated that the king informed Nahmanides in a private conversation that he had never seen someone who was in error defend his position so impressively. While there is no doubt that Jewish and Christian observers perceived the outcome differently, there can be little question that Nahmanides' performance succeeded in preserving Jewish morale in the face of a new attack, which subsequent Christians were to develop into a deadly assault on late medieval Jewry.

BAREHEADEDNESS. See COVERING OF THE HEAD.

BAREKHU (בָּרַךְ), first word of Barekhu et Adonai hamevorakh, "Bless the Lord who is [to be] blessed," which has become the customary synagogue formula of invitation to prayer. It is based on the phrase "Bless the Lord," which occurs frequently in the Bible (e.g., Ps. 135.19; Neh. 9.5). This formula (cf. Ber. 50a) serves as the opening of both the morning and evening prayers in the synagogue (those sections of the morning prayer now preceding Barekhu did not originally form part of the obligatory synagogue prayers) and also constitutes the introduction to the public reading from the Torah. While the reader chants Barekhu, the congregation reads silently a prayer beginning Yitbarakh (of which different versions exist in the various rites); when the reader concludes the invitation, the congregation responds aloud: "Blessed is the Lord who is [to be] blessed for ever and ever." Genizah fragments have shown that the Barekhu formula was not used among Palestinian Jews. It became customary for the reader in the invocation and the congregants in the response to bow at the word barekhu/barukh. Eastern-Sephardi and Hasidic Jews repeat Barekhu before 'Aleinu at the end of Shaḥarit and Ma'ariv. Barekhu was used for the Zimman (the invitation to *Birkat ha-Mazon) but was later replaced by the Nevarekh (let us bless) formula, which is used today.

BAR KOKHBA', SHIM'ON (died 135 CE), leader of the second Jewish revolt against Rome. His real name, known from his military dispatches found in the Judean desert caves, was Bar Kosiba'. He was given the sobriquet Bar Kokhba', Son of the Star, an allusion to Numbers 24.17, widely taken to refer to the *Messiah, by those who saw in him the messianic redeemer.

The revolt started in 132 CE and was the result of still simmering Jewish opposition to Roman rule on both practical and nationalistic grounds. The immediate cause may have been the prohibition of circumcision or the increased messianic fervor resulting from the possibility that the Temple might be rebuilt. Initially the Jews were successful, and Bar Kokhba' set up an entire government and may even have restored sacrifice in Jerusalem under his high priest, El'azar. With the arrival of greater Roman forces, the country was gradually retaken.

Bar Kokhba' was a stern commander who concerned himself with numerous minor details. The texts recently discovered in the Judean desert indicate his concern for observance of the Sabbath and Jewish holidays. The rabbis debated his messianic status, but it is clear that many of his followers and even R. *Aqiva' ben Yosef saw him as the Messiah. His success in freeing Jerusalem certainly contributed to this impression, and his use of the title nasi' (prince) may have been designed to encourage this perception.

Bar Kokhba' was killed at Betar in 135 CE, in what was doubtless the last great battle of the revolt. By this time the Romans had reconquered most of Judea, and the only remaining resistance must have been in the Judean desert. Historical sources on the revolt are scanty. Some have linked the holiday of *Lag ba-'Omer to the Bar Kokhba' period.

BAR MITZVAH (בָּר מִצְוָה; son of [the] commandment), an adult male Jew obligated to perform the commandments; hence, the ceremony at which a thirteen-year-old boy becomes an adult member of the community for ceremonial purposes (including that of making up a minyan*). Although one of the most widely observed of all Jewish rites, it is devoid of ancient authority or sanction. The term itself in its present-day connotation is unknown in the Talmud, though it is found as a general term applying to an adult male (B. M. 96a). The Talmud merely states that a male child reaches his religious majority on attaining puberty, which as a general but not an exclusive rule is set at the age of thirteen years and a day (Kid. 16b). From this age on, he is regarded as a responsible person, liable for the results of his own actions, and it is for this reason that Rabbi El'azar enjoins that when a child reaches this age the father should recite the blessing *Barukh she-Petarani ("Blessed is he who has freed me from the responsibility for this child" [Gn. Rab. 63.14]). The performance of all the duties of a Jew are now incumbent on the youth (Avot 5.21). Since about the fourteenth century the term bar mitsvah has been used only to refer to a boy on the attainment of his religious majority. An elaborate ceremony has developed, generally divided into the religious ceremony in the synagogue and the subsequent social celebration. The synagogue ceremony normally takes place among Ashkenazim on the first Sabbath after the actual thirteenth Hebrew birthdate, though it can be held on any weekday when scripture reading takes place. A characteristically visible expression of the bar mitsvah in observant circles is that the boy begins to put on tefillin* daily. In some communities of Baghdadi provenance, the first putting on of phylacteries on the day following the ceremony is made the occasion of a separate ceremony. In medieval Europe, community statutes strictly regulated and limited the extent of the festivities and gifts and provided for similar celebrations for poor boys at the community's expense. Today, the celebration and presents are often on a lavish scale. In the synagogue the bar mitsvah boy is called to the reading of a portion of the Law, usually the last portion, the maftir* (in some cases the boy reads the entire weekly portion) and also reads the haftarah*. In some communities, the boy reads a special prayer for the occasion. The custom for the boy to be specially addressed in synagogue has become widespread only recently. It became the custom for the boy to deliver a learned discourse (derashah). He also receives gifts from family and friends. Rabbinic justification for the social celebration has been found in a Midrashic interpretation of Genesis 21.8, "And Abraham made a great feast on the day that Isaac was weaned," to the effect that it refers not to his weaning from his mother but from the "evil inclination" (Gn. Rab. 53.14), that is, on his attaining religious majority. The banquet thereby qualifies as a Se'udat Mitsvah, that is, a feast celebrating the fulfillment of a religious commandment. Among some eastern Sephardi communities the boy begins to don tefillin at age twelve or twelve and a half, and some even hold the bar mitsvah ceremony at this earlier age. The boy delivers his discourse when first putting on tefillin, and it is therefore known as derush li-tefillin (tefillin discourse). Another eastern Sephardi custom that has become common in Israel and in North America among Ashkenazi congregations as well as Sephardi ones is for members of the congregation to throw candies at the boy when he has finished his Torah reading. In recent years many bar mitsvah boys from Israel and abroad hold the ceremony in front of the *Western Wall. In many kibbutzim an annual ceremony is held for all boys and girls who have reached the age of bar and bat mitsvah*. At one point, Reform Judaism introduced *confirmation as a replacement for bar mitsvah, but now it is usually a supplementary ceremony held two or three years later. In the United States a bar mitsvah ceremony is sometimes held in non-Orthodox congregations for adult men who did not have a bar mitsvah observance at the usual age.

BAR QAPPARA' (3d cent. CE), Palestinian scholar (also known as Ela'zar) and a disciple of *Yehudah ha-Nasi', who made an independent collection of legal traditions (B. B. 154b). The Talmud quotes some of his sayings, epigrams, fables, and riddles—many in a poetic style, to which he was probably referring when he said (based on Gn. 9.27), "The words of Torah should be couched in the tongue of Japheth in the tent of Shem." Although he was interested in scientific inquiry (Shab. 75a), he counseled against going beyond the accepted parameters of research ("further than the ends of the heavens" [Gn. Rab. 1.10]). He is considered by some scholars to have been the chief editor of the Sifrei Zuta*'.

BARRENNESS. The first and most basic of the divine commandments is procreation (Gn. 1.28). In general, the Bible presents infertility as a punishment and a curse (Lv. 20.20–21; 2 Sm. 6.23), for example, when a desperate Rachel cries out to her husband, Jacob, that she would rather be dead than childless (Gn. 30.1). Three matriarchs, Sarah, Rebekah, and Rachel, suffered from barrenness and only conceived after much prayer and supplication. The Talmud suggests that their condition was a means of provoking them to pray, and the prayer of such righteous individuals is of inestimable spiritual value (B. B. 16a). The most dramatic biblical example of the nexus between prayer and infertility is the story of Hannah (1 Sm. 1). The prophet Isaiah comforts the childless, explaining that in God's eyes, the infertile who obey the commandments will have "a monument and a name better than sons and daughters" (Is. 56.1–6). Jewish law contains various provisions for divorce on grounds of infertility, and in Talmudic law a man should divorce his wife if she has been barren for ten years (Yev. 6.6; 64a); however, in practice, divorce in such situations is not mandatory. Rabbinic literature contains many references to the notion that supporting or teaching a child is tantamount to fulfilling the mitsvah of procreation (San. 19b). Barrenness and its cure were the subject of folklore and superstition.

BARTER (Heb. halifin), a mode of acquisition consummated by the exchange of items of property (movable or immovable, animate or inanimate, sale or gift). When one party takes possession of an object, the second party automatically and irrevocably acquires an object in exchange, wherever it is located, although no additional act of acquisition has been performed. Because the parties desire to exchange specific items, it is not required that the objects be of equal value, and the laws against fraud are inapplicable. Ultimately, the convenience of this mode of transfer resulted in the development of the qinyan sudar (symbolic barter). As opposed to real barter, which involves the exchange of the actual items being acquired, symbolic barter does not require that the object bartered constitute the actual consideration for the object acquired. In the most common variant, a kerchief (sudar) is symbolically and temporarily given by the vendee to the vendor (as a mattanah al menat le-hahzir, "a conditional gift that will be returned by the donee"); upon the vendor's acquiring the sudar, the actual object of the transaction is automatically acquired by the vendee. The validity of this symbolic mode of acquisition found scriptural support in Ruth 4.7: "Now this was the custom in former time in Israel concerning redeeming and concerning exchanging, to confirm all things: a man drew off his shoe and gave it to his neighbor."

BARUCH, BOOKS OF, a number of works purporting to have been written by *Baruch ben Neriah, disciple and amanuensis of the prophet Jeremiah.

The apocryphal 1 Baruch, preserved in Greek, is a composite work of two sections. The first is a letter of Baruch, which he reads to Jehoiachin and the exiles in Babylonia; this moves them to confess their sins and send money offerings to the Temple. The second section contains two poems: the first admonishes Israel to return to God and to seek wisdom; the second recounts the plight of the nation and promises future deliverance. It is not clear whether the two sections were originally written by the same author and whether they were written in Greek or translated from a lost Hebrew or Aramaic original. Dating each of the sections is equally difficult; the book as a whole may tentatively be dated from the first century BCE or CE.

The Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch was probably written in Hebrew after the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE but is extant only in Syriac and Arabic translations. A small papyrus fragment of its Greek version was found in Egypt. In the work, Baruch narrates how he witnessed the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans and describes the visions that he subsequently saw. The visions stress such themes as the future destruction of the gentiles, the coming of the Messiah, and the deliverance of Israel and are often couched in a highly symbolic idiom.

The Greek Apocalypse of Baruch, probably written in Greek toward the end of the first century CE, is extant both in Greek and in a Slavonic version and contains, in its current form, several Christian interpolations. It describes Baruch's journey through the five heavens, during which he sees the glorification of the righteous and the punishments meted out to the unrighteous as well as some cosmic phenomena, such as the marvelous phoenix bird.

The Rest of the Words of Baruch or The Rest of the Words of Jeremiah (4 Baruch), probably written originally in Hebrew or Aramaic, is preserved in Greek, Ethiopic, Armenian, and Slavonic and contains some Christian sections. Apparently written at the end of the first century CE or the beginning of the second, it recounts how Baruch remained in Jerusalem while Jeremiah accompanied the exiles to Babylon but returned at their head sixty-six years later.

BARUCH BEN NERIAH, trusted scribe and friend of *Jeremiah. He was responsible for publicizing the contents of a scroll containing Jeremiah's prophecies (Jer. 36.1–10). After King Jehoiakim had this scroll burned, Baruch recopied its contents along with additional material (Jer. 36.27–32). Many scholars attribute the biographical material in Jeremiah to Baruch. The recent discovery of a seal impression mentioning Baruch's name and profession seems to confirm his status as a professional scribe. Baruch's reputation inspired several pseudepigraphous works bearing his name (see BARUCH, BOOKS OF).

BARUKH (בְּרוּךְ; blessed, praised [with regard to God the two words are identical in meaning]), the opening word of the standard formula of *benediction that is one of the basic forms of Jewish prayer. The Talmud attributes many of the benedictions beginning with the formula "Blessed are you, O Lord our God, king of the universe" to the Men of the *Keneset ha-Gedolah, but this is questioned by scholars.

BARUKH ADONAI LE-OLAM (בְּרוּךְ יְיָ לְעוֹלָם; Praised Be the Lord Forever), a compilation of biblical verses, recited in the weekday evening service between *Hashkivenu (the second benediction after the *Shema) and the *Amidah. This passage, written in the geonic period, may have been added to the service as a surrogate for the nineteen benedictions of the 'Amidah, which is not repeated aloud in the evening service, since the name of God is mentioned nineteen times in the passage. Barukh Adonai le-'Olam invokes God's protection for the night and prays for final redemption. The passage is included in the Conservative liturgy.

BARUKH DAYYAN EMET (בְּרוּךְ דַּיָּאן אֱמֶת; "Blessed be the true judge"), benediction pronounced on hearing bad tidings (Ber. 9.2), since a Jew is meant to praise God both in joy and in sorrow. The formula is generally recited on hearing the report of a death; close relatives say the full liturgical formula ("Blessed are you, O Lord our God, king of the universe, the true judge"). It is also said on seeing ruined synagogues or holy sites.

BARUKH HA-SHEM (בְּרוּךְ הַשֵּׁם; "Blessed be the name [of God]"), expression, equivalent to the English "Thank God," used on hearing good tidings or in everyday speech as an utterance of well-being. It occurs in Psalms 68.20 (Barukh Adonai), and sometimes the complete phrase is used—Barukh ha-Shem [used for Adonai] yom yom, "Blessed is the Lord day by day."

BARUKH HU' U-VARUKH SHEMO (בְּרוּךְ הוּא וּבְרוּךְ שְׁמוֹ; "Blessed be he, and blessed be his name"), response by the congregation to the mention of the divine name in the first half of a benediction ("Blessed are you, O Lord"; see BENEDICTIONS), the response to the second half being amen. If the listener intends to be included in the recitation of the benediction (for example, in the Qiddush or Havdalah), the response is omitted.

BARUKH OF MEDZHIBOZH (c.1756–1810), Hasidic master, the second son of Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov's daughter Odel. He was educated under the supervision of R. Pinhas ben Avraham *Shapiro of Koretz. After 1777, when R. *Menaḥem Mendel of Vitebsk departed for Erets Yisra'el, bringing to an end his partial hegemony over the disciples of the Maggid of Mezhibrech (see DOV BER OF MEZHIRECH), Barukh began to act as a Hasidic leader. First in Tulchin and later in Medzhibozh, he established an impressive court, hoping that all Hasidim would turn to him as heir to the Ba'al Shem Tov and guardian of his burial place. Barukh initiated the dynastic pattern of Hasidic succession as well as the idea of establishing a Hasidic court. He was also the first Hasidic master to be recognized by the Russian government as a major Jewish power. Other masters spurned his claim to leadership, however, and there ensued a series of public conflicts with *Levi Yitshaq of Berdichev, *Shneur Zalman of Lyady, and Barukh's own nephew, *Nahman of Bratslav. The Hasidism represented by Barukh was noted more for its growing numerical and political strength and claims of leadership than for profundity or originality of thought. A volume of Barukh's collected teachings and sayings, Butsina' di-Nehora, was published in Lwów in 1880.

BARUKH SHE-'AMAR (ברוך שְׁאָמַר; "Blessed be he who spoke"), opening words of the *Pesuqei de-Zimra' (Ashkenazi term) or Zemiroth (Sephardi term). According to the prayer book of R. 'Amram bar Sheshna, these words recited by the hazzan signaled the commencement of public morning worship.

BARUKH SHEM KEVOD MALKHUTO LE-'OLAM VA-'ED (ברוך שֵׁם כְּבוֹד מַלְכוּתוֹ לְעוֹלָם וָעֶד; "Blessed be the name of the glory of his kingdom for ever and ever"), response recited after the first verse of the *Shema'; originally it was recited by worshipers in the Temple when the high priest uttered the Tetragrammaton on Yom Kippur (Yoma 6.2). In the Orthodox tradition it is said in an undertone to distinguish it from the rest of the Shema', which is a biblical quotation. Only on Yom Kippur is this phrase recited aloud, recalling the tradition of the Temple service. As an expression of the awareness of the holiness of the divine name, it uses a circumlocution ("the name of the glory of his kingdom"). The phrase is recited after utterance of the Tetragrammaton (YHVH and its correlatives), particularly in instances where there is doubt concerning the recitation of a blessing, such as the benediction for putting on the *tefillin of the head, or a mystical prayer such as *Anna' ba-Koah without the requisite kavvanah (see INTENT). A Talmudic legend (Pes. 56b) relates that when Jacob was dying he asked his sons if they indeed believed in the one God: their response was to state the Shema', whereupon Jacob responded barukh shem kevod malkhuto le-'olam va-'ed.

BARUKH SHE-PETARANI (ברוך שֵׁפֶטְרָנִי; Blessed Be He Who Has Freed Me [from the Responsibility for This Child]), name of the blessing (quoted in Gn. Rab. 63.14) recited by the father of a boy celebrating his bar mitzvah*. The child now assumes responsibility for his actions as a member of the religious community. In the Reform service, Barukh she-Petarani is replaced by the *She-Heḥeyanu benediction, while in many Conservative congregations the *Mi she-Berakh blessing often takes its place.

BASHYAZI, ELIYYAHU BEN MOSHEH (c.1420–1490), *Karaite scholar and theologian. He was a member of a family of legal scholars known for its liberal tendencies. His grandfather, Menaḥem, allowed the kindling of Sabbath candles, a reform of Karaite custom that met with opposition. Eliyyahu was born in Adrianople and moved with his family to Constantinople in 1455. He soon became the religious leader of the community and his authority came to be accepted by the Karaite communities of Turkey, Crimea, Poland, and Lithuania. He was an advocate of the rapprochement with Rabbanism taking place at that time and made use of rabbinic sources. His great code of Karaite law, Adderet Eliyyahu (Constantinople, 1530–1531; Yevpatoriya, 1835; Odessa, 1870; Ramleh, 1966), was quickly accepted as binding and remains the final authoritative Karaite code to this day. In this work, he provided the liberal rulings of his grandfather and father, Mosheh, with a theoretical basis grounded in earlier Karaite literature. It also contains a philosophical presentation of the ten Karaite principles of faith. In addition, Eliyyahu wrote three polemical works (Iggeret ha-Yerushah [directed against the Rabbanites], Iggeret ha-Tsom, and Iggeret Gid ha-Nasheh [both responding to his Karaite opponents]); a work on astronomical instruments and calculations (Keli ha-Nehoshet); as well as several religious hymns that entered the Karaite prayer book. Some of his correspondence with the Lithuanian Karaites has survived.

BASIR, YOSEF BEN AVRAHAM (c.980–c.1040), *Karaite author and theologian. Because of his blindness, Yosef was known by the euphemistic cognomen, "the Seer" (Basir, ha-Ro'eh in Hebrew). He came from Basra, Iraq, and traveled to Jerusalem to join its flourishing community of Karaite scholars and ascetics, studying there with Yusuf ibn Nuḥ. He soon achieved a position of religious and intellectual leadership, illustrated by the fact that he was one of the few Karaites who wrote responsa on both theological and legal topics. Among his pupils were Yeshe'a ben Yehudah, who became a leading authority in his own right, and Toviyyah ben Mosheh of Constantinople, who translated a number of Basir's works into Hebrew.

Basir wrote (actually dictated) at least eighteen works in theology, legal theory, religious law, and polemics, in addition to his responsa. His major theological work is Kitab al-Muhtawi (translated as Sefer ha-Ne'imot). He later wrote a shorter version entitled Kitab al-Tamyiz (also known as al-Mansuri, translated as Mahkamat Peti). In these works, he shows himself to be a student of the Basran school of Mu'tazili Kalam and was particularly influenced by his older Muslim contemporary Abu al-Hasan 'Abd al-Jabbar. In these works, Basir sought to define the rational basis of ethics and religious knowledge. His most important work of law is Kitab al-

Istibsar, divided into at least ten sections, some of which were translated into Hebrew. He was one of the first to oppose the "catenary" theory of forbidden marriage that made life difficult for Karaites. Basir's theological concerns also find expression in his legal works. He wrote polemical works against Islam, the Samaritans, and the Rabbanites. The last included his polemic against his older contemporary Shemu'el ben Hofni Ga'on, whom he had met in Baghdad. Basir was familiar with rabbinic literature and discussed the problematics of rabbinic tradition in a number of his works. His only work to have been published is Kitab al-Muhtawi (as Al-Kitab al-Muhtawi de Yusuf al-Basir, edited by Georges Vajda and David R. Blumenthal [Leiden, 1985]). All others (where they have survived) remain in manuscript fragments, mostly in the British Library and Firkovitch collections in Saint Petersburg. Later Karaites considered Basir to be one of their important authorities.

BASOLA, MOSHEH (died 1560), rabbinic figure in sixteenth-century Italy; scion of a French family. Basola held rabbinic posts in various Italian cities: Fano, Pesaro, and Ancona, where he settled prior to 1540. In 1522, he journeyed to Erets Yisra'el. The written record of his impressions of the Jewish communities of Jerusalem and other locations in Erets Yisra'el is an important historical document. Basola took an active role in the halakhic debates of his generation. In 1560 he moved to Safed, where he died. His extant works include legal decisions, which were cited by contemporary scholars; various writings, including Masa'ot Erets Yisra'el (edited by Itzhak Ben-Zvi [Jerusalem, 1939]); and homilies.

BATLANIM (בְּתָלָיִם), idle persons, men of leisure. In a religious context, the reference is to 'asarah batlanim, ten men who are able to devote their time to the needs of the community; for example, ensuring that there will always be a prayer quorum (minyan) for each of the daily prayers. The Mishnah defines a town as a place that has at least ten batlanim, while a place with fewer than ten is considered a village. According to *Rashi (on Meg. 3b, 5a; B. Q. 82a), the 'asarah batlanim are community employees paid for their work, but R. Nissim disputes this. In modern usage the term has a pejorative connotation.

BAT MITSVAH (בְּת מִצְוָה; daughter of [the] commandment), an adult female Jew obligated to perform the commandments; hence, the ceremony on the occasion of a girl's reaching her majority (twelve years and a day in Jewish law but sometimes postponed to the age of thirteen, which is the age for boys to have the comparable ceremony, the bar mitsvah*), when she is regarded as assuming responsibility for her actions. The concept of a (nonsynagogal) ceremony for girls was introduced by the Neo-Orthodox nineteenth-century German rabbi Ya'aqov *Ettlinger and was accepted in other European communities and also in certain Muslim countries. As part of a synagogue service, the bat mitsvah was introduced in the 1920s in the United States by the founder of the Reconstructionist movement, Mordecai M. *Kaplan, with his own daughter. It has become a regular feature in Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist synagogues, where the girl may read from the Torah and address the congregation. It has recently begun to appear in some Orthodox (but not ultra-Orthodox) circles as well, although the main observance there is usually not within a synagogue service but at home or in the synagogue hall. Occasionally, a bat mitsvah ceremony is held for a group of girls at the same time. In the United States a bat mitsvah ceremony is sometimes held in non-Orthodox congregations for adult women who did not have a bat mitsvah observance at the usual age. The Reform movement has developed an appropriate service (in the Gates of Prayer), and the Conservative prayer book (Sim Shalom) has special prayers and readings.

BAT QOL (בַּת קוֹל; daughter of a voice, i.e., echo), a term in rabbinic literature that denotes a heavenly voice announcing divine reactions to certain events and, at times, even approval of halakhic decisions. The bat qol could be heard by individuals or by groups of people and thus differs from *prophecy, in which the divine communication is received by a person already in a special relationship with God. The bat qol, like other forms of heavenly pronouncement, was not necessarily accepted as authoritative in halakhic matters, since the rabbis held that the Torah "is not in heaven" (Dr. 30.12) and that legal decisions had to be arrived at by the established hermeneutic and discursive methods (B. M. 59b).

BAVA' BATRA' (Aram.; בְּבֵא בַּתְרָא; Last Gate), third tractate of the Mishnah order Neziqin, and last of the Bavot (gates) tractates (see BAVA' QAMMA'), consisting of ten chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and both Talmuds. Bava' Batra' deals with rights and obligations vis-à-vis one's neighbors and community, and with laws concerning purchases, inheritances, and written contracts. The legal issues that arise include the right to privacy, the protection and beautification of the environment, municipal taxation, honest business practices, wills, and liens on property. Study of the subjects treated in Bavot was regarded by the rabbis as requiring great moral insight as well as legal acumen, as indicated in the citation from R. Yishma'e'l ben Elisha' that concludes Bava' Batra': "One who wishes to grow wise should occupy himself with the laws of financial matters, for there is no subject in the Torah greater than they, inasmuch as they are like a flowing fountain."

The tractate was translated into English by Isidore Epstein in the Soncino Talmud (1935).

BAVA' METSI'A' (Aram.; מִשְׁנֵי אֵת; Middle Gate), second tractate of the Mishnah order Neziqin, and middle of the three Bavot (gates) tractates (see BAVA' QAMMA'), consisting of ten chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and both Talmuds. Bava' Metsi'a' deals with laws relating to found property, bailments, purchases, usury, hiring, and renting. In most of these areas, biblical law is interpreted and expanded in order to render it applicable to contemporary situations. Thus, to the biblical command to return lost items, the Mishnah adds categories of found items that need not be returned; and methods for determining the identity of the owner, caring for the item while waiting to return it, compensating a person for time and expenses incurred while caring for and returning the item, and resolving conflicts of values involved in certain cases of returning found items. The Mishnah's extreme concern for the welfare of the underprivileged is evidenced by the laws in Bava' Metsi'a' regarding the right of a laborer to eat at his employer's expense, the obligation of an employer not to delay even slightly the payment of wages, and limitations on the right of a lender to take property of the borrower as security for a loan.

BAVA' QAMMA' (Aram.; מִשְׁנֵי אֵת; First Gate), first tractate of the Mishnah order Neziqin and first of the Bavot (gates) tractates, consisting of ten chapters. Because of its great length (thirty chapters), the tractate Neziqin was divided into three "gates" (Bava' Qamma', Bava' Metsi'a', and Bava' Batra'), or sections, of ten chapters each.

Bava' Qamma' discusses laws of torts: property damage, physical injury, and theft. The Mishnah conceptualizes and expands the biblical law of property damage, for example, treating damage caused by domestic animals (Ex. 21.35–36, 22.4), pits (Ex. 21.33–34), or fire (Ex. 22.5) as archetypes (avot) for the owner's responsibility for damage caused by improperly guarded things or animals. Special laws govern the obligation to make restitution for the damage caused and the conditions of payment. The Mishnah discusses four archetypes of property damage (B. Q. 1.1), followed by a separate discussion of theft and bodily injury; however, the Tosefta' (B. Q. 9.1) treats theft and bodily injury as part of an extended framework of thirteen archetypes.

Bava' Qamma' divides the laws of *theft into two categories: theft by force (gezelah), which requires return of the stolen item or—if the item is not extant or has undergone significant change—its monetary equivalent (only when accompanied by a false oath does gezelah mandate a further penalty); and burglary (genevah), which incurs a penalty of double payment or—regarding theft of an ox or a sheep—a quadruple or quintuple payment.

Bodily injury is unique among the torts discussed in Bava' Qamma', requiring payment for indirect injuries, including pain, healing costs, loss of workdays, and compensation for shame. The Mishnah also requires the perpetrator of the tort to request forgiveness, in addition to the payment of restitution, and condemns refusal by the injured party to grant forgiveness.

BEADLE. See SHAMMASH.

BEARDS. Among the ancient Hebrews (like other peoples of their time), the beard was considered a symbol of manhood and was carefully tended, trimmed (in later periods especially in honor of Sabbaths and festivals), and anointed. Its removal—except as a sign of mourning (Jb. 1.20)—was a disgrace (cf. 2 Sm. 10.4–5), though shaving was obligatory in certain purification ceremonies (cf. Lv. 14.9). The key biblical injunction is in Leviticus (19.27, 21.5), "You shall not destroy the side-growth of your beard." Although probably originally a prohibition against imitating pagan worshipers, it was interpreted by the rabbis as a prohibition against shaving. They specifically forbade the removal of sideburns and hair on certain places on the cheek and chin. Some Orthodox Jews today do not cut their sideburns (see PE'OT). However, interpretations of the ban on "destroying" the hair left the possibility of shaving the hair without technically infringing this prohibition (for example, by depilatory or electric razor, seen as not "destroying" the hair). The kabbalists, especially of the school of Yitsḥaq *Luria, ascribed mystic significance to the beard and would not even trim it, some even keeping a bag around their beard to collect hairs that might fall out. Ḥasidim also attached great importance to the beard.

Shaving and haircuts are forbidden on Sabbaths and festivals, when they are considered work, and when a person is in mourning or during periods of mourning (such as the *Omer period and the three weeks before *Tish'ah be-'Av).

BEDERSI, YEDA'YAH BEN AVRAHAM (c.1270–1340), southern French philosopher, poet, scientist, and possibly physician, also known as Yeda'yah ha-Penini. He may have originated in Béziers (hence Bedersi). He lived in Perpignan and Montpellier. His poetical compositions include the Baqqashat ha-Memim, a one-thousand-word prayer, each word beginning with the letter mem; possibly a similar work, each word beginning with the letter alef; and Ohev Nashim (Berlin, 1884). His most popular work is Sefer Behinat 'Olam (Mantua, 1476; English trans. London, 1806), on the futility of this world and its pursuits and the superiority of the intellectual life.

He also wrote a number of commentaries on Jewish and non-Jewish works including commentaries on various midrashim and Pirquei Avot; Avicenna's Canon of Medicine; and Averroës's commentary on Aristotle's Physics. He wrote a summary of Aristotle's On the Soul; Ketav ha-Da'at, a paraphrase of al-Farabi's Treatise on the Intellect; Ma'amar be-Hafkhei ha-Mahalakh, which deals with Averroës's commentary on Aristotle's De Caelo and in which he attacks another, unnamed scholar, and Ketav ha-Hit'atsemut, a refutation of that scholar's response; and Ma'amar ha-Dan ba-Tsurat ha-Peratiyyot o-Ishiyot, on personal and individual forms. Yeda'yah supported the study of philosophy and wrote a rebuttal, Iggeret ha-Hitnatselet (Venice, 1545), to Shelomoh ben Avraham Adret's prohibition against it. He is possibly the author of Avvat Nafesh, a supercommentary on Avraham ibn Ezra, although the attribution has been disputed.

BEDIQAH (בְּדִיקָה; examination), a halakhic term denoting various kinds of inspection or examination in connection with ritual and legal questions, more particularly with regard to the ritual slaughtering of animals for food. Bediqah is made of the knife before slaughtering to make sure it is absolutely sharp; the windpipe and esophagus of a slaughtered animal to ascertain whether they have been properly cut; and the inner organs, particularly the lungs of a slaughtered animal, to ascertain whether it suffered from any serious disease. Examination of witnesses in court is called bediqat ha-'edim. The search for leaven on the day before Pesah is called bediqat ḥamets*.

BEDIQAT ḤAMETS (בְּדִיקַת חָמֵץ; search for leaven). The biblical injunction "even the first day shall ye put away leaven out of your houses" (Ex. 12.15) was interpreted by the rabbis as referring to the day preceding Pesah, namely, 14 Nisan. To make sure that "there be no leaven found in your houses" (Ex. 12.19), the rabbis instituted a ceremonial search for leavened substances (Pes. 1.1, 7b–8a). Bediqat ḥamets takes place after dark on the eve of 14 Nisan (when the first day of Pesah falls on a Sunday, the search for leaven is conducted on the preceding Thursday evening), when all nooks and crannies are examined by candlelight and the leaven swept out by a feather. As a formal religious ceremony, bediqat ḥamets is preceded by a benediction ("Blessed are you . . . who has commanded us concerning the destruction of leaven"). If leaven is found, it is burned on the next morning (bi'ur ḥamets). Since bediqat ḥamets has become a highly formalized ritual, it is customary with some to hide small pieces of bread (according to the Lurianic kabbalists, ten in number) to make sure that the search will not be in vain. After the search, an Aramaic formula is recited, renouncing ownership of any leaven that may have escaped detection.

BE-'EZ RAT HA-SHEM (בְּעֶזְרַת הַשֵּׁם; "With the help of the Name [of God]"), expression of pious hope used since the Middle Ages; often written in initials (see ABBREVIATIONS) at the head of letters or used in speech in a way similar to the English "God willing." The Aramaic equivalent be-siyya'tta' di-shemayya, "with the help of (God in) heaven," is also sometimes used.

BEGGING. The paucity of references to beggars in biblical times may be attributed to the extensive regulations to provide for the poor (see POVERTY). These included reversion of property to the original owner in the sabbatical year, the cancellation of debts in the jubilee year, and agricultural regulations (such as the laws of gleanings; see LEQET, SHIKHIAH, AND PE'AH). There is no biblical Hebrew word for begging, and possible references are oblique (cf. "I have not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed seeking bread" [Ps. 37.25]).

Beggars are mentioned in the New Testament (e.g., Mk. 10.46; Acts 3.2), and they were a recognized feature of society in Mishnaic and Talmudic times. The rabbis condemn beggars who fake disabilities or even mutilate themselves in order to win sympathy (Pe'ah 8, 9). Rabbi El'azar expresses gratitude to scoundrels who beg under false pretenses as this gives a rationale for not donating to every single mendicant (Ket. 68a).

In the medieval Jewish community, relief for the poor was so well organized that beggars were not a common phenomenon. *Rashi states expressly that in view of the extent of communal support there is no need to give to a beggar who goes from door to door; some communities outlawed beggars. The phenomenon, however, became widespread after periods of great tragedy led to communal impoverishment, during the Crusades, for example, and after the Chmielnicki massacres in eastern Europe from 1648 to 1649. After the latter, the shnorrer or beytler (Yi.; beggar) became a familiar figure. The communities provided facilities for itinerant beggars to sleep and gave them modest sums to reach the next town. They were invited to weddings, where a special table was set aside for them. Beggars would gather at the approach to a cemetery, stretching out their hands and repeating "Charity saves from death" (Prv. 10.2). Rabbinic tradition, though insisting on the duty of charity, discourages begging and considers the honest earning of a living, including menial labor, as a religious obligation.

BEHEADING. See CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

BEHEMOTH, an animal described in Job 40.15–24 and in pseudepigraphous and rabbinic lore. Behemoth, like *Leviathan (cf. Jb. 40.25–32), was a legendary animal. In the messianic age there will be a fight between Behemoth and Leviathan. The righteous will be spectators at the fight and afterwards will feast on the flesh of the animals at the messianic banquet (Pirkei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer 2). In modern biblical scholarship, attempts have been made to identify the two creatures with the hippopotamus (Behemoth) and crocodile (Leviathan). Both of these creatures, however, should be thought of as demythologized supernatural sea-monsters, who were conceived of as having been created by God in primordial times, but who later rebelled against him. Allusions to this rebellion occur in Isaiah 27.1, 51.9–10, Psalms 74.13–14, and especially in Job 3.8, 7.12, 9.13, 26.12–13. There are clear parallels in Ugaritic mythology where such terms as ltn (leviathan), ym (sea), trn (dragon), and btm brh/qltn (elusive/twisting sea serpent) all occur as names and epithets of the divine protagonists.

BEIN HA-METSARIM (בֵּין הַמְּצָרִים; between the straits; cf. Lam. 1.3), a period of three weeks of mourning lasting from 17 Tammuz to 9 Av; it consists of two parts; one of lesser intensity, from 17 Tammuz to 1 Av; and one of greater intensity, from 1 to 9 Av, known as the Nine Days. Bein ha-Metsarim corresponds to the day on which Nebuchadnezzar breached the walls of Jerusalem (on *Shiv'ah 'Asar be-Tammuz) through the day on which the First Temple was destroyed (see TISH'AH BE-'AV). For the entire mourning period, observant Jews do not celebrate festive occasions, and no marriages are performed. On the three Sabbaths during the three weeks, the prophetic readings in the synagogue consist of prophecies of doom (Jer. 1, 2, and Is. 1); in some rites, these are chanted to a special melody, and the three haft-tarot are known as talata' de-pur'anuta' (the Three [Sabbaths] of Suffering). The Sabbath before 9 Av is known as Shabbat Hazon (see SABBATHS, SPECIAL). During the nine-day period, the eating of meat and the drinking of wine is proscribed among Ashkenazim and various other communities, except on the Sabbath. Most non-Ashkenazim generally observe the more intensive period of mourning only during the week of Tish'ah be-'Av, although there are variations among different communities.

BEIT DIN (בֵּית דִּין; house of judgment), a court of law guided by the principles of recognized halakhah* in dealing with matters of civil, criminal, or religious law. The command to appoint judges and establish courts of law is mentioned in Deuteronomy 16.18. During the Temple and Mishnaic periods, there were three types of battei din. The lowest, which was found in almost all towns, consisted of three judges who had authority to adjudicate civil cases. The judges received their authorization from the heads of the academies or from the patriarch. A higher court consisted of twenty-three judges and was empowered to judge criminal cases. This court was sometimes called the small Sanhedrin. Any town of 120 inhabitants had the right to appoint such a court. The highest type of court was the Great Beit Din or the Sanhedrin. It consisted of seventy or seventy-one members, who, during the Temple period, sat in the Chamber of the Hewn Stone in the precinct of the Temple and were the source of final authority for the interpretation of law and the establishment of new legislation. The Sanhedrin also appointed the judges of the lower courts. After the destruction of the Temple, the Sanhedrin sat at Yavneh and was recognized as the central authority for all Jews. Its two leaders were the nasi' (president) and the av beit din (head of the court). Because of the gradual decline in the status and condition of Palestinian Jewry, it steadily lost authority and eventually disappeared. Since membership depended upon an unbroken chain of *ordination, it became impossible to reconstitute such a court when ordination ceased, sometime in the sixth century. Yet Jewish centers continued almost everywhere to have courts, usually presided over by the leading rabbinic scholar of the vicinity. In many places these had almost complete *autonomy. In Spain, Jewish courts, delegated by the king, were even granted criminal jurisdiction. Among the courts of later Jewish history, the most famous perhaps was that of the Council of the Four Lands, which, up to 1764, served as a court of final appeal for Polish Jewry. When Jewish autonomy broke down after *Emancipation, the authority of Jewish courts for the most part became limited to ritual questions. In the State of Israel today, the rabbinical courts enjoy official recognition in all matters of personal status. This is a continuation of the situation under the British Mandate, when Jewish courts were recognized as having the same authority as Muslim religious courts in the areas of marriage and divorce.

In post-Talmudic times the function of a beit din is completely different from the articulated purpose of the Great Beit Din (Sanhedrin) in pre-Talmudic times. The term beit din in post-Talmudic times commonly denotes the system of courts developed to apply the rules of law found in halakhah. Unlike pre-Talmudic times, in which the beit din was the source of nearly all advances in Jewish law, in post-Talmudic times a beit din decides what the law is as it is applied in any particular case; however, the role of decisors has moved from the beit din to the poseq (see POSEQIM), the individual who decides in cases where there is no adversarial proceeding.

So, too, the pronouncements of one beit din do not create binding halakhah for other battei din, unless, as is the case of the official rabbinical courts in Israel, there is an agreed structure for an appeal based on a decree (taqqanah*) of a rabbinical authority. Even within Israel, many battei din do not participate in the official rabbinical court system and are not part of its appellate process. So, too, while in pre-Emancipation Europe there were many communal battei din, there was no hierarchical appellate structure.

Av beit din is the term used to denote the dayyan* (judge) who procedurally conducts the beit din and functions as its leader.

BEIT HA-MIQDASH. See TEMPLE.

BEIT HAYYIM (בית החיים; house of the living), euphemism for *cemetery.

BEIT HILLEL AND BEIT SHAMM'AI, the two most important schools of Pharisaic rabbinic sages. The Houses of *Hillel and *Shamm'ai were named for the great teachers who flourished in the last half of the first century BCE and the early first century CE. After some period in which Beit Shamm'ai prevailed, Beit Hillel emerged as dominant when the sages assembled at Yavneh after the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE.

Virtually no contemporary sources are available regarding the relationship between the schools before the destruction of the Temple. Almost all information comes from later rabbinic traditions, which tended to embellish and expand the traditions they had received. Later rabbinic accounts claim that despite their differences of opinion the houses generally respected each other and were even connected through ties of marriage. Yet the more than three hundred controversies attributed to these schools in Talmudic literature indicate that there must have been a protracted struggle between them, until in the early second century the views of Beit Hillel were finally accepted as authoritative. Its views were for the most part normative in later Mishnaic and Talmudic Judaism, although the views of Shamm'ai were accepted in a few cases.

Various attempts have been made to explain the differences between these schools in a general way. Most common is the claim that Beit Shamm'ai represented the wealthier classes, while Beit Hillel was poorer. Hence, the rulings of Beit Hillel are assumed to have been more favorable to those of less means. It has also been suggested that the differences between the two schools resulted from the personalities of their founders, but this approach is based on a falsely negative picture of Shamm'ai, itself based on some selectively applied Talmudic passages. Others have suggested that these schools were guided by differing hermeneutical approaches for interpreting the Bible, including their conception of legal and religious issues and the role of intention in Jewish law. Finally, some believe the school of Shamm'ai preserves older Sadducean law. No one theory, however, succeeds in explaining the manifold differences of opinion between Beit Hillel and Beit Shamm'ai on all kinds of detailed matters of Jewish law. Rather, the differences are to be attributed to a complex set of factors, some arising from the internal dynamics of Pharisaic rabbinic law and some from the historical context in which the schools functioned.

BEIT KENESET. See SYNAGOGUE.

BEIT MIDRASH (בית מדרש; house of study), a place for the study of religious Jewish texts, primarily the Mishnah, Talmud, codes, and responsa. The term first occurs in Ecclesiasticus 51:50. At the fixed times for communal prayer, those in the beit midrash halt their studies and recite the prayers. In the Talmudic period, the term beit midrash was almost synonymous with that of yeshivah* (academy). The first beit midrash is said to have been founded by *Shema'yah and *Avtalyon. The rabbis ruled that the sanctity of the beit midrash was greater than that of the synagogue, because a synagogue was used only for prayer, whereas the beit midrash served for both prayer and study of the Torah. The Talmudic rabbis preferred to pray in the beit midrash rather than adjourn to the synagogue (Ber. 8a). In medieval times, the beit midrash was usually located in the same building as the synagogue, or close by, and was maintained by the community. In Germany, the beit midrash was termed the Klaus (from the Lat. claustrum [cloister]), and in eastern Europe, kloiz, while in Muslim countries it was called simply midrash. Senior students would spend most of their day either in individual study or under the guidance of a ro'sh yeshivah (head of the academy). The beit midrash was also a place for general popular study, and almost all who went to the synagogue for prayer would also spend some time before or after in the beit midrash. It also served as a communal library of rabbinic literature. Jewish legend refers to the antiquity of the institution by ascribing its beginnings to the beit midrash established after the Flood by Noah's son Shem (father of the Semites) and his son Eber where Jacob is said to have studied for fourteen years after fleeing from Esau. Midrashic terminology (Gn. Rab. 63.10) suggests that boys under thirteen years of age study in the beit sefer (house of the book), while those thirteen and above study in the beit midrash. It was customary in Talmudic times to recite a special prayer upon entering the beit midrash. The Talmud preserves many such prayers, including one by R. Nehunya' ben ha-Qanah, who, upon entering, prayed to be saved from errors of understanding or interpreting the halakhah, and who, upon leaving, would give thanks to heaven for having cast his lot "among those who dwell in the House of Study" (Ber. 28b). Study was pursued both day and night, as well as on the Sabbath and holidays. Students who spent their time in the beit midrash were permitted to eat and sleep there (actions forbidden in the synagogue). The halakhah permits the selling of a synagogue to build a beit midrash, since by doing so one is attaining a higher degree of holiness. According to the aggadah, God, too, has his own beit midrash, and, R. Yehoshu'a ben Levi says, "One who enters the synagogues and batei midrash in this world will be admitted into the synagogues and batei midrash in the world to come" (Dt. Rab. 7.1). Nowadays, beit midrash is used primarily in reference to the central study hall of yeshivot, although certain small synagogues are also referred to as batei midrash.

BEIT 'OLAM (בֵּית עוֹלָם; everlasting house), euphemism for *cemetery.

BEITSAH (בֵּיתָה; Egg), tractate in the Mishnah order Mo'ed, consisting of five chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and both Talmuds. The popular title Beitsah derives from its first word, whereas the original title, Yom Tov (Festival), reflects the general content of the tractate, which deals with prohibited and permitted labor on festivals. Following the biblical rule that preparation of food—prohibited on the Sabbath—is permitted on festivals (Ex. 12.16), the tractate outlines the laws pertaining to preparation of food on festivals. Both the preparation of food and the sacrificial service in the Temple served as grounds for some of the earliest (Hag. 2.2) and most contentious (Hag. 2.11) controversies in Mishnaic halakhah. This is reflected in the first two chapters of Beitsah, which focus on a series of controversies between *Beit Hillel and Beit Shamm'ai.

BEIT SHE'ARIM, Jewish city at the end of the Second Temple period and the first centuries following the destruction of the Temple; located about one-and-a-half miles south of the present Qiryat Tivon near Haifa. It attained special importance in 170, when *Yehudah ha-Nasi' transferred his academy there, thus making it the seat of the *Sanhedrin. Beit She'arim became a famous burial place for Jews both inside and outside Palestine; Yehudah ha-Nasi' and other members of his family were buried there. Since 1936, many catacombs and tombs, as well as the remains of a synagogue, have been unearthed at Beit She'arim. The inscriptions on the doors, lintels, and walls above the tombs are in Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek, and Palmyrene.

BEKHOROT (בְּכוֹרוֹת; Firstborn), tractate in the Mishnah order Qodashim, consisting of nine chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and Talmud Bavli, dealing with laws concerning the *firstborn of men and animals (Ex. 13.2, 13.12ff.; Nm. 18.15ff.), as well as the tithing (see TITHES) of animals (Lv. 27.31–33). The firstborn is consecrated to God, either by offering it as a sacrifice (an unblemished calf, lamb, or kid), by presenting it as a gift to the priest (an unblemished calf, lamb, or kid), or by redeeming it from the priest (human firstborn or donkey). The Mishnah distinguishes between a father's firstborn son, who inherits a double portion, (Dt. 21.17) and a mother's firstborn son; her status determines his consecration to God (Bekh. 8).

BEL AND THE DRAGON. See DANIEL, ADDITIONS TO BOOK OF.

BELIAL, biblical term used to designate wickedness and subversive or wicked individuals. The etymology of the word is unclear. Some say it is derived from a combination of the Hebrew beli (without) plus the root ya'al (profit, be of worth) so that it means "worthlessness." Others suggest that it is derived from the root bala' (swallow), in reference to mythological descriptions of the underworld that "swallows" the living. According to rabbinic tradition, the word is derived from a combination of beli (without) and 'ol (yoke) in reference to those who throw off the yoke of God (San. 111b). In pseudepigraphous literature, the term appears in Greek as either Belial or Beliar and serves as a proper name for Satan, as it does in the New Testament, 2 Corinthians 6.15. In Qumran literature, Belial leads the forces of darkness against the forces of light.

BELLS. The description of the gold pomegranate-shaped bells sewn around the hem of the high priest's robe, so that he would be heard when he entered and left the Holy of Holies, is the sole biblical reference to bells (Ex. 28.33–35). By rabbinic tradition, seventy-two bells were sewn around the high priest's hem. Torah-scroll decorations, such as silver breastplates or rimmonim (pomegranates), which are mounted on the (often pomegranate-shaped) wooden staves on which the Torah scroll is wound, often had little bells as part of their decoration, probably inspired by the high priest's robe.

BELSHAZZAR, the last king of the Babylonian empire according to Daniel 5. He is the subject of the famous "handwriting on the wall" episode, in which, as he was feasting, an inscription appeared on the wall that Daniel interpreted as referring to Belshazzar's impending downfall at the hands of the Persians and Medes. Daniel states that Belshazzar was deserving of this fate because of his effrontery toward God in worshiping idols while drinking from vessels looted from the Temple at the time of its destruction. In Babylonian sources Belshazzar is known as the son of Nabonidus, the last king of the Babylonian empire (556–539). The biblical account, which identifies Belshazzar as the son of Nebuchadnezzar (Dn. 5.2), may represent a process of historical telescoping between the figures of the famous Nebuchadnezzar and the enigmatic Nabonidus, since Belshazzar was the prince regent during the ten years that Nabonidus absented himself from Babylon and went to live in Teima in the Arabian Desert.

BELZ, a town in eastern Galicia, seat of a significant Hasidic dynasty founded by R. Shalom Roqeah (1779–1855). He viewed the Haskalah (Enlightenment) as a severe danger to traditional Judaism and was succeeded by his son Yehoshu'a (1825–1894), who, in an attempt to counteract the pace of Jewish assimilation, formed the Maḥzike ha-Das (Upholders of the Faith) organization. Yehoshu'a was succeeded by Yissakhar Dov (1854–1927), who strongly opposed Zionism. Rabbi Aharon Roqeah (1880–1957), his son, was persecuted by the Nazis and eventually settled in Israel. He was succeeded by R. Yissakhar Dov Roqeah (born 1948), his brother's son, who established the dynasty's headquarters in Jerusalem. Initially opposed to any form of Zionism, Belz Ḥasidim have traditionally supported the Agudat Israel party. Outside of Erets Yisra'el, there are Belz communities in Montréal, New York, London, Antwerp, and Zurich.

BE-MOTSA'EI MENUHAH (בְּמוֹצָאֵי מְנוּחָה; At the Going Out of [the Day of] Rest), an alphabetical acrostic (though lacking the letter samekh) selihah (see SELIHOT) chanted in the Ashkenazi rite on the Saturday night before Ro'sh ha-Shanah. This selihah, possibly composed by a medieval poet named Shemu'el, has eight stanzas with the refrain, "O hear our song and our prayer." It is found in Orthodox and non-Orthodox liturgies. A similarly named piyyut, Be-Motsa'ei Yom Menuḥah, by Ya'aqov of Lunel is recited following havdalah* in many Western and Eastern communities. It contains a prayer that the prophet Elijah will come and bring redemption.

BENAMOZEGH, ELIYAHU (1822–1900), Italian theologian. He was born in Leghorn to a family that had emigrated from Morocco. He served as rabbi of Leghorn and taught in that city's rabbinical school. His major work, Em la-Migra' (1862–1865), was received in the rabbinical world with hostility and was publicly burned by the rabbis of Aleppo and Damascus. Unlike his scholarly contemporaries, such as Heinrich Graetz and Shemu'el David Luzzatto, Benamozegh had a positive attitude toward *Kabbalah; he demanded it receive a special status like the Bible and the Talmud. He regarded Judaism as the crown of humankind and stressed that Judaism must take the lead in maintaining the universalistic belief in monotheism. By identifying foreign elements that had penetrated Jewish tradition, he felt he was following rabbinic precedent. He examined the customs and traditions of ancient peoples, combining studies of linguistics, criticism, archaeology, history, and anthropology with a deep knowledge of the Bible, Midrash, and Kabbalah. The suppression of Em la-Miqra and its sequel, Em la-Masoret, on Talmudic and kabbalistic traditions, by the sages of Jerusalem and other rabbis prevented his works from reaching Jews in Near Eastern and North African lands. The rabbinical decisions aimed at preventing criticism and modernization were backed by the Ottoman authorities. Benamozegh, who was called the Plato of Italian Jewry, produced many other studies in Hebrew, French, and Italian. He was highly regarded by non-Jews, including Giuseppe Mazzini, and his Israël et l'humanité (1914), on the universal aspects of Judaism, achieved a wide readership.

BEN ASHER FAMILY, a family of masoretic scholars.

Mosheh ben Asher (9th cent.), fourth in the line of Tiberian Masoretes descended from Asher the Elder and father of the last, Aharon ben Mosheh ben Asher. The family may have had Karaite sympathies. Mosheh is author of the oldest extant Hebrew Bible codex of the Former and Latter Prophets, copied in Tiberias in 897. Decorated with Islamic-style artwork, the manuscript is in the Karaite synagogue in Cairo. In only one-third of the cases do Mosheh's vocalization and cantillation agree with those of his son whose method is the basis of the modern Masoretic Text. More than half of the readings accord with Mosheh ben David ben Naftali, the other great Tiberian Masorete. Song of the Vine, a poem comparing Israel to a vine producing the prophets, is probably also the work of Mosheh.

Aharon ben Mosheh ben Asher (10th cent.), Palestinian Hebrew grammarian, son of Mosheh; one of the last representatives of the Tiberian school of Masoretes, in which his family had figured prominently. He produced a carefully edited biblical text by finalizing a system of vowel points and *accents that were added to the consonantal base of the Masoretic Text (see BIBLE TEXT). In due course, Ben Asher's system prevailed over other systems of *vocalization and became the basis for most manuscripts and subsequently all Bible editions. The Aleppo Codex, considered a model codex by Maimonides, and the Codex Leningrad B19A are the most faithful representatives of the Ben Asher system.

BENATTAR, YEHUDAH. See ATTAR FAMILY.

BEN 'AZZAI, SHIM'ON. See SHIM'ON BEN 'AZZAI.

BENÇAO, a Sephardi term corresponding to the Ashkenazi benishn* and denoting blessing in general, both words being derived from later forms of the Latin benedicere. Bençao denotes the particular form of prayer known as "benediction" and the Birkat ha-Mazon*. The word has been corrupted into besam.

BENEDICTIONS (Heb. berakhot), a liturgical term denoting prayer, or praise of God, that is formulated in a special style. The term is technically applied only to a prayer that contains in its opening or concluding sentence, or in both, the words Barukh attah Adonai, "Blessed are you, O Lord"; if appearing at the beginning of the prayer, the formula continues with the words Eloheinu melek ha-'olam, "our God, king of the universe." After this unvarying formula comes the specific praise, appropriate to each particular prayer. Of all the various formulas of praise, the benediction was eventually chosen to serve exclusively in any obligatory prayer. It is modeled on a biblical pattern (Ps. 119.12), although it underwent some modification. Benediction formulas are found frequently in the Dead Sea Scrolls, but are used interchangeably with others (not all contain the word you, and they refer to God by various names and epithets). By the third century CE, all the statutory forms of the benediction had been fixed: a benediction had to contain the word you; the Tetragrammaton (pronounced Adonai) had to be used (and no other epithets of God); when used as an opening formula it had to contain mention of God's kingship. Although invariably commencing with a direct address to God, the benediction continues, with very few exceptions, by referring to God in the third person; on the other hand, any section of the obligatory part of the liturgy, which does not open with the benediction formula (such as all the intermediary benedictions of the Amidah*), invariably uses the second person in addressing God. The exclusive use of the benediction style for obligatory prayers was apparently intended to provide a distinguishing mark by which normative standard prayers are differentiated from individual and private ones. Hence the Talmud lays down that "unnecessary" use of the benediction (berakhah le-vatalah), including its use in nonobligatory prayer, is prohibited and regarded as a transgression of Exodus 20.7: "You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain." Since, however, no objection is raised to the use of the divine name in private prayer as such, but only to its use in the benediction formula, it is clear that the intention was to reserve the latter exclusively for statutory prayers. Hence the presence or absence of this formula at the beginning or end of any part of the liturgy can serve to determine if the prayer in question forms part of the obligatory service. At times individuals would use the benediction to conclude their private prayers, but this practice was forbidden by later authorities. The benediction is used both in synagogue and in private or domestic prayers as long as they are obligatory, for example, the *Qiddush.

Three forms of benediction are used: the short form, which opens with the benediction formula; the long form, which often (but not always) opens and concludes with it; and "a benediction following upon a preceding one," in which the benediction formula serves as conclusion. The first type is frequently used for a short benediction, such as that spoken before partaking of any food; the third is used extensively in the longer portions of the obligatory daily prayers, such as the *Amidah, the benedictions of the *Shema', and *Birkat ha-Mazon, all of which consist of a series of benedictions, of which only the first belongs to the long form, while all the subsequent ones no longer open but only conclude with the formula.

Benedictions can be divided according to their contents and liturgical function. Apart from the series of benedictions that constitute the main portions of all obligatory daily prayers, there are many, mostly of the short form, recited for certain occasions. Benedictions of enjoyment are recited before partaking of any food or drink. For each of the more important categories of food or drink, especially bread, cake, wine, fruit, or vegetables, a special benediction is used, for instance, "Blessed are you . . . who brings forth bread from the earth," or ". . . who creates the fruit of the vine"; while for any other type of food or drink (meat, eggs, fish, sweets, etc.), there is one uniform benediction, ". . . by whose word all things came into being." (Several additional special formulas were known in the old Palestinian rite but have fallen into disuse.) Various benedictions to be recited before enjoying the smell of flowers, spices, and so on belong to this category. Apart from Birkat ha-Mazon, two benedictions are to be recited after the enjoyment of food or drink: the longer one (a condensation of Birkat ha-Mazon into one benediction of the long form) to be used after wine, cake, and those kinds of fruit mentioned in Deuteronomy 8:8; and the shorter one to be used after all other types of food or drink.

Benedictions are also recited before performing a *mitsvah; for example, putting on *tefillin, kindling the Sabbath lights, or sounding the *shofar. All benedictions recited over a mitsvah open with "Blessed are you . . . who has sanctified us by his commandments and commanded us . . ."; after this follow two or three words indicating which commandment is about to be performed. These benedictions are to be recited before the mitsvah is observed, with only a few exceptions (e.g., the benediction on the occasion of the ritual washing of one's hands, spoken after the ablution). In selected cases, if a commandment is performed for the first time or for the first time in any particular year, the additional benediction "Blessed . . . who has kept us alive . . . and made us reach this time" is recited.

Various benedictions of praise or thanksgiving are to be recited on seeing lightning, the ocean, a king, or a great scholar or on hearing either good or bad news. With this group might also be counted the "blessings of the morning" (now usually recited in the synagogue before *Shaḥarit proper), including "Blessed . . . who restores souls to dead bodies"; ". . . who opens the eyes of the blind"; ". . . who clothes the naked"; and ". . . who supplies my every want."

Individual benedictions or arrangements of several benedictions are to be recited on special liturgical occasions, such as Qiddush, *Havdalah, *Sheva' Berakhot, and seeing the new moon.

Occasionally the term berakhah is used in the liturgy in a nontechnical sense concerning a blessing or prayer that does not contain the barukh formula, as in the *Birkat ha-Kohanim and the *Birkat ha-Hodesh. According to R. Me'ir, a man should utter at least one hundred benedictions every day. The fact that at various times throughout the day the Jew is obliged to recite a blessing and so turn his thoughts to God is one of the most characteristic features of the discipline of sanctification. Everyday actions, such as getting up and dressing in the morning, eating or drinking, the observance of natural phenomena, or the receiving of glad or sad news, all provide occasion for praising God and thus take on religious significance. Through the benediction a physical action becomes an act of worship. In the case of mitsvot, the preceding benedictions serve the purpose of preparing the mind of the worshiper to perform the mitsvah not as mere routine but joyfully and as a conscious act of observance. Since the occasions for benedictions arise throughout the day—at home as well as at work—they help to overcome the cleavage between the holy and the profane in life and are designed to make one's entire life a continuous service to God. Traditionally the benedictions were attributed to the Men of the *Keneset ha-Gedolah. See also BLESSING AND CURSING.

CE) that, according to tradition, renounced the leading position it had held after the deaths of *Shema'yah and *Avtalyon in favor of *Hillel, whose appointment as president of the Sanhedrin it promoted. Several members of the family are mentioned in the Talmud. Some scholars conjecture that the family was named after the city of Bathyra in northern Transjordan, and others have linked them with the famous warlike family of Zamaris, which settled in Bathyra and became a major ally of Herod; however, these identifications are unlikely.

BENE ISRAEL, Indian Jews originally from the villages of the Konkan region of what is now the state of Maharashtra, who settled in Bombay and other cities in India in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

According to their tradition, the ancestors of the Bene Israel originated in Israel but were shipwrecked off the Konkan coast in the year 175 BCE or earlier. They lost all of their holy books and only remembered the Shema prayer. In the course of time, they adopted a number of Hindu customs. They were discovered by David Rahabi, a Jew from Cochin, possibly in the eighteenth century. The Bene Israel observed the Sabbath and refrained from work on that day; they were circumcised; they ate only kosher food and observed many, but not all, of the Jewish festivals. They had no synagogues, observed Ro'sh ha-Shanah for only one day, and did not know of Hanukkah. The first Bene Israel synagogue, the Gate of Mercy, was established by a Bene Israel officer in the British Indian army, Samuel Divekar, in Bombay in 1796. From then on, the community was assisted in its religious revival and adaptation to normative Judaism by Cochin Jews from the Malabar coast, Christian missionaries who arrived in the Konkan in 1810, and Baghdadi Jews who settled in Bombay (and Calcutta) from this period on.

Gradually, the Bene Israel left the Konkan villages, and their traditional occupation of oil pressing, and began to move to Bombay, Pune, Ahmedabad, Delhi, and Karachi, as well as Aden Protectorate. Numbering six thousand individuals in the 1830s, the community had expanded to over twenty thousand by 1948. After the British withdrew from India in 1947 and the State of Israel was established in 1948, the Bene Israel began immigrating to Israel. Today, an estimated forty thousand people of Bene Israel descent live in Israel; five thousand remain in India.

The Bene Israel were not recognized by Israel's chief rabbinate as full Jews when they first came to live in Israel because of doubts concerning their origin. Between 1962 and 1964 they organized a series of strikes demanding full recognition, and in 1964 the chief rabbinate withdrew its halakhic objections and declared the Bene Israel "full Jews in every respect."

In India, the Bene Israel strictly observed endogamy, marrying only members of their own community. In Israel, the Bene Israel still generally marry within their ethnic community, although some marry Jews of other origins.

BENJAMIN (Heb. Binyamin), the youngest of Jacob's twelve sons by his favorite wife, Rachel, who died in childbirth. His mother had called him Ben-oni (Son of My Suffering), but his father renamed him Benjamin (Son of the Right Hand). His name may hint at the fact that the domain of the tribe of Benjamin was located to the right side, that is, to the south of the territory of the tribe of Joseph, Benjamin's older and only full brother (Gn. 35.18). The Samaritan Pentateuch interprets the name Benjamin as Son of the Days, that is, old age. Benjamin plays a special role in the Joseph stories, testing the brothers' loyalty to each other and their remorse for their jealousy and for selling Joseph into slavery.

The small tribal territory of Benjamin lay between the border cities of Bethel to the north and Jerusalem to the south. It was the first area conquered by Joshua after crossing the Jordan, and it included the famous sites of Jericho, Gilgal, Ai, and Gibeon (Jos. 4–10). During the early period of the Judges, the Benjaminite judge, Ehud ben Gera, freed the Israelites from the domination of Eglon, king of Moab (Jgs. 3.12–30). The Benjaminites were skilled in the use of weapons and developed an ambidextrous fighting technique (Jgs. 3.4, 20.16). Because of their barbaric behavior toward an itinerant Levite and his concubine, the Benjaminites were attacked by a coalition of the rest of the tribes during the priesthood of Phineas ben Eleazar. The war centered on the main city of Gibeon, which was treated as an ir ha-niddahat* (condemned city; Dt. 13.13–19). The conflict ended in the near-annihilation of the tribe. Its survival was made possible because the remaining six hundred men were allowed to marry women taken from Shiloh and Jabesh-gilead (Jgs. 19–21).

Under the Benjaminite King *Saul, Gibeon (by this time, known as Gibeath Saul) became the first capital of the Israelite monarchy. The central cultic site of Saul's reign was the great bamah (high place) located at Gibeon (el-Jib), where the descendants of Eleazar ben Aaron served; the other priestly line of Ithamar ben Aaron, which had previously served at Shiloh, now resided in Nob. Realizing the importance of the territory of Benjamin in protecting the northern flank of his new capital of Jerusalem, David assiduously severed all of its northern ties and suppressed any resurgent Saulite allegiances. The success of this policy is seen in the incorporation of Benjamin into the Judean kingdom after Solomon's death (c.930 BCE).

After the destruction of the First Temple and the demise of the kingdom of Judah in 586 BCE, the territory of Benjamin took on new importance when the Babylonians appointed Gedaliah as governor and established his capital at Mizpah. In the Second Temple period, tribal affiliations gave way to national identity, as can be seen when the Benjaminite Mordecai is referred to as "the Jew" (Est. 2.5). Nevertheless, later Jews, such as Paul (Rom. 11.1; Phil. 3.5), preserved an awareness of their Benjaminite ancestry.

BEN NAFTALI, MOSHEH BEN DAVID (10th cent.), Hebrew grammarian and masoretic scholar (see MASORAH), one of the last representatives of the Tiberian school of Masoretes. No information is known about his life. The Ben Naftali system differed slightly from the Ben Asher (see BEN ASHER FAMILY) system. The differences between the two systems have been recorded in Misha'el ben 'Uzzi'el's Kitab al-Khulaf. It is not clear which manuscripts best represent the Ben Naftali text.

BEN SHIM'ON, RAFA'EL (1848–1928), rabbinical authority in Egypt; chief rabbi of Cairo from 1891. He faced the problems of modernity with understanding and leniency, and while affirming the role of the rabbis in maintaining tradition, he taught that they must also face a world of change. The role of the rabbis in Egypt at this time was of particular significance, apart from them there was little Jewish scholarship. Ben Shim'on was particularly active in finding legal ways to circumvent the problem of deserted wives ('agunot), which was particularly pressing in view of the number of young brides left behind by their husbands who had migrated from Egypt. His works include Nehar Mitsrayim (1908), on the practices of the Jews of Egypt. He lived his last years in Palestine.

BEN SORER U-MOREH (בֶּן סוֹרֵר וּמוֹרֵה; rebellious son), according to the Bible, "a defiant and rebellious son" who "refuses to listen to his parents' voice," and "a glutton and a drunkard." He is to be brought before the elders of the city and stoned to death (Dt. 21.18–21). The Talmud hedges this biblical provision with a number of reservations and declares that "there never has been, nor will there ever be, an execution of a rebellious son." According to this view, the law was originally propounded for educational and deterrent purposes only (San. 71a). These reservations include limiting the period in which the law of the rebellious son could be applied, to the three months following his thirteenth birthday; fixing huge minimal quantities of food and drink, which had to be consumed before the sentence could be passed; and requiring that the voices of both parents possess identical physical properties (San. 69a–70b). According to R. Yonatan, however, the law of the rebellious son was put into practice and he states that he had sat on the grave of such a son (San. 71a). The rabbinic justification of the execution of the rebellious son is the principle that "he is judged in accordance with his likely end," that is, his bad habits will eventually lead to serious criminal acts, and it is preferable that he die innocent rather than guilty (San. 82a). In light of other ancient Near Eastern codes, it is arguable that the biblical law was designed to limit the power of the pater familias by extending the crime to breaches of the authority of the mother, as well as that of the father.

BENTSHN (Yi.; בִּנְשׁוֹן), term derived from Latin benedicere (to bless) by way of the Old French; applied more particularly to the blessing of children by their parents, *Birkat ha-Mazon, the recitation of the Birkat ha-Gomel, and lighting the Sabbath candles. It corresponds to the Sephardi term bençao.

BENTSUR, YA'AQOV. See IBN ZUR, YA'AQOV.

BENVENISTE FAMILY, family of Sephardi scholars, especially in the Ottoman empire.

Ḥayyim ben Yisra'el Benveniste (1603–1673), lived and officiated in his native Constantinople, in Tiryā, and in Smyrna, where in 1662 he became chief rabbi. This was a period of the arrival in Smyrna of groups from various places, and Benveniste, with a highly regarded knowledge of the halakhic literature of his predecessors and contemporaries, mediated their disputes and helped to unify the community leadership. He was respectful of the varied minhagim of the communities scattered throughout the Ottoman empire, though he was very strict in his rulings concerning ritual slaughter and dietary laws. An outstanding codifier, he wrote an eight-volume work based on Karo's Shulḥan 'Arukh in which he collects the views of later authorities and adds some earlier ones whom Karo had omitted (Leghorn, 1658; Constantinople, 1716). Many of his responsa are to be found in Ba'ei Ḥayyei (Salonika, 1788–1791). He also wrote Sefer Pesah Me'ubbin (Venice, 1692) on the laws of Pesah and novellae to tractate Sanhedrin.

Yehoshu'a Refa'el Benveniste (1595–1666), rabbinical authority and poet in Turkey; brother of R. Ḥayyim Benveniste. He served in Constantinople and Bursa but was sought out for his rulings by people from all parts of the Ottoman empire, even by the Karaites. He commented on the Talmud Yerushalmi but ruled that when the two Talmuds differed, the Talmud Bavli should be given precedence. His commentary, Sedeh Yehoshu'a has been frequently republished, most recently in Jerusalem in 1972. Almost unique for the rabbis in his region of the time, he had a broad secular education—in medicine and linguistics. He was also a poet, writing religious poems, poems of friendship, and didactic verse.

His responsa were published in Jerusalem in 1982 under the title Sha'ar Yehoshu'a.

BERAB, YA'AQOV (c.1474–1546), Talmudist. Born in Spain, Berab became rabbi of Fez in Morocco at the age of eighteen. From there he moved to Egypt, where he headed a major rabbinic academy that counted Yosef Karo among its students, and finally settled in Safed. He was considered one of the foremost rabbinic authorities of his age, and in 1538 he initiated the abortive attempt to renew rabbinic ordination (semikhah, which had lapsed in the amoraic period) as a first step toward reestablishing the *Sanhedrin, reuniting the Jewish people under one spiritual authority, and hastening the advent of redemption. He himself was the first samukh (ordained rabbi) named by the rabbis of Safed and in turn gave semikhah to a number of others, including Yosef Karo. The scheme was opposed by R. Levi ibn Haviv of Jerusalem and by others and after an acrimonious controversy ultimately failed. Shortly after this abortive initiative, Berab had to flee from Safed, probably because of problems with the Turkish authorities.

BERAH DODI (בְּרַח דּוֹדִי; "Make haste my beloved"), the opening words of three liturgical compositions recited in the Ashkenazi rite before the Shaḥarit 'Amidah on the first and second days and the intermediate Sabbath of Pesah. The words come from the Song of Songs (8.14), which is read in the synagogue on Pesah. All three compositions, by tenth-century authors, are based on the traditional interpretation of the Song of Songs as an allegory of the love between God and Israel.

BERAKHAH AHARONAH (בְּרַכָּה אַהֲרֹנָה; Last Blessing [in contradistinction to the "first blessing" said before partaking of any food]), the shorter form of *Birkat ha-Mazon said after partaking of food other than bread prepared from the five primary grains, wine, and food specified in Deuteronomy 8.8 as characteristic of Israel. The Berakhah Aharonah briefly summarizes the ordinary Birkat ha-Mazon. After partaking of food that requires neither the full grace nor the Berakhah Aharonah, an even shorter blessing is recited (Bore' Nefashot).

BERAKHAH LE-VATTALAH (בְּרַכָּה לְבַטְלָה), a blessing made in vain. According to a simple understanding of the words of the Talmud (Ber. 33a), such a blessing violates the biblical prohibition found in Exodus 20.7. This is the ruling of Maimonides and many other authorities. However, most decisors of Jewish law accept that one who recites an unneeded blessing violates only a rabbinic commandment and not a biblical commandment. The biblical prohibition limits the use of the divine name outside of prayer or ritual. These rules are codified in the Shulḥan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Ḥayyim 215(4).

BERAKHAH ME'EIN SHALOSH (בְּרַכָּה מֵעֵין שְׁלוֹשׁ; the Blessing Summarizing the Three [First Blessings of the Birkat ha-Mazon]), an abbreviated form of the *Birkat ha-Mazon. The giving of thanks after a meal is enjoined in Deuteronomy 8.10. When the repast includes bread, the full four blessings of the Birkat ha-Mazon are to be recited. Three of these blessings are considered biblical in origin; the last is rabbinical. An abbreviated version, to be recited over food prepared from the five species of grain (wheat, barley, rye, oats, spelt) or the fruits of Erets Yisra'el (grapes, figs, olives, dates, pomegranates), is designated Berakhah Me'ein Shalosh. Several other abbreviated forms of the Birkat ha-Mazon were composed for the benefit of children, as well as for adults under time constraints. One that is still widely used was published by R. Naftali ben David Zekharyah Mendel in 1603. In modern times, shortened versions of the Birkat ha-Mazon have been prepared by the editors of Conservative, Reconstructionist, and Reform prayer books.

BERAKHOT (בְּרַכּוֹת; Benedictions), tractate in the Mishnah order Zera'im, consisting of nine chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and both Talmuds. Berakhot outlines the daily liturgical requirements of rabbinic Judaism, in which a central role is played by prayers with a fixed formal structure known as *benedictions. These prayers address praise, thanksgiving, or supplication to God, opening and sometimes concluding with the formula: "Blessed are you, O Lord." Talmudic law strictly regulates when benedictions are to be pronounced and what form of benediction is appropriate for each occasion. The benedictions of tractate Berakhot encompass normal daily activities, from awakening to retiring, with particular emphasis on benedictions before and after eating.

The tractate opens with a discussion of the laws regarding the twice-daily recitation of the *Shema', in which a Jew reaffirms his belief in one God and his commitment to the divine word and commandments, and continues with the laws governing the daily prayer service. Following a discussion of the benedictions over food and other laws associated with meals, the tractate concludes with benedictions to be recited over special experiences and occasions.

Tractate Berakhot is the first tractate in standard arrangements of the Mishnah. Its portrayal of the central role played by Judaism's theological tenets in a Jew's daily life serves as an appropriate opening to the Mishnah corpus. The tractate, while focusing on halakhic practice subsequent to the destruction of the Temple, opens and closes with allusions to the Temple, reflecting the centrality of the Temple service within Jewish consciousness even after its destruction.

The tractate was translated into English by Maurice Simon in the Soncino Talmud (1948).

BERDUGO, RAFA'EL (1747–1822), rabbinical authority in Meknes, Morocco. He belonged to a distinguished rabbinical family that had played a leading role in Meknes for many generations. During his lifetime, however, Meknes lost much of its importance as a major Jewish center. Berdugo, influenced by the decline of the secular community leaders, determined that the beit din should be the central communal authority. His responsa and novellae, notably Mishpatim Yesharim (2 vols. [Kraków, 1891]), reflect his struggles with the community leadership and emphasize the independent and moral role of the dayyanim. Berdugo's writings on the Bible and Midrash displayed great expertise, and he used them to strengthen his social teachings. He opposed hereditary communal positions and insisted on their being determined by public choice. He was a popular figure and did not let his great learning distance him from the masses. His signaled the emergence of a new type of leadership in North African Jewry.

BEREIRAH (בִּרְיָה; choosing, selection), a legal term designating a situation the facts of which or the legal implications of which become definitely known only at some future time. The question is whether there can be retroactive recognition of such. The Talmud distinguishes between the kinds of bereirah in which the present condition of doubt is due to the person, although the situation itself has certainty, and the kind in which the situation itself is doubtful. The first category of bereirah, personal doubt, is again divided into two categories: one in which the definite outcome depends upon the individual himself, and one in which it depends upon the will or action of others. Classic rabbinic law allows for the use of this type of analysis when the prohibition or obligation is only rabbinic in nature (yesh bereirah mi-de-rabbanan) and prohibits the use of this analytical tool when a biblical obligation is at stake (ein bereirah min ha-Torah).

BERGMAN, SAMUEL HUGO (1883–1975), Israeli philosopher and educator. A native of Prague, he was influenced by the teachings of *Aḥad ha-'Am and Martin *Buber and regarded the cultural renaissance sponsored by Zionism not only as leading to the formation of a secular Jewish culture but also as fostering the renewal of Jewish religiosity and religious observance. His theological position was inspired by Buber and Franz *Rosenzweig. He felt that the Jewish return to Erets Yisra'el and to physical labor would lead to the restoration of "cosmic unity." In 1920 he settled in Jerusalem, where he became the first director of the Jewish National and University Library. BERKOVITS, ELIEZER (1908–1992), Orthodox rabbi and theologian. Born in Transylvania, Berkovits served as a rabbi in Berlin, Leeds (England), and Sydney (Australia) before moving to the United States. Between 1950 and 1958 he served as a rabbi in Boston and then taught at the Hebrew Theological College in Chicago. He lived his last years in Jerusalem. His earlier books were devoted to theological aspects of Judaism, but his later works were devoted to the theology of the Holocaust, notably his Faith after the Holocaust (1973). There he writes that Auschwitz is unique in the magnitude of its horror but not in the problem it presents to faith. Jewish thinkers have consistently affirmed that human beings have free will and that they can use this freedom to perpetrate violence and oppression. It is the "hiding of the face of God" (hester panim*) that makes human freedom of will possible and preserves human autonomy and dignity before the overwhelming power of God. The very survival of the Jewish people after the suffering of Auschwitz, however, is evidence of God's elusive presence in history; the establishment of the State of Israel saved the Jews from extinction through hopelessness.

Berkovits strongly opposed the Jewish-Christian dialogue movement. He held that the age of Christian militancy was over and that the world was post-Christian. The new interest of Christians in freedom of religion was because of their interest in freedom for Christians. He writes of the moral bankruptcy of Christian civilization and of the spiritual bankruptcy of Christianity, citing the extermination of six million Jews—one and a half million of them children—in the very heart of Christian Europe. He called the New Testament the most dangerous antisemitic tract in history, which has poisoned the hearts of millions (see HOLOCAUST THEOLOGY). Eliezer Berkovitz also wrote Towards Historic Judaism (1943), Major Themes in Modern Philosophies of Judaism (1975), Not in Heaven: The Nature and Function of Halakha (1983), and Jewish Women in Time and Torah (1990).

BERLIN, NAFTALI TSEVI YEHUDAH (1816–1893), head of the Volozhin Yeshivah from 1854–1892; known by the acronym ha-Netsiv. The early years of his life were spent in almost hermitic study, during which he acquired an extraordinary mastery of rabbinic literature. In Volozhin, he went through the Talmud Bavli from beginning to end with his students. His written work displays a keen interest in relatively neglected rabbinic texts, showing their importance to an understanding of rabbinic tradition. He was also active in the early Zionist movement, Hibbat Tsiyyon. His work includes commentaries on Sifrei (Emeq ha-Netsiv, 3 vols. [Jerusalem, 1959–1961]) and the Torah (Ha'ameq Davar [Vilna, 1879–1880]); two commentaries on the Song of Songs (Warsaw, 1886); a commentary on the She'iltot (Vilna, 1861–1867), the first post-Talmudic rabbinic work; commentaries on various tractates of the Talmud Bavli and Talmud Yerushalmi; responsa (a selection published in 2 vols. [Warsaw, 1892]); a commentary on the Mekhilta; notes on the Sifra; and various ephemera, including correspondence pertaining to the early Zionist movement and an essay explaining the causes of modern antisemitism, stimulated by the outbreak of pogroms in Russia in 1881.

BERLIN, SHA'UL BEN TSEVI HIRSCH (1740–1794), German rabbi and Haskalah sympathizer. Son of the chief rabbi of Berlin, Hirschel Levin, he was ordained rabbi at the age of twenty by several distinguished authorities. In 1768 he became av beit din in Frankfurt an der Oder, but by 1782, disillusioned with the rabbinate, he had settled in Berlin. There he defended the maskil Naftali Herz Wessely in the face of widespread rabbinic opposition and covertly criticized the rabbinic culture of his day. Berlin's reputation rests on several provocative compositions. His anonymous pamphlet criticizing Hayyim Yosef David Azulai's Birkei Yosef prompted Azulai's response in Mahazik Berakhah. Berlin's pseudonymous Ketav Yosher (published posthumously, Berlin, 1794) satirized the rabbinic approach to pedagogy and blamed its obscurantist curriculum for inculcating superstitious beliefs and practices. The anonymous Mitspeh Yequti'eli (1789) attacked Torat Yequti'el, novellae on Yoreh De'ah composed by R. Refa'el ha-Kohen, rabbi of Altona, Hamburg, and Wandsbek (a relative and a political rival), and charged its author with tolerating corruption. Berlin's father defended his son in the ensuing controversy. Berlin published the pseudonymous Besamim Ro'sh (Berlin, 1793), a collection of 392 previously unknown responsa attributed to R. Asher ben Yehi'el (and medieval contemporaries), to which he added his own gloss, Kassa de-Harsena. This text, written in a highly elusive style, has had two lives. Viewed by some (even in Berlin's lifetime) as a critique and caricature of halakhic literature, sections of the yeshivah world continue to regard Besamim Ro'sh as an authoritative work. Shortly before his death Berlin went to London to become the rabbi of the Ashkenazi community but died before he could assume the appointment.

BERLIN, YESHA'YAHU BEN YEHUDAH LOEB (1725–1799), scholar and rabbi, also known as Isaiah Pick. Berlin was elected to a rabbinical post only late in his life, in 1783 in Breslau. He is best known as a prolific composer of glosses to classical rabbinic works. He annotated and glossed Aha' Ga'on's She'iltot, Natan ben Yehi'el of Rome's Arukh, Targum Onkelos, Alfasi, Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, and others. His best-known contribution is his composition of Masoret ha-Shas, now printed in every edition of the Talmud, in which he cites parallel passages and emends and compares texts. He was also renowned for his amicable dealings with figures from a variety of religious and political positions.

BERLINER, ABRAHAM (1833–1915), literary historian and bibliographer. Born in Poznań, Berliner served as a local teacher until joining the staff of the Berlin Rabbinical Seminary in 1873 as teacher and librarian. He searched the libraries of Europe for Jewish manuscripts and books and furthered the publication of old Jewish literature by reviving, in 1885, the Mekize Nirdamim society, which published medieval works in all branches of study. Berliner published the first critical edition of Rashi's commentary on the Torah (1866) as well as a modern edition of Targum Onkelos (1884). He wrote extensively on Italian Jewry as well as bibliographical works. After briefly publishing the Magazin für jüdische Geschichte und Literature (1874–1875), Berliner joined David Tsevi *Hoffmann in coediting its successor journal, the Magazin für die Wissenschaft des Judentums, with the Hebrew supplement Otsar Tov (1875–1893).

BERLIN RABBINICAL SEMINARY, seminary for the training of Orthodox rabbis, founded in Berlin in 1873 by Ezriel *Hildesheimer (it was often referred to as Hildesheimer's Seminary; its formal name was Rabbiner Seminar für das orthodoxe Judentum) in the spirit of *Neo-Orthodoxy, combining Torah 'im derekh erets (religious studies with secular knowledge). The seminary faced opposition both from the ultra-Orthodox and from the Reform (students had to promise not to officiate in synagogues that used organs). The seminary was headed successively by Hildesheimer, David Tsevi *Hoffmann, Joseph Wohlgemuth, and Yehi'el *Weinberg and had a faculty of distinguished scholars. Its graduates served modern Orthodox congregations in Europe and the United States. After the Nazis came to power, an attempt to transfer the seminary to Palestine was vetoed by the ultra-Orthodox in Palestine; the seminary was closed in 1938.

BERNAYS, ISAAC (1792–1849), chief rabbi of Hamburg from 1821 and precursor of *Neo-Orthodoxy. Born in Mainz, he studied at Abraham Bing's yeshivah in Würzburg, also attending the university there. Bernays's combination of traditionalism with youthfulness and his academic background induced the Hamburg community to elect him their chief rabbi after the controversy between 1818 and 1820 over the establishment of a Reform temple. Bernays adopted the Sephardi title of hakham (sage) to distinguish his authority from that of Reform leaders. The first Orthodox rabbi to deliver weekly sermons in German, he also donned clerical attire, made synagogue worship and life-cycle events more decorous, and modernized the Hamburg talmud Torah, educating pupils about good citizenship as well as religious observance. After a period of relative tranquillity, the Temple Association's building of a new edifice and issue of a revised prayer book (1841) provoked Bernays, whose hostile declaration was supported by Ya'aqov *Ettlinger of Altona, an even more zealous opponent of Reform. Bernays's ideas (e.g., Israel's "universal mission") greatly influenced Samson Raphael *Hirsch.

BERTINORO, 'OVADYAH (c.1450–1509), *Mishnah commentator, also known as 'Ovadyah Yare of Bertinoro. Born in the Italian town of Bertinoro, 'Ovadyah was educated in northern Italy and was a student of Yosef *Colon. In 1486 he traveled to Erets Yisra'el, a journey that took him some sixteen months and that led him through many Eastern communities. The series of letters he wrote describing his journey is an invaluable source for reconstructing late fifteenth-century Jewish life in the Mediterranean basin. Bertinoro settled in Jerusalem, where he revitalized the Jewish community and was recognized as the leading halakhic authority of Erets Yisra'el and Egypt.

He is best known for his lucid commentary on the entire Mishnah, in which he provides the upshot of the Talmudic discussion in light of the medieval authorities, especially *Rashi and *Maimonides. His work made it possible to study the Mishnah independently of the Talmud, while also indicating the normative halakhah. It quickly became the standard Mishnah commentary and from its first appearance (Venice, 1558–1559) was printed in almost all subsequent editions of the Mishnah. A Latin translation was made for the benefit of Christian Hebraists. Bertinoro also wrote piyyutim, responsa, and commentaries on the Sefer Mitsvot Gadol of *Mosheh ben Ya'aqov of Coucy and the Mishneh Torah of Maimonides. Bertinoro is reputed to have written a supercommentary on Rashi's Torah commentary that has not survived. The ascription to Bertinoro of the work 'Omer Naqa' is erroneous.

BERURYAH (2d cent. CE), wife of R. *Me'ir and daughter of R. *Hanina' ben Teradyon, renowned for both her scholarship and her piety. The Talmud tells stories of her exemplary wisdom and kindness and quotes many of her halakhic and aggadic sayings. Her father was burned to death for teaching Torah, her mother executed, her sister forced into a brothel ('A. Z. 17b–18a), and her brother killed by bandits (minor tractate Semaḥot 12). Beruryah bore all these tragedies with fortitude and without complaint. When both her sons died suddenly on a Sabbath, she concealed the fact from her husband until the end of the Sabbath so as not to cause him to grieve on the holy day. When R. Me'ir burst into tears, she reminded him of Job 1.21, "The Lord has given, and the Lord has taken away." She is the only woman recorded in Talmudic literature as having participated in halakhic discussions with the rabbis, and on two occasions her legal opinion was accepted as authoritative. Beruryah figures as the heroine in many literary works.

BETA ISRAEL (House of Israel), the term by which Ethiopian Jews refer to themselves. Between 1977 and 1993, almost forty-five thousand Ethiopian Jews were brought to Israel. There is no Beta Israel community in Ethiopia today.

The Beta Israel were frequently depicted as an ancient Jewish group, descendants of the tribe of Dan. According to this view, their religious system was a form of pre-Talmudic Judaism that dated back to the First Temple period. According to the most recent studies, however, they are an ethnic group that emerged in Ethiopia during the past five hundred years. Their religion is best understood as a form of non-Talmudic Judaism that has no direct connection to any ancient Jewish group. Rather, its numerous Jewish elements are derived either from biblical commandments or from the strongly Bible-centered practices of the Ethiopian Orthodox church, such as the circumcision of male children on the eighth day after birth, the use of Geez (ancient Ethiopic) as a sacred language, and their religious hierarchy.

Prior to the late nineteenth century, the Beta Israel were not familiar with other Jewish communities or forms of Judaism. They did not know the Talmud or rabbinic literature, had no working knowledge of Hebrew, did not have synagogues, rabbis, bar or bat mitsvah, tefillin, or mezuzot, nor did they celebrate Hanukkah, Simhat Torah, or Purim.

Prior to the twentieth century, the Beta Israel were led by celibate monks. More recently a priest, known as a qes* or kahen, headed the religious leadership, performing services, including animal sacrifices, and guiding community members. The dabtara (a cantor and scribe) was responsible for the liturgy and the preparation of manuscripts.

The most important work in the Beta Israel canon was the Orit (Torah or Bible), in Geez. They also had approximately twenty apocryphal works not found among other Jewish groups. The most important of these were Te'ezaza Sanbat, Mota Muse, Gadla Abraham, and Arde'et. Beta Israel prayers, usually in Geez, but also in Agawinnya, a Cushitic language, were also preserved both orally and in manuscript form.

The Beta Israel ritual cycle consisted of weekly, monthly, and annual festivals. The most important holiday was the Sabbath (Sanbat), which was strictly observed. Every seventh Sabbath (Yesanbat Sanbat) was commemorated with special prayers. Mondays and Thursdays were fast days. Monthly holidays included the celebration of the new moon, fasts on the tenth and twenty-ninth day of every month, and the festival of St. Mikael (Michael) on the twelfth. Annual holidays based on the Bible included Berhana Saraga (The Light Has Appeared), which was celebrated on the first day of the seventh month; Astasreyo, a fast day, on the tenth day of the same month; and Fasika (Passover) from the fifteenth to the twenty-second of the first month. Ma'rar (Harvest) was commemorated twice: once as dictated in the Bible seven weeks after Passover and again on the twelfth day of the ninth month (seven weeks after Ba'ala Masallat [Festival of Booths]), to coincide with the Ethiopian harvest. Seged, a distinctive Beta Israel pilgrimage holiday, was commemorated seven weeks after Astasreyo.

The Beta Israel cosmology focussed upon Egzi'abher, god creator of the world. There was also widespread belief in other spiritual beings, including angels and zar spirits, which possess their victims.

The Beta Israel religion has developed and evolved over the past five hundred years. During the twentieth century, it has been strongly influenced by external Jewish practices, and many distinctive traditions, such as sacrifice, monasticism, and the commemoration of the new moon, have been abandoned. Such normative Jewish customs as the use of Hebrew, a cycle of weekly Torah readings, and Purim and Hanukkah celebrations have been added. In the past, Beta Israel were known as Falashas. This name has pejorative connotations and is no longer used.

BETHEL, a Northwest Semitic god first attested in the treaty between Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, and his vassal, King Ba'al of Tyre (675 BCE). "If you violate this treaty," King Ba'al is warned, "may Bethel and Anath-bethel hand you over to a people-eating lion." In the Aramaic papyri from Yeb dating to the fifth century BCE, it occurs as the first element in names of deities as well as in the personal name Bethel-sarezer in Zechariah 7.2. Bethel appears as a divine name in Jeremiah 48.13 and may also occur in Hosea 12.5.

BETHEL (Heb. Beit El), city frequently cited in Hebrew Scriptures (mentioned sixty-four times), generally identified with Tell Beitin, approximately nineteen kilometers north of Jerusalem. The original name of the city was Luz, which *Jacob renamed Bethel (House of God), in commemoration of his vision of angels ascending and descending a ladder between heaven and earth (Gn. 28). According to another tradition (Gn. 35.1–15), Jacob named the town Bethel upon his return from Haran. With the division of the kingdom, King Jeroboam I of Israel made Bethel a major cultic site, for which he set up a golden calf (1 Kgs. 12.29–33). It was at the shrine of Bethel that *Amos preached and came into conflict with Amaziah the priest (Am. 7.10–17). Amos's declaration, "Bethel shall be turned into nought" (Am. 5.5), inspired Hosea to refer to Bethel by the dysphemism Beth-aven (House of Nought; Hos. 4.15, 10.5). As part of his extensive religious reform inspired by the book of Deuteronomy, King Josiah (622 BCE) dismantled the altar of Bethel and contaminated it so that Bethel could no longer rival the one legitimate holy city of Jerusalem (2 Kgs. 23.15).

BETH JACOB SCHOOLS (House of Jacob), school system for ultra-Orthodox girls founded by Sarah *Schenirer in Kraków in 1917. Until that time, such girls had not received formal educations. The network of schools was expanded under the auspices of *Agudat Israel, and teachers' seminaries were also opened. There were some two hundred schools in the Beth Jacob movement in eastern Europe before World War II. These were closed under the Nazis, but after the war, affiliated schools opened in western countries, particularly in Israel, where there are over one hundred Beth Jacob schools.

BETHLEHEM (Heb. Beit Leḥem), a town located nine kilometers south of Jerusalem. Its importance in Jewish tradition stems from it being the place of origin of King *David and the place where David was anointed (1 Sm. 16.1-13). Consequently, it came to be regarded as the birthplace of the future descendant of David who would rule all of Israel (Mi. 5.1). Micah's prophecy is the source of the messianic hope associated with the city. Just north of the city is the traditional site of *Rachel's tomb. For the last two thousand years, this site has been the destination of pilgrims, especially Jewish women, who have found strength in the story of Rachel's life and her role as an intercessor (Jer. 31.15-16).

BETROTHAL (Heb. shiddukhin), an agreement to marry at some future date. Shiddukhin (also erusin or qiddushin) is a legal term, in contrast to the current, popular terms of betrothal or engagement. In Talmudic times, marriage without preliminary betrothal was frowned upon in Jewish practice; the prescribed punishment was flogging (Qid. 12b). Betrothal is accompanied by a festive celebration but does not create any conjugal relationship; both parties are free to retract their promise of marriage without having compromised their marital eligibility. Because of the time lag between the betrothal and the wedding (hatunnah), the Talmud (Qid. 50b) discusses the question of whether gifts received by the bride (kallah) from the groom (hatan) are an indication that formal qiddushin has taken place; if so, the woman would require a divorce if the wedding were canceled. Jewish law left the matter to local custom, and ultimately, when qiddushin and nissu'in were combined into a single ceremony, the giving of gifts was no longer considered a potential problem. The aggrieved party in a cancellation of betrothal can claim reimbursement for loss suffered and demand compensation for humiliation. Suit for breach of promise is justified if the other side retracted any of the agreed terms or if, in the meantime, some grave disqualification developed or came to light. The bridegroom, however, is urged on ethical grounds not to break off the betrothal because of monetary disappointment. A document called tena'im is drawn up with the terms of shiddukhin and includes the time, place, and size of the wedding, as well as any other obligations such as the dowry or other financial matters. It also specifies the penalties payable by a defaulting party. The nonfulfillment of the tena'im does not release the aggrieved party after the marriage has occurred from his (or her) duties toward the spouse; the remedy is to sue for ordinary breach of contract. Today, formal shiddukhin with tena'im is not generally observed outside of Orthodox Judaism.

Betrothal, as part of the marriage ceremony, requires an act of qinyan (*acquisition) of the bride by the groom. In accepting something of value from the groom and giving her consent, the new relationship is effected. While anything of value might be used, a ring has become the most common object. While the transaction requires the bride's consent, in the traditional ceremony she is the passive recipient. In Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist ceremonies, there is a mutual qinyan. The bride and groom each give and receive rings and recite the marriage formula: "With this ring be thou consecrated to me as my wife [husband] according to the law of Moses and the faith of Israel." Once qiddushin has taken place, the couple requires a get (Jewish *divorce) to dissolve the relationship.

BIBAGO, AVRAHAM (c.1425-1489), Spanish philosopher, homilist, and physician; also known as Bilbaz, Bibas, or Vivas. Born in Saragossa, he was conversant with Islamic and Christian philosophy in their original languages, as well as Jewish sources. He used his knowledge of Christianity to defend Judaism in religious disputations held at the court of John II of Aragon as well as in his writings. His significant works include Derekh Emunah (Constantinople, 1521; facsimile ed. Jerusalem, 1970), completed near the end of his life and the best known of his writings, intended, in part, to demonstrate the superiority of Judaism in the achievement of human happiness; Zeh Yenahmenu (Salonika, 1522), a sermon on the creation of the world; and a treatise advancing the argument for the creation of the world against the opinion of Aristotle and others who held that the world has existed through eternity. Bibago's minor works include Ma'amar 'al Ribbui ha-Tsurot, on the plurality of forms; and commentaries on Averroës's Middle Commentaries (completed in Huesca in 1446) and Metaphysics. The introduction to the latter was edited by M. Steinschneider in 1883. Other minor treatises and correspondences also survive.

BIBLE, Judaism's corpus of sacred writings, a collection of literary works produced by the Israelite people in ancient times and passed down to the present. From the outset, it was believed that these works were written by divine inspiration, the result of direct revelation and of prophecy in its various forms. The Jewish religion is based upon them, virtually all of Jewish law and thought are derived from them, and it is mostly from them that the origins and early history of Jewish civilization and of the Hebrew language are known. Judaism's view of itself as a religion based upon a permanently fixed body of sacred literature has earned for the Jewish people the epithet "People of the Book."

Names and Divisions. The word bible is derived from the Greek ta biblia, a translation of the Hebrew term ha-sefarim (the books). This term, which first appears in the Bible itself (Dn. 9.2), attests to the fact that by late biblical times, the idea of a corpus of sacred books was already accepted. In rabbinic times the same idea was expressed by the term ha-ketubim (the writings). The Latin phrase Biblia sacra is a translation of yet another original Hebrew expression, kitvei ha-qodesh (sacred writings, holy scriptures). All these terms are in the plural, and are thus more accurate than the English Bible, which gives the mistaken impression that the Bible is a single book.

The rabbinic term for the biblical literature, miqra' (that which is read [aloud]), expresses another essential feature—that the biblical books were not only written down but also passed on orally, read aloud in the synagogue and study house. Precise knowledge of the text of the Bible was the hallmark of literacy in Jewish civilization, providing the entire Jewish world with a common religious, linguistic, and literary frame of reference.

The Bible consists of thirty-one separate books: the *Torah or Pentateuch (consisting of the five books of Moses [Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy; see HUMMASH]), Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel,

Ezra-Nehemiah, and Chronicles. Jewish tradition, however, following the number of actual parchment *scrolls used in ancient times to contain these thirty-one books, arrives at a smaller number, twenty-four: the five sections of the Torah are counted as five separate books, since in ancient times each one was written on its own scroll, while the twelve minor prophetic books (Hosea through Malachi) were all combined on a single scroll and are therefore counted as one book (the Twelve). The division of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles into 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, and 1 and 2 Chronicles, respectively, as well as the division of Ezra-Nehemiah into two books, developed when the Bible was translated into Greek. Modern Bibles, therefore, appear to contain thirty-nine books, though in reality they contain the same thirty-one.

Christianity, since it claims to be a fulfillment of the Jewish scriptures, accepts the sanctity and normative nature of the books of the Hebrew Bible. Christians, however, attach equal, if not greater, sanctity to their own sacred writings, which, they hold, supersede the Jewish scriptures. Christians thus use the term Bible or Holy Bible to refer to the Hebrew Bible together with the Christian scriptures, called by Christians the Old and New Testaments (see OLD TESTAMENT; NEW TESTAMENT).

Rabbinic tradition customarily divides the Bible into three sections. The first, the Torah, has the greatest authority and is believed to be of the greatest antiquity. The second section is the Prophets, including the historical books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, as well as all of the prophetic books (see PROPHETS, BOOKS OF THE; FORMER PROPHETS; LATTER PROPHETS). The final section is the Writings, (*Hagiographa), which refers to all of the remaining books, including Psalms, the *wisdom literature, the Five Scrolls (see HAMESH MEGILLOT), and so forth. Since medieval times, Jews have referred to the Hebrew Bible as Tanakh, an acronym to denote these three groups (t for Torah, n for Nevi'im [Prophets], and k for Ketuvim [Writings]).

Another arrangement of the biblical books, apparently current in the ancient Jewish community of Alexandria, is preserved in the *Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Bible. In this three-part division, the historical books are grouped together (Genesis through Kings with Ruth added after Judges, followed by Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther); the poetic books follow (Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs); and the prophetic books (here including Daniel) conclude the canon. This generic grouping fails to keep the Torah in a class by itself and identifies prophecy as the climax of the Bible. These two features may account for the acceptance of this division in the Christian world, since Christianity abrogated Torah law and saw its own gospel as the fulfillment of Old Testament messianic prophecies.

Canon. The body of sacred literature constituting the Bible is called the canon (Gr.; measuring rod, model, standard). No record exists, however, of a particular time and place at which the biblical canon was established, and no single authoritative institution ever existed in Jewish history that would have had the power to establish the canon. Rather, the canonization of the Bible was a natural, gradual process, by which those writings popularly believed to be of great antiquity and divinely inspired were accorded sacred status. The Talmudic rabbis occasionally refer to the difference between sacred writings and works to which no sanctity was attributed; for instance, in connection with the ritual cleansing of the hands. Sacred writings were held to "defile" the hands (probably a rabbinic reinterpretation of the ancient idea that sacred objects convey "contagious" sanctity), whereas nonsacred books were not. The criterion for determining to which category certain books belonged was always the same: sacred books were believed to be written be-ruah ha-qodesh (by the holy spirit) that is, divinely inspired. Rabbinic sources refer to controversy concerning the Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, and Esther; all three were ultimately accorded sacred status. The rabbis considered withdrawing two other books, Ezekiel and Proverbs, from circulation because some of the material they contain is halakhically or ideologically problematic (Shab. 13b, 30b; Hag. 13a), but the essential sanctity of the books was never questioned. Many books excluded from the Hebrew canon survived in the Septuagint and hence in the Catholic Bible; other books are spuriously attributed to biblical figures but are evidently of much later origin. They are known, respectively, as the *Apocrypha and pseudepigrapha. It would appear that the rabbis had a definite idea of when divine inspiration ceased and all authority passed to the sages, namely, with the coming of Alexander the Great in the late fourth century BCE. Books that they believed to have been written prior to this date, including all works that they sincerely believed dated from First Temple times or earlier, qualified for sacred status; books that were held to be later than this did not.

Contents. Historically speaking, the Bible is the written record of Israel's religious civilization for the first thousand years of its existence. It includes a continuous historical narrative covering the period beginning with the Torah and ending with Kings, complemented by the parallel account in Chronicles. This largest component of the biblical collection provides the history of Israel throughout its formative period. Israel's origins are traced within the history of mankind, following which we are told of the initial, temporary sojourn of Israel's ancestors in Canaan; the birth of the Israelite people; its enslavement in Egypt; its miraculous redemption from bondage (see Exodus); the establishment of its covenant with God, and of its legal, social, and religious institutions, in preparation for national life (see GIVING OF THE TORAH); and its journey to the land of its forefathers. The historical narrative tells of Israel's successful campaign to conquer Canaan; of its early tribal federation and military exploits under the leadership of local charismatic chieftains (judges); and of the eventual unification of the Israelite tribes under a centralized monarchy. The beginning of the monarchic period under David and Solomon is presented as the epitome of Israel's history, whereas the schism of the united Israelite kingdom marks the start of its demise. Several centuries of uninterrupted rule of Davidic kings in the south (Judah), paralleled by centuries of instability in the north (Israel), end in catastrophe for both kingdoms: the Assyrians destroy the northern kingdom and exile its inhabitants, and Babylonia finally overruns the south and deports its population. These events, covering roughly the years from 1800 to 600 BCE, constitute the greater part of biblical history; what follows in Ezra and Nehemiah is but a sequel, in which the beginnings of the "return to Zion" of some Babylonian exiles and the earliest stages of their attempt to reestablish a religious and national center in Judah are recounted. Biblical history is told from a completely religious point of view. Israel is presented as a nation chosen by the one *God to enter into a unique relationship called a *covenant: having fulfilled the unconditional promise to the patriarchs to turn them into a great nation and provide them with the land of Canaan, God promises to bestow upon them the blessings of nature, prosperity, military might, and peace, in return for absolute fidelity, that is, to worship him alone, in accord with the dictates of his law, to shun all pagan religious practices, and to keep all his commands in the civil, social, moral, cultic, and personal spheres. The biblical books present Israel's successes and misfortunes, including its ultimate decline and fall, as a direct function of the extent of its compliance with the divine will. Every event in the life of Israel as a people, its leaders as embodiments of the whole nation, and each individual, is understood to be the result of divine favor or displeasure, contingent upon the moral and religious behavior of human beings. The primary aim of the biblical historians was to demonstrate that God controls historical events. Time and again they note that for additional facts and figures other works (which have not survived) should be consulted; this indicates that history, per se, was not their aim, but rather a selective telling of events for the purpose of instilling beliefs and teachings.

The books of Ruth, Esther, and Daniel, though not included in either of the continuous historical accounts, provide novel-like narratives of other events believed to have occurred at various points in Israelite history.

Israel's laws, held to be divinely revealed, constitute the terms of the covenant. The laws cover every area of behavior: murder and homicide, theft and fraud, damages and slavery, marriage and divorce, sexual and family relations, land tenure and agriculture, ritual purity and defilement, permitted and prohibited foods, sacrifice and the maintenance of the place of worship, the priests and the Levites, Sabbaths and festivals, tithes and alms, the outlawing of idolatry and pagan practices, ceremonies of commemoration, labor laws, and the judicial process, to name some of the major categories. They are contained in four law codes found at various points in the books of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy.

Interspersed throughout the narrative in Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles are the stories of the lives and careers of most of Israel's prophets, along with occasional brief records of their words. A select few of these "messengers of God," who have given their names to the books of Isaiah through Malachi (with the exception of Jonah), are known as the "literary prophets." In the books bearing their names, elaborate, polished versions of their oracles and speeches are recorded at length (see PROPHECY).

The religious poetry of Israel, primarily contained in the Book of Psalms but occasionally included in other books and poetic prayers, of thanksgiving, praise, petition, penitence, victory, defeat, joy, lamentation, historical contemplation, and so forth, provides the record of a rich lyric tradition imbued with Israel's religious beliefs, experience, and longings.

Wisdom literature, found in the books of Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes, as well as in occasional psalms and narratives, is designed to provide practical wisdom and guidance. These profound works of contemplation and theological reflection are aimed at confronting man's existential condition in light of Israel's monotheistic teachings. In a class by itself is the love poetry contained in the Song of Songs.

Literary Form. The biblical books exhibit a wide variety of literary genres and styles. Narratives are generally in prose, though they contain highly poetic features. The stories include self-contained accounts of single events—legendary or chronological, symbolic or realistic, liturgical or mythological—as well as lengthy, systematic, historiographic treatments. Prophetic oration employs every type of rhetoric: poetry and prose, exhortation, harangue, encouragement, historical sermon, parable, words of consolation, to name but a few. Religious poetry includes every type of prayer, from the most fragmentary blessings and curses to the most elaborate hymns. Wisdom literature employs folk sayings and tales, disputations and meditations. The legal literature includes case law, commands and prohibitions ("thou shalt" and "thou shalt not"), and priestly instructions, all occurring both in isolation and in lengthy series, the types often mixed and intertwined. The wealth of literary forms attests to the advanced stage of civilization at which biblical Israel had arrived; the endless ways in which the various forms are modified, combined, and enhanced show that Israelite literary creativity was anything but conservative. Many of these literary styles—some of the legal pronouncements and wisdom sayings, and a great deal of the poetry—have their counterparts, indeed their origins, in the literatures of the other peoples of the ancient Near East and indicate the many ways in which Israel employed this rich, common cultural heritage for its own religious purposes. Others, the narrative prose and historiography in particular, seem to have been developed by Israelite writers and constitute a major component of Israel's original contribution to the forms of literary creativity.

Language. The Bible is written almost entirely in Hebrew, the language of ancient Israel. In fact, the biblical literature is the primary source for knowledge of the Hebrew language in ancient times. The only exceptions are brief Aramaic passages occurring in Genesis 31.47 and Jeremiah 10.11, and the Aramaic sections of Daniel (2.4–7.28) and Ezra (4.8–6.18 and 7.12–26). Scholars have suggested that a few additional portions, though they are in Hebrew, were actually translated from Aramaic originals. In the Hebrew of the Bible a historical development can be clearly observed. Archaic linguistic forms, which had probably fallen into disuse by biblical times, are displayed in biblical poetry, especially of the early period. Classical biblical prose of the First Temple period can be distinguished from the Hebrew of Second Temple times, providing a sound basis for determining the date of authorship of many of the biblical works. Among the features of late Biblical Hebrew are certain Aramaic influences, looser syntactical structure, and unique vocabulary. Biblical poetry, like the poetry of Canaan, is not characterized by rhyme or meter but by parallelism, the convention by which each poetic line is composed of two complementary parts, syntactically parallel and often synonymous.

Dating and Authorship. The rabbis of the Talmud (B. B. 14b–15a), proceeding from the assumption that detailed historical knowledge must have its source in divine revelation, attributed each of the historical books to the prophetic figure nearest in time to the events related; the Torah, as well as Job, was held to have been written by Moses; Joshua by Joshua; Judges, Ruth, and the opening chapters of Samuel by Samuel; the remainder of Samuel by Gad and Nathan; and Kings by Jeremiah, who was also credited with writing his own book. Remarkably, Ezra, rather than a prophet, was held to be the author of his own book and Chronicles, perhaps because, in the Talmudic view, these later historical works were not as obviously divine. Based on the fact that a number of psalms bear the caption "to [or of] David" and that the book of Samuel speaks of David's musical talent and calls him (according to one interpretation of the phrase) "the sweet singer of Israel" (2 Sm. 23.1), the entire Book of Psalms was held to have been written by David, though he is said to have incorporated the writings of ten earlier figures, including Abraham, Moses, and the sons of Korah. Following an obscure passage in Proverbs 25.1 attributing literary activity of some sort to "the men of King Hezekiah of Judah," the rabbis assigned a number of books to "Hezekiah and his colleagues": Isaiah (since he prophesied during Hezekiah's reign), Proverbs, the Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes. The remaining books (Ezekiel, the twelve minor prophetic books, Daniel, and Esther) were supposed to have been written by an undefined body called "the Men of the Great Assembly," sometimes taken to mean Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. In many cases, it is clear that the rabbis were speaking only of the final collection and editing of the material; the actual authors were the prophets themselves.

Modern scholarship, recognizing that the Talmudic tradition is dogmatic rather than factual, endeavors to address the question of authorship of the biblical books on objective, textual grounds. The biblical books, as many other ancient works, contain no direct indication of who composed them. Statements made by the narrator, such as "Moses wrote this teaching" (Dt. 31.9) and "Mordecai wrote down these things" (Est. 9.20), are not colophons; they merely inform the reader that a character in the story wrote something down, but they do not claim to refer to the work as a whole. Only a few books appear to be the works of the individuals for whom they are named; generally, assigning the authorship to a particular individual is mere guesswork. However, content, language, intent, and historical horizon enable scholars to posit the approximate time period in which a book, or a portion of a book, was probably composed. On these grounds, the Torah, told from the vantage point of a narrator located on the western side of the Jordan and addressed to an audience of Israelites living after the establishment of the monarchy, most likely was composed in the middle of the First Temple period (though some scholars place it later). The historical work of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings aims at explaining the destruction of the Temple and the exile of the two kingdoms and must be dated to the end of the period, that is, to the time of the Babylonian exile.

Bible Criticism. Critical Bible scholarship has made important strides based on the recognition that many of the books, rather than being literary unities, appear to have been written by multiple authors during distinct time periods. Literary discrepancies, such as duplication, contradiction, discontinuity, and stylistic variation, are proof of early and late material within the same book. It has become evident that many of the biblical works actually took shape gradually, over a period of time, and the stages of literary development often correspond with stages in the religious history of Israel.

Nowhere has this investigation been more intense than in the critical study of the Torah. Disentanglement of the narrative strands, combined with the recognition that the four law codes are completely independent of each other, led to the widely acclaimed theory, the documentary hypothesis, that the Torah is an amalgamation of four separate, originally complete, and independent documents, each containing its own account of Israel's early history and its own version of the divine law. Study of the four separate documents, or sources, thus obtained has enabled scholars to characterize them and to assign them to historical periods. The documents, since their authors are unknown, are designated as follows. The Yahvist or Yahvistic source, J, is so called because it credits the patriarchs with the knowledge of God's personal name YHWH (scholars surmise it was pronounced Yahveh), while the other sources do not; the J source includes only a brief law code (the covenant made in Ex. 34.10–26) and regularly speaks of God in overtly human form. The J source is held to be the oldest document (9th or 8th cent. BCE), though some scholars disagree. The Elohist or Elohist source, E, which claims that the name of God, Elohim, was first revealed to Moses at the burning bush (Ex. 3), includes the Decalogue (see TEN COMMANDMENTS) and the law code of Exodus 21–24 (see COVENANT, BOOK OF THE). The E source is assigned to the eighth century and is associated with the rise of prophecy. The Deuteronomistic source, D, comprises most of the Book of Deuteronomy and is believed originally to have stood alone. It includes the Deuteronomistic law code (Dt. 12–26) and the orations of Moses delivered along with it. Its pervasive demand for the centralization of all sacrificial worship at a single shrine is unique in the Torah, and scholars associate it with the cultic reform undertaken by King Josiah of Judah, supposing D to be the Law book found by Josiah's men in the Temple (2 Kgs. 22–23). The books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings appear to have been edited in light of the D source's theology; they are referred to as the Deuteronomistic history, and their author is called the Deuteronomist. Some scholars believe that the D source itself was originally part of this work. The Priestly document or code, P, is the largest and most distinctive source; it is clearly the host document into which the others have been inserted, but it is probably not the most ancient. Bible scholars are divided on whether it is earlier or later than the D source and whether or not it can be assigned to First Temple times. The P source is distinguished by its detailed attention to matters of Temple worship and the priesthood, and by its highly developed legal system and theology. Classical Bible criticism (Higher Criticism) posited a linear, historical relationship between the sources of the Torah, reconstructing Israel's religious history on this basis. Today there is great diversity of opinion regarding the documentary hypothesis, with no common consensus having been reached among scholars. Traditional Judaism, on the other hand, developed its own ways of dealing with the literary discrepancies and historical questions that have led scholars to these critical hypotheses (see BIBLE EXEGESIS; MIDRASH). Textual criticism, which developed in recent centuries, holds that as a result of human error, mistakes occurred in copying the text before it was standardized; scholars have made many suggestions for emending the text, often based on comparisons of early translations.

Unity in Diversity. The diversity of form, content, authorship, and date does not obscure the essential unity of the biblical collection. The cultural milieu, the ancient Near East, of which Israel was an integral part, is evident everywhere. The historical horizon—the rise and fall of the independent Israelite kingdom in its own national territory, the land of Canaan—is all-pervasive, even in those books that deal with events before the Israelites' appearance on the scene and after their destruction and exile. The Bible is the literary expression of ancient Israel's religious world. The biblical books are not just any poetry, law, narrative, or history, but rather the literature that places God, his demands of Israel, and his involvement in Israel's affairs in the center. The central position occupied by God in the biblical books is the primary factor that gave rise to the notion that God was indeed their source.

The Text and Its Transmission. The biblical books were first written in the ancient Hebrew script, which was replaced in Second Temple times by the script used today. Early Hebrew employed vowel letters (yud, heh, vav) only minimally; later Hebrew used them much more generously, and the biblical text that eventually became standard reflects a sort of compromise. Though there may have been an original or first edition of each biblical book, the copies that circulated in ancient times were not uniform, as may be seen from the earliest witnesses to the biblical text such as the *Dead Sea Scrolls, the *Samaritan Pentateuch, and the Septuagint. The desire to achieve a single, standard text arose in rabbinic times, partially in response to the method of midrash, in which laws and teachings were derived from particular textual details, thus requiring that all Jews have identical texts of the Bible. The transmission of the Bible from generation to generation was the task of skilled copyists but was paralleled by the oral transmission carried out by expert public readers in the synagogue. The eventual need to combine these two traditions and to give graphic representation to the vowels and melody (see ACCENTS) that had been transmitted orally and never written down gave rise to the *Masorah and the work of the Masoretes. The earliest biblical texts were in scroll form; in medieval times there arose manuscript masoretic Bibles containing vowels and musical accents. Full uniformity in the biblical text became much more feasible after the rise of printing.

BIBLE, LOST BOOKS OF THE. The canonical books of the Bible represent only a remnant of early Hebrew literature, and scripture itself mentions a number of sourcebooks that have not survived. These sources fall into a number of different categories: poetic works that recounted the battles of ancient Israel, for example, the Book of the Wars of the Lord (Nm. 21.14) and the Book of Jashar (Jos. 10.13; 2 Sm. 1.18); annalistic works that contained the details of the Israelite-Judean kings' wars and building projects, such as Acts of King Solomon (1 Kgs. 11.41), Chronicles of the Kings of Israel (1 Kgs. 14.19, etc.), and Chronicles of the Kings of Judah (1 Kgs. 14.29, etc.); these latter works were probably similar in format to the annals of the ancient Mesopotamian kings and important source material for the author of the biblical book of *Kings; and prophetic works that concentrated on the careers of their protagonists, for instance, Words of Samuel the Seer, Words of Nathan the Prophet, Words of Gad the Seer (1 Chr. 29.29), Visions of Jedo the Seer (2 Chr. 9.29), and Words of Shemaiah the Prophet and Iddo the Seer (2 Chr. 12.15). The various prophetic works are mentioned exclusively in *Chronicles, which occasionally blurs the boundaries between these prophetic collections and the annalistic genre (cf. 2 Chr. 20.34, 32.32). It is therefore possible that the chronicler views the prophets themselves as responsible for the official historiography of the monarchic period, a notion which also finds expression in the chronicler's unique citation of the Midrash of the Book of Kings (2 Chr. 24.27).

BIBLE COMMENTATORS. See BIBLE EXEGESIS.

BIBLE EXEGESIS, the interpretation and exposition of the biblical text, in order to apply it practically or as a form of study in its own right. The earliest exegesis can be found in the Bible itself. Later biblical books contain examples of implicit reinterpretations of the earlier books, especially of the *Torah (Pentateuch). This "intra-biblical" exegesis is generally not aimed at simple elucidation; there was little need for this since the language and concepts of the earlier works were still clear enough. At most, a word or phrase that had gone into disuse would be used to enlarge creatively on an earlier theme, provide a reconciliation of conflicting texts, ascribe later norms to earlier periods, or re-apply ancient law to contemporary conditions. Such exegesis is the forerunner of rabbinic *midrash.

Since all Jewish religious culture perceives itself as being derived from the Bible, Judaism as a whole can be seen as the exegesis of scripture in the widest sense. However, the Torah's legal prescriptions are laconic and pertain to their ancient context. As time passed, they needed to be expanded, elaborated upon, and applied to changed conditions. Further, the Bible contains different traditions and is frequently ambiguous; opposing laws and teachings needed to be harmonized. By Second Temple times, the historical and social conditions of the Bible had ceased to exist, and the intellectual and theological climate had changed dramatically. The world of biblical belief had to be brought into line with later thought, and the value and relevance of the biblical laws had to be redefined. Rabbinic teaching that addressed these needs is known as midrash (from the Hebrew verb darash, meaning "to investigate, inquire"). Midrash originated as a popular enterprise of the spiritual leadership, and was generally conducted orally. Evidence that the public reading of the Torah was accompanied in the Second Temple period by simultaneous exposition is found as early as Nehemiah 8.8 and throughout rabbinic literature. The rich literary record of Midrashic exegesis comprises a major portion of the *Talmud, and much of it is preserved in the Midrashic collections. Characteristic of the Midrashic method is the assumption—which stems from the belief in the divine authorship of the Torah—that no word or phrase, not even verbal repetition of the same law or teaching, is devoid of its own unique significance, and that every verse, every work, even every letter, can have a multiplicity of meanings. The underlying postulate that divine speech was fundamentally different from human speech enabled the Talmudic sages to divorce words and phrases from context and to disregard the rules of grammar and syntax—thus the words of the Bible became a virtually inexhaustible source of law and edification.

Midrashic exegesis is traditionally divided into midrash halakhah and midrash aggadah. The former aims at deriving and elucidating legal norms. It draws upon the biblical text, primarily the legal portions of the Torah, proceeding on the principle that every legal statement has specific practical implications. The latter elaborates primarily upon narrative, prophecy, and psalm. It explores plots, characters, and messages, and endeavors to explain inconsistencies, motivations, and obscurities and to supply continuity and causality where the biblical text is silent. Above all, it seeks to provide edifying and inspiring moral teaching, not only where it is implicit in the text, but also on the strength of its own amplification of the text. In time, the rabbis of the Talmudic period formulated lists of hermeneutical rules by which Midrashic interpretations were generated: *Hillel listed seven and R. Yishma'e'l enumerated thirteen for midrash halakhah. Later authorities defined thirty-two rules for midrash aggadah.

Midrashic exegesis seems to have been the primary orientation of biblical study throughout the Talmudic period. Thereafter, though active Midrashic interpretation of scripture declined and eventually ceased, study of the Bible through the eyes of rabbinic midrash remained paramount. This is due to the centrality, in Jewish life, of Talmud study, in which the Midrash plays a central role, and to the definitive role played by midrash in the formation of normative halakhah. While some Jewish thinkers throughout the ages have viewed rabbinic midrash as the true intent of scripture, embedded therein by its divine author in order to be discovered by its inspired interpreters, most authorities, as well as modern scholars, agree that the Midrash is a human creation, artfully devised for the purpose of grounding the teachings of the sages in the sacred writings.

To the extent that the sectarians of the Qumran community accepted the authority of the Bible, their doctrines and practices were also the outcome of a unique form of biblical exegesis. The development of mystical trends in Judaism was also supported by a form of biblical exegesis, in which esoteric doctrines were sought in the supposed hidden meanings of certain biblical texts (see KABBALAH). In particular the biblical account of Creation (Gn. 1; see MA'ASEH BE-RE'SHIT) and the first chapter of Ezekiel (see MA'ASEH MERKAVAH) provided the basis for mystical exegesis. Of special importance in the history of biblical exegesis was *Philo, whose allegorical method of exposition (see ALLEGORY) was designed in order to interpret the Bible in terms of Hellenistic thought.

Translation can also be a form of exegesis (see BIBLE TRANSLATIONS). The need to translate the biblical books into the vernacular (Aramaic, and eventually Greek; see SEPTUAGINT) arose with the decline of Hebrew as a spoken language. Some of these translations (see TARGUM) included Midrashic elements, while others were quite literal. The translations found in the Aramaic targumim were the starting point for later exegetes.

While there are occasional hints that the Talmudic rabbis were aware of the existence of a simpler level of meaning than that of midrash—that is, peshuto shel miqra, or the syntactic, contextual sense of the biblical passage—there is no evidence that they sought to expound this, or that they accorded it any preferential status. The statements that “the Torah speaks in human language” and “the biblical text cannot escape its contextual meaning” were not in rabbinic times exegetical principles of a general nature. A turning point came with the rise of Karaism in the eighth century. The *Karaites rejected the “oral law (i.e., rabbinic tradition and authority). Spurred by the rise of linguistic studies in the Arabic-speaking world, they argued their claims on grammatical and etymological grounds. The Rabbanites moved to meet the challenge with exegesis that could withstand linguistic criticism. The great defender of the rabbinic tradition against Karaism was *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, a pioneer in the field of philology and lexicography. The explanatory notes that he composed to accompany his Arabic translation of the Bible ushered in a new epoch of Bible exegesis, that of the running commentary. Henceforth the task of the exegete was defined as that of providing a full exposition of the biblical text, to be studied along with it, aimed at explicating the contextual meaning of scripture on solid grammatical grounds. *Shemu'el ben Hofni Ga'on followed Sa'adyah to some extent, but the Jewish scholars of Muslim Spain were his true intellectual heirs. Their contributions to biblical exegesis remain significant to this day. The foundations were laid chiefly by Menaḥem ben Saruk and Dunash ben Labrat (10th cent.), and developed by Yehudah Hayyuj and Yonah ibn Janah (both c.1000). The greatest representative of the golden age of the Spanish school of exegesis was Avraham *ibn Ezra, who, having left Spain, produced commentaries on almost all of the biblical books while wandering throughout Christian Europe. These have remained the definitive word on the method of philological exegesis, clearly laying out the features distinguishing it from rabbinic midrash.

The rise of biblical exegesis in northern Europe, while it occurred at approximately the same time, seems to have been spurred by other causes. The popularity of the Talmud Bavli in early Ashkenaz produced a form of study devoted to elucidating the internal logic and continuity of the text. The biblical commentaries of *Rashi, the best-known of the medieval exegetes, exemplifies the application of this method to the study of the Bible as well. In his commentary on the Torah, the adherence to the internal logic of the text is fused with the attempt to encapsulate the normative halakhic midrash on the legal portions of the Torah and to summarize whatever ag-gadic midrash can be incorporated with ease into the nonlegal sections. This commentary became immensely popular throughout the Jewish world and is a mainstay of Jewish knowledge to the present.

With the rise of Jewish-Christian polemic over the interpretation of the Bible in medieval Europe, the exegetical tradition, in both its Spanish and northern French forms, was compelled to relinquish the arbitrariness of the Midrashic approach in order to combat the similarly arbitrary interpretations of Christian exegetes. Together with a certain amount of already extant interest in the Hebrew language in twelfth-century France, which grew with the rise of rationalism, and the eventual arrival of some of the works of the Spanish grammarians, this led to the development of the school of philological commentary, or peshat*, in northern Europe. This is best represented in the commentaries of Rashi's grandson R. *Shemu'el ben Me'ir, R. Yosef *Kara, R. *Yosef ben Yitshaq Bekhor Shor, R. *Eli'ezer of Beaugency, and R. Hizqiyahu bar Manoah Hizkuni.

The philosophical works of *Maimonides, which contain much explicit and implicit biblical exegesis, had an enormous effect on biblical commentators from the thirteenth century on. His influence can be detected in the writings of the most renowned of the Provençal exegetes, R. David Kimhi, whose commentaries combine Spanish philology and philosophy with French literary sensitivity, as well as providing a selection of rabbinic midrash in deference to its popularity. The influence of Maimonides can also be felt in the work of *Nahmanides, whose commentary on the Torah remains true to Spanish rationalism but has room both for the Midrash and for extensive allusion to the "hidden wisdom" of the Kabbalah. Mystical teachings culminated in the *Zohar, the great classic of Spanish Kabbalah, which appeared at the end of the thirteenth century and is essentially a kabbalistic midrash on the Torah. The end of the Spanish period is marked by the discursive commentaries of Yitshaq Abravanel, which appeared on the eve of the Italian Renaissance. Other notable post-classical biblical exegetes are R. Yesha'yahu of Trani, R. Asher ben Ya'aqov, R. *Levi ben Gershom, and R. *Ovadyah ben Ya'aqov *Sforno.

The modern period in Jewish Bible exegesis is signaled by the appearance of the German translations, accompanied by Hebrew commentaries, edited by Moses *Mendelssohn. From this point onward, Jewish biblical exegesis is influenced in varying degrees by historical-critical scholarship. Modern sensibilities are perceptible, though barely, in the commentaries of J. Z. Mecklenburg, Naftali Tsevi Yehudah *Berlin, and Me'ir Leibush *Malbim, and are echoed, in the form of penetrating analyses of traditional commentators, in the writings of Nehama Leibowitz. Among the more prominent attempts at refuting Bible criticism are those of Samson Raphael *Hirsch and David Tsevi *Hoffmann. Leading Jewish biblical commentators began gradually to incorporate the critical method and its findings, while at the same time retaining the best insights of the Talmudic sages and the traditional exegetes. This trend began with Shemu'el David *Luzzatto and A. B. Ehrlich, continued with Umberto *Cassuto, and culminated in the thoroughly critical twentieth-century commentaries of Yehezkel *Kaufmann and M. Z. Segal, and, more recently, those of Moshe Greenberg, Sara Japhet, Baruch A. Levine, Jacob Milgrom, Shalom Paul, Nahum M. Sarna, Moshe Weinfeld, M. Weiss, and Y. Zakovitch.

BIBLE READINGS IN THE SYNAGOGUE. See HAFTARAH; QERI'AT HA-TORAH.

BIBLE TEXT, the exact wording of the Bible, in Hebrew and translation, in various forms (ancient scrolls, medieval manuscripts, and modern editions), of which the Masoretic Text (see MASORAH), handed down for centuries as the central text of Judaism, is the best known. The largest number of manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible, especially from the Middle Ages, represent the Masoretic Text, while precursors of that text, almost identical to the medieval copies, have been found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls. Among these scrolls, found in various places in the Judean Desert, are other versions of the Bible text, dating from the third century BCE through the second century CE. These are the earliest extant evidence of the biblical text. Also important is the *Samaritan Pentateuch, which in its present form is a sectarian reworking of an earlier biblical text. But the layer of revision is thin, so that the presectarian text, which happens to agree with several texts from among the Dead Sea Scrolls, provides important textual information. Other evidence of the biblical text is found in the *Bible translations made in antiquity into Greek, Aramaic, Syriac, Latin, and other languages. Although the Hebrew text from which the translations have been made is reconstructed with great difficulty, the reconstruction is worthwhile, because the Hebrew text underlying these translations at times is different from the Masoretic Text.

The various representatives of the biblical text differ from each other in minor as well as more significant details. Minor differences pertain to such matters as spelling (orthography) and small grammatical elements, such as pronouns, the connective vav, verbal forms, and conjunctions. Larger differences pertain to the omission or addition of single words, complete sentences, or, in rare cases, complete sections. For example, in Jeremiah the *Septuagint as well as two Qumran manuscripts (4QJer^{b,d}) are much shorter than the Masoretic Text. One of the scrolls of the Book of Samuel from Qumran (4QSam^a) lacks several sections of the Masoretic Text, while it adds others.

No single source is considered to reflect the best or the original text of the Bible. In fact, it is not clear whether there existed an original text of the Bible; the opinions of scholars diverge on this matter. Even though in traditional Judaism and Christianity the Masoretic Text is said to reflect the central text of the Bible, many scholars do not consider it to contain such an original text. Guided by contextual arguments, they try to determine in each individual instance which of the transmitted readings contains the contextually best version.

At all stages of its transmission, the biblical text was considered holy, but in early times the concept of holiness did not prevent scribes from changing the text, adding or omitting details. Before the Masoretic Text started to be handed down with great precision, it, too, was subject to the changing approaches of the early soferim (see SOFER). As a result, all the texts of the Bible, including the Masoretic Text, show evidence of earlier scribal activity, including scribal errors that are part and parcel of the scribal transmission of any text. The different types of scribal errors (omissions, additions, changes, interchanges of similar letters, glosses) are now recognizable through a comparison of the early texts of the Bible. The later rabbis ascribed divine inspiration to every Masoretic letter, and a single mistake renders a Torah scroll invalid and unusable. See also BIBLE.

BIBLE TRANSLATIONS. The primary purpose of translating the Hebrew Bible in antiquity as well as in modern times was and is to meet the religious needs of Jews and Christians in worship and in study. Through translation, the Bible, which has been rendered into more than a thousand tongues, exerted a formative influence on many languages and cultures and enriched them with its ideas, idioms, and phrases reflecting the content of the Bible as well as the Hebrew language, in the latter case through a literal translation of the Hebrew (for example, the phrase "to find grace [favor] in the eyes of," which appears in the King James Version and is a direct translation of the Hebrew, is now part and parcel of the English language). Translations that did not aim at a literal representation of the Hebrew Bible incorporated differing quantities of exegesis at all levels. Some ancient translations reflect so much contextual exegesis that the individual words of the Hebrew text can no longer be identified. In these cases one speaks of an ancient midrash or a paraphrase retelling of the biblical text. Because of their exegetical layers, most ancient translations are of great importance for understanding the interpretation of the Bible in antiquity. A further reason for the importance of the ancient versions is that they date to an early period when the Hebrew text was not yet fixed. Hence, some of the translations reflect an original that differs in major or minor details from the Masoretic Text (see MASORAH). The earliest translations were oral, both in Aramaic and Greek; eventually they developed into the *Targum and the *Septuagint. The Jewish community of Palestine, which spoke Aramaic, and the Greek-speaking community of Alexandria needed Aramaic and Greek translations to follow the synagogue reading. Of the Pentateuchal Targums, that of Onkelos is the oldest and adheres most closely to the original; the various Palestinian Targums (Yerushalmi or Pseudo-Jonathan; the so-called fragmentary Targum; manuscript Vatican Neophyti 1) contain much aggadic material. The Targum to the Former and Latter Prophets is traditionally ascribed to *Yonatan ben 'Uzzi'el. The extant remains of a Palestinian Targum to the Prophets are fragmentary. The Targums to the Hagiographa, except for Psalms, are diffuse and of a Midrashic nature. The Targum to Proverbs resembles the Syriac *Peshitta' and is apparently of Christian origin. Though the Targums originated at an early period when Hebrew was first superseded by Aramaic, they received their final form in the fourth or fifth century CE. The oldest written translation is the ancient Greek (koine) version called the Septuagint (Seventy, or LXX). The Septuagint is invaluable for the textual study of the Bible since the Hebrew original underlying it differed considerably from the Masoretic recension. The rendering of the earlier biblical books is fairly literal; that of the later books is more paraphrastic. In the second century CE, three further Greek translations were made. *Aquila's is excessively literal and accords with the method of exegesis of R. 'Aqiva; the rendering of *Symmachus is free and polished; *Theodotion's, combining elegance with fidelity, is mainly a revision of the Septuagint based on the Hebrew. These minor Greek versions are preserved in commentaries of the church fathers, who extracted them from Origen's Hexapla. The Syriac version, called Peshitta' (the Simple [translation]), was redacted in the second century. The Old Latin version or Itala (3d cent.) is a translation of the Septuagint; but the Vulgate (the Common [translation]), composed by Jerome (4th cent.) is a graceful Latin rendering of the Hebrew and became the standard Bible of the Catholic church. Later translations include Sa'adyah Ga'on's in Arabic (Tafsir), tenth century; Moses Arragel's in Spanish, 1432; Martin Luther's in German, 1523 to 1532; the English Authorized Version, 1611, and the Revised Version, 1885; the German translation by Franz Rosenzweig and Martin Buber, 1925 to 1938; and the English translation of the Jewish Publication Society of America, 1917, and its new rendering of the Pentateuch, 1962, and of the whole Bible, 1988.

BIKKURIM (בִּכּוּרִים; First Fruits), last tractate of Mishnah order Zera'im, consisting of three chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and in the Talmud Yerushalmi. The tractate deals with the laws concerning the offering of *first fruits (Ex. 23.19; Dt. 26.1–11), which served as a thanksgiving to God for his giving Erets Yisra'el to the Jews. The presentation of the first fruits to the priest was accompanied by the recital of a passage of thanksgiving (Dt. 26.5–10). First fruits were limited to the *seven species (Dt. 8.8) representing the bounty of the land; they were brought only by the owner of the land on which they grew, and only persons eligible to inherit a portion of the land could recite the thanksgiving passage. According to one rabbinic opinion (Bik. 1.10), bikkurim could not be brought from Transjordan. Bikkurim were designated while still growing in the field.

The Mishnah describes the public ceremony that marked the bringing of bikkurim in Second Temple times, stressing the democratic nature of the ceremony in which rich and poor alike participate and in which "even King Agrippa" (Bik. 3.4) hoisted his basket onto his shoulders to honor God.

The Mishnah tractate was translated into English in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

BIMAH (בִּמָּה; platform, pulpit), a raised platform in the center of the *synagogue on which is situated the desk for reading the Torah scroll. A platform for reading the Torah is mentioned in Nehemiah 8.4, and there was one in the famous synagogue of Alexandria (Suk. 51b). In medieval times, the bimah became a dominant feature in the synagogue, and designers were constantly faced with the problem of creating a balance between the two foci: the ark (see ARON HA-QODESH) and the bimah. During this period, the platform was the center of attention, and because the hall was a place of assembly for nonreligious functions as well, the site of the platform determined the design. In central and eastern Europe, the bimah was often integrated with the central support columns. In Spain, and later in Italy, the platform was placed at the western end of the synagogue. In Sephardi synagogues, the cantor prays from the bimah, whereas in Conservative, Reform, and many Orthodox rites, the cantor stands before the ark. Some rabbinical authorities (for example, Moses *Maimonides [Yad, Hilkhot Tefillah 11.3]) hold that the bimah must be in the center of the building, but Yosef *Karo and most modern rabbis do not regard this as essential. Polish synagogues paid particular attention to the platform, which became an integral architectural element thanks to the introduction of the four central pillars between which the bimah was placed. In eastern Europe it was frequently enclosed by wrought iron. In modern times—initially under Reform influence—it has often been combined with the ark platform. Among Sephardim the platform is called tevah (chest). The word bimah, which appears in the Talmud, is derived from the Greek for a speaker's tribune. Another term frequently used for the platform, almemar, is derived from the Arabic al-minbar (chair, pulpit).

BINYAMIN BEN MOSHEH NAHAWENDI (9th cent.), *Karaitic scholar. He lived sixty or seventy years after *Anan ben David and is considered one of the founders of the Karaite sect; indeed, the earliest use of the term Karaites appears in the colophon of his Sefer

Dinim. He probably lived in Persia or Iraq. Yaqub Qir-qisani relates that Binyamin was "learned in the lore of the Rabbanites and strong in Scripture, and served for many years as a judge." Binyamin took an independent approach in legal decision making and was open to adopting Rabbanite rulings that seemed reasonable, even if they had no scriptural support. He was the first Karaite to write in Hebrew; most of those who came after him in the tenth and eleventh centuries wrote in Arabic. He wrote two books on law: Sefer Mitsvot, on ceremonial law, known only from quotations; and Sefer Dinim, on civil and criminal law, published under the title Masat Binyamin (1835; Ramleh, 1978). He also composed commentaries on a number of biblical books that were well regarded by Avraham ibn Ezra. Fragments of Binyamin's commentaries on Genesis, Isaiah, and Daniel have been identified, while his commentary on the Song of Songs is mentioned by Yefet ben 'Ali (in his commentary to Isaiah), and his commentary to Ecclesiastes is mentioned by Salmon ben Yeruḥim at the beginning of his own commentary to Ecclesiastes, and in which he criticizes Binyamin's tendency toward allegorical interpretations. Binyamin also may have commented on the books of Judges and Samuel. He was the first Karaite to deal with theological matters, although his view that the world was not created by God but by an intermediate angel was rejected by later Karaites.

BIRKAT HA-GOMEL (בִּרְכַּת הַגּוֹמֵל), benediction of thanksgiving uttered after deliverance from danger. Based on Psalm 107, the Talmud (Ber. 54b) rules that a special blessing of thanksgiving is to be said after a desert crossing, after a sea voyage, on being freed from incarceration, or on recovery from a serious illness. It is recited in the synagogue on being called to the reading of the Torah. The blessing thus prescribed is called the Birkat ha-Gomel from its formula, "Blessed are you O Lord . . . who bestows favors [gomel] on those unworthy of them." Since the psalm explicitly mentions thanksgiving "in the assembly of the people" after each of those deliverances, the blessing must be recited publicly, and the congregation must respond, "He who has bestowed good upon you, may he bestow further good upon you." In many congregations the Birkat ha-Gomel is recited by women at their first attendance in the synagogue after giving birth.

BIRKAT HA-HAMMAH (בִּרְכַּת הַחֲמָה; Blessing of the Sun), one of the rarest ceremonies, held every twenty-eight years, when the *sun enters a new cycle (and traditionally stands at the same position as at its creation). The ceremony is held after morning prayers on the first Wednesday in the month of Nisan. The order of service comprises appropriate scriptural verses (Ps. 84.12, 72.5, 75.2; Mal. 3.20), Psalm 148, the blessing of God "who fashions the works of creation," and Talmudic passages. A prayer quorum is not essential, but a large number of participants is desirable. The ceremony was last held on 8 April 1953 (the central observance in Israel took place on Mount Zion in Jerusalem) and on 18 March 1981 (at the Western Wall). The ceremony will next take place on 8 April 2009.

BIRKAT HA-ḤODESH (בִּרְכַּת הַחֹדֶשׁ; Blessing of the New Moon), public announcement of the day(s) of the forthcoming *Ro'sh Ḥodesh (first of the month) made in the synagogue on the preceding Sabbath, after the reading of the Torah (see QER'AT HA-TORAH). The rite, introduced in geonic times, derives from the ancient custom of Qiddush ha-Ḥodesh, by which the official date of the beginning of the new month was determined by the Sanhedrin (minor tractate Soferim 19.9). It was introduced by the Rabbanites, who had adopted the fixed *calendar of *Hillel II and could therefore announce the date in advance, to counter the *Karaites, who continued the ancient custom of requiring personal observation of the new moon before determining the date of Ro'sh Ḥodesh. Birkat ha-Ḥodesh is accompanied by various prayers; the opening passage, Yehi Ratson (found since the eighteenth century only in the Ashkenazi rite), is an adaptation of a private prayer of the third-century amora' Rav (Ber. 16b). Though not part of the obligatory prayers, Birkat ha-Ḥodesh is invested with great solemnity and chanted to a moving tune. Sephardi and Oriental rites contain other introductory prayers for the ingathering of exiles and on behalf of the rabbis, also based on prayers mentioned in the Talmud. Birkat ha-Ḥodesh is not recited before the new moon of Tishrei (Ro'sh ha-Shanah), when it is assumed everyone knows the date. The Sabbath of the announcement is known as Shabbat Mevarekhin (Sabbath for the Blessing). In recent times, women's rituals have developed around the lunar cycle, especially with reference to the ancient custom of a women's holiday at the time of the new moon. In connection with this tradition, women often make this Sabbath into a special event.

BIRKAT HA-KOHANIM (בִּרְכַּת הַכֹּהֲנִים; Blessing of the Priests), benediction prescribed in Numbers 6.22–27 to be said in the Temple by the priestly descendants of Aaron (see PRIESTHOOD) after the daily sacrifice. The Birkat ha-Kohanim was subsequently introduced into the repetition of the 'Amidah in the *Shaharit and *Musaf services. It is recited by kohanim (Jews of priestly descent) in the Diaspora during Musaf among Ashkenazim and during Shaharit among Sephardim on festivals (except on a Sabbath) and on Yom Kippur; the reader recites it on all other occasions. The Spanish-Portuguese congregation in Amsterdam is unique in that the priests chant the blessing during the Shaharit service every Sabbath; the custom was introduced in honor of *Shabbetai Tsevi and was not abolished even after the debacle of the messianic movement. In Israel the priests recite it on weekdays; on the Sabbath, the new moon, and festivals; on Yom kippur (including during the Ne'ilah service); and on Tish'ah be-'Av. After removing their shoes and having their hands washed by *Levites, the kohanim ascend the dukhan (the platform before the ark; hence the Ashkenazi expression dukhenen—to recite the Birkat ha-Kohanim), and with arms raised to shoulder height, fingers outstretched, palms facing outward, thumbs touching (with the first two fingers of each hand separated from the last two fingers), and heads covered with prayer shawls (see TALLIT), they recite the benediction in unison ("... who has sanctified us with the sanctity of Aaron, and has commanded us to bless your people Israel in love") and then repeat the blessing word for word after the reader. The Birkat ha-Kohanim is explained by the rabbis as: "The Lord bless you"—with wealth; "and keep you"—accepting your prayers; "make his face to shine upon you"—with knowledge and understanding; "the Lord lift up his countenance upon you"—accepting your prayers, "and give you peace"—at all times and with all people. The ceremony has been abolished in some Conservative congregations. Reform Judaism did away with priestly prerogatives, although the Birkat ha-Kohanim itself is often recited by the rabbis as a closing benediction.

BIRKAT HA-MAZON (בִּרְכַּת הַמֶּזֶן), grace said after meals. The obligation to recite Birkat ha-Mazon is inferred from the verse "And you shall eat, and be satisfied, and bless the Lord your God for the good land he has given you" (Dt. 8.10). The halakhic requirement concerning the complete Birkat ha-Mazon applies only to a meal that includes bread. The Birkat ha-Mazon consists of three benedictions: the Birkat ha-Zan, thanksgiving to God for the food he has provided; the Birkat ha-'Arets, thanksgiving for the gift of Erets Yisra'el; and Boneh Yerushalayim, a petition for the rebuilding of Jerusalem. These three blessings formed the core of the Birkat ha-Mazon, but the rabbis added a fourth (Ha-Tov v'ha-Meitiv) after the destruction of the Second Temple. In later times, prayers were added for the welfare of the host, for an honorable livelihood, and so on. The verses commencing ha-rahaman (the all-merciful) are a late addition, and their number varies according to different rites: Maimonides lists three; Yemenite Jews, four; Maḥazor Vitry, twelve; the Sephardim, eighteen; the Roman rite, twenty-two; and modern Ashkenazi custom, nine. Special prayers were included for the Sabbath, festivals, Purim, Ḥanukkah, and Ro'sh Ḥodesh. Under certain conditions, an abbreviated form of the Birkat ha-Mazon is recited. Grace must be said at the place where the meal has been eaten. The Zimmun is the invitatory formula that is recited before the Birkat ha-Mazon when three or more adults have eaten together (mezumman). Traditionally those counted are male, although according to the Talmud three or more women who have eaten together should also recite Zimmun (Ber. 45b). Later rabbinic authorities were divided as to whether a woman could be counted together with the men. The great majority of non-Orthodox count participants of either sex, while Sephardim permit a boy over six who understands what he is saying to be counted. One person summons the others to the blessing and the others respond (Ber. 7.1–5, 49b–50a). The custom and formula are ancient and according to the Talmud were as old as *Shim'on ben Shetaḥ (Y., Ber. 7.2). On weekdays, the Birkat ha-Mazon is preceded in some rites by Psalm 137; and on Sabbaths, by Psalm 126. At circumcisions and wedding feasts, poetic interpolations are customary. There is also a special form for recitation in the house of mourners. If certain kinds of fruits or cake or wine only are consumed, a shortened version, consisting of one benediction that contains all the main motifs, is used; after all other kinds of food, a still shorter version is recited. Recitation of the Birkat ha-Mazon is obligatory where food at least the size of an olive has been eaten. A brief version is often used by Reform Jews. In certain Sephardi communities an additional hymn is sometimes added (Bendigamos among western Sephardim; Ya Kominos among Ladino-speaking Jews). See also BENÇAO; BENTSHN.

BIRKAT HA-MINIM (בִּרְכַּת הַמִּינִים), the benediction (actually a curse) concerning minim* (heretics). It constitutes the twelfth of the benedictions of the Amidah* and was composed from earlier sources by *Shemu'el ha-Qatan (c.100 CE) at the request of *Gamli'el II (Ber. 28b) who instituted it as a statutory prayer. The text has undergone many changes and revisions, and the original wording cannot be reconstructed with certainty. Genizah texts of the benediction include a reference to ntsrn, commonly identified as Jewish-Christians. The present opening vela-malshinim (and for the informers) is a late substitution, but was particularly pertinent to the circumstances faced by the medieval Jewish community. Due to various historical circumstances, including church censorship, changes were introduced in its wording. The prayer has been modified or omitted in certain Reform prayer books.

BIRKAT HA-MOTSI' (בִּרְכַּת הַמּוֹצִיא; the Bringing Out Blessing), benediction said before a meal that reads, "Blessed . . . who brings forth bread from the earth" (see BENEDICTIONS). *Bread is taken as standing for the meal in general, and therefore the Birkat ha-Motsi' is the standard blessing; however, the grace before a meal may vary according to the types of food about to be consumed. According to tradition, the custom was introduced by the Men of the *Keneset ha-Gedolah. The main grace of thanksgiving is said after the meal (see BIRKAT HAMAZON).

BIRKAT HA-SHIR (בִּרְכַּת הַשִּׁיר; Blessing of the Song), a prayer also known as Nishmat Kol Hai from its initial words. It concludes the *Pesuqei de-Zimra, preceding the *Shema' and its blessings, in the morning service for Sabbaths, festivals, and the High Holy Days and is recited at the *Pesah *Seder following the *Hallel. According to the Talmud, part of it is excerpted from an ancient prayer for rain (Ber. 59b). Written in poetic hyperbole, Birkat ha-Shir sings of the desire of every living creature to praise God for his mercies and acts of deliverance, even though human speech is utterly inadequate to the task of declaring the glory and beneficence of the creator. This prayer is found in all traditional and modern prayer books. A curious medieval legend found in France and Germany assigns its authorship to the apostle Peter, a claim that is disputed in Maḥazor Vitry (c.1100).

BIRKAT HA-TORAH (בִּרְכַּת הַתּוֹרָה; blessing of the Torah), the Talmudic name for the second benediction preceding the recitation of the Shema' (see AHAHAV RABBAH AND AHAHAV 'OLAM) and the common name for the blessing recited before studying the Torah and also before and after being called to the public reading of the Torah. Because the study of the Torah is considered a foremost religious duty, it has to be preceded by the recitation of an appropriate benediction. Various formulas are quoted in the Talmud in the name of different teachers; some of them appear in the opening of the morning service, which includes, in addition to prayers, Torah study in the form of quotations from the Mishnah. Blessings are also recited by individuals called to the reading of the Torah (the original version has been traditionally ascribed to Ezra on the basis of Neh. 8.4–6), the opening benediction being "Blessed are you who has chosen us from the nations and given us your Torah," and concluding with "Blessed . . . who has given us the Torah of truth and has planted everlasting life in our midst." An additional formula blessing God for giving the Torah is found in the concluding benediction after the reading of the *haftarah on Sabbaths and holidays.

BIRKHOT HA-NEHENIN (בִּרְכוֹת הַנֶּהֱנִין; blessings for things enjoyed), blessings recited over things providing pleasure, such as food or drink. The rabbis taught that enjoyment of the gifts of God should always be accompanied by the benediction of thanksgiving. The most important blessings, instituted by the rabbis, are recited before and after food or drink, with specific benedictions for bread, any other confectionery, wine, drinks other than wine, fruit, and vegetables. Reciting the blessing over bread before a meal that contains bread is sufficient to cover all other foods eaten during the meal, except wine and fruit (which are important in themselves). Also in the category of birkhot ha-nehenin are benedictions to be recited before enjoying the aroma of fragrant flowers or spices. See also BENEDICTIONS.

BIRKHOT HA-SHAḤAR (בִּרְכוֹת הַשַּׁחַר; Morning Benedictions), a series of blessings recited originally in Talmudic times upon wakening, each individual benediction suiting the particular occasion or action. The Talmud records fifteen such blessings. Immediately upon stirring from sleep Elohai Neshamah ("O my God, the soul which you gave me") was said; while upon hearing the cock crow, rising, dressing, washing the hands, and so on, the appropriate blessings were pronounced, concluding with a prayer for guidance through the Torah and salvation from sin (Ber. 60b). The ge'onim later transferred the Birkhot ha-Shaḥar to the commencement of the synagogue service. Prayers for deliverance from arrogant men and mishaps (Ber. 16b), exhortations to fear God privately and publicly, remembrances of man's insignificance before God, and assertions of God's covenant with the patriarchs were added. The three negative Birkhot ha-Shaḥar ("who has not made me a heathen, a slave, a woman," cf. Men. 43b), the content of which is partly modeled on similar Greek prayers, have been reformulated in some modern rites. (Already in the thirteenth century, the liturgical authority Abudarham added a blessing for women thanking God for "having created me according to his will," and a recently discovered medieval Provençal manuscript also provides an alternative text.) In non-Orthodox prayer books, these blessings have been recorded in positive, egalitarian terms (cf. thanking God "who made me a Jew," "who made me free" in the Conservative formulation).

BIRTH. Though the Bible associates birth with pain from the very beginning of human history (Gen. 3.16), Jewish authorities have never regarded the suffering of this curse as a mandatory obligation, and they sanctioned the use of analgesics to mitigate it just as they favored a man's efforts to overcome the parallel curse of hardship in tilling the soil (Gen. 17–19) through the use of agricultural machinery. The Bible regards childbearing as a blessing (Gn. 16.1–4, 30.22–24; I Sm. 1.4–20). Although it is the wife who bears the children, the primary obligation to procreate is the husband's. According to biblical law, a mother was considered ritually impure for thirty-three days after the birth of a male child and for sixty-six days after the birth of a female; at the conclusion of this period she offered a sacrifice of purification (Lv. 12.1–8). In a reference to a Caesarean section, the Mishnah denies the rights of the first-born both to a first child "extracted through the wall (of the abdomen)" and to further children (Bekh. 8.2). A woman in confinement enjoys religious concessions in Jewish law. For the first three days she is deemed in mortal danger, and Sabbath and other laws may be disregarded for her needs, as would be the practice for any other gravely ill patient; from then until the seventh day, religious laws may be violated for her if she so requests, and from that point until the thirtieth day, she is regarded as a patient who is not in danger, though fires may still be made for her on the Sabbath to protect her from the cold. From the fifteenth century on, it became a custom among European Jews for the mother to pay a special visit to the synagogue upon recovering from birth, and an appropriate prayer was composed for the occasion. There are many folkloristic beliefs and customs associated with birth, some of them censured in rabbinic writings for their superstitious nature. Traditional Jewish law does not allow fathers to be present during childbirth.

Out of a desire for greater participation in Jewish life, many Jewish mothers have introduced or renewed ceremonies and celebrations marking the birth of children, particularly those welcoming daughters, such as simḥat bat or zeved ha-bat. In non-Orthodox synagogues, mothers, or both parents, take part in a ceremonial naming of a daughter.

BIRTH CONTROL. Procreation is the first scriptural commandment (Gn. 1.28), and a prohibition against the destruction of male seed is traceable to the biblical account of Onan, who "spilled his seed on the ground" while having intercourse with his wife (Gn. 38.9–10). Onan was "put to death by the Lord," and many commentators attribute this punishment to his spilling of the seed during intercourse. References to the evils of the destruction of male seed are found in the Talmud (Nid. 13a), Midrash (Gn. Rab. 23.24), and Zohar (Va-Yeshev 188a; Va-Yehi 219b), but the precise definition of the prohibition and its scope is the subject of debate among classical halakhists. In light of the fact that the focus of both the positive commandment to procreate and the prohibition against seed destruction is on the male, female contraception is considered preferable to any method used by the male. Indeed, a "cup of sterility" for the purpose of inducing permanent female infertility is mentioned in the Talmud (Yev. 65b), and its use is permitted in cases where there is a history of painful births and where the woman's husband has already fulfilled the commandment to procreate. The Talmud also discusses short-term contraception and permits it in the cases of minors, pregnant women, and nursing mothers (Yev. 12b). The principle underlying this complex discussion is that the prevention of danger to life and health constitutes a valid halakhic justification for the use of birth control. The situations to which modern authorities have extended this principle include unduly frequent birth, temporary physical weakness, excessive fatigue, constant miscarriage, and serious concern for the birth of genetically defective children. Some authorities permit the use of birth control when there is a serious educational problem in relation to existing children of the family, but in principle, the use of birth control for economic reasons is forbidden under Jewish law. In all cases in which contraception is permitted, the method employed should comply, as much as possible, with halakhic criteria, such as use by the female and indirect means of preventing conception rather than direct destruction of the semen. In general, the birth control pill is the preferred method of contraception, provided that its use does not endanger the woman and due account is taken of the possibility of menstrual bleeding between cycles. The Conservative rabbinate, in its Rabbinic Letter on Intimate Relations, affirms the permissibility of using birth control devices along the lines and for the reasons enumerated above, but it also says that couples should think seriously of having three or four children in light of the serious demographic problems Jews are facing today as a result of the destruction of a third of the world's Jewish population during the Holocaust, a continuing birth rate among Jews below replacement level, and the hemorrhaging of Jewish ranks through assimilation and intermarriage. In general, Reform Judaism supports birth control.

BIRTHDAYS. No observances or celebrations are traditionally connected in Jewish custom with the anniversary of a person's birth. The only birthdays taken note of—because of their religious implications—are the thirteenth in the case of a boy (bar mitsvah*) and the twelfth for a girl (bat mitsvah*). In modern times, both in the Diaspora and Israel, birthdays are regularly celebrated, but without religious significance, although special birthdays (e.g., the seventieth, the eightieth) may be marked by being called to read the Torah in the synagogue. In some cases the sixtieth birthday is specially marked, because reaching it is evidence that one is not guilty of a sin, the punishment for which is early (i.e., before 60) death.

BIRTHRIGHT, rights inherent in the status of being the *firstborn. Birthright is mentioned in the Bible in connection with its sale by Esau to Jacob for "a mess of pottage" (Gn. 25.31–34). Jewish tradition ascribes particular significance to this sale, seeing in it the discarding of the spiritual heritage of Abraham by Esau, who by virtue of his birth was entitled to be its inheritor. According to Jewish tradition, before the institution of the hereditary priesthood, the firstborn of each family was automatically designated as the spiritual leader of the home (Rashi on Gn. 25.31). In the Bible, the hereditary "spiritual" birthright is in several instances transferred from the firstborn (Ishmael to Isaac; Esau to Jacob; Manasseh to Ephraim); this is understood to illustrate the fact that entrance into the spiritual heritage (as opposed to the material inheritance, which cannot legally be bypassed) is ultimately dependent upon merit. Maimonides codifies this principle when he states that although all hereditary offices pass to the firstborn, this is only so when the firstborn is fit to assume the responsibilities of office (Hilkhot Melakhim 1.7). BITTAḤON (בִּטְחוֹן; trust), a noun derived from the root b t ḥ (trust in, rely on), which occurs in the Bible, especially in Psalms. It most frequently refers to faith in God, his providence, and his saving presence. In later usage the noun came to mean steadfast trust in God, and in many contexts it is indistinguishable from emunah (faith). Many medieval writers and moralists titled their tracts on the pious life The Book of Emunah and Bittahon. The modern Hebrew noun also means safety and security.

BI'UR ḤAMETS (בִּיעוּר חָמֵץ; destruction of leaven), the act of destroying, preferably by fire, any leaven (see ḤAMETS) in one's possession on the morning of 14 Nisan (one day before Pesah), in accordance with the rabbinic interpretation of Exodus 12.15, "even the first day shall you put away leaven out of your houses." To make sure that "no leaven shall be seen with you" (Dt. 16.4) during the Pesah festival, leaven should, on the eve of the festival, be either burned (bi'ur) or disowned (bittul). Traditionally, both methods are followed; after the burning, an Aramaic formula is recited by which ownership of any leaven that may have escaped detection is formally renounced. BLASER, YITSHAQ BEN MOSHEH SHELOMOH (1837–1907), Lithuanian rabbi and leading figure in the *Musal movement founded by Yisra'el *Salanter. After several years in Saint Petersburg, Blaser became head of the kolel (advanced yeshivah) in Kovno and helped establish various Musar educational institutions in Lithuania, including the influential yeshivah of *Slobodka. Blaser's ethical teachings, published in Or Yisra'el in 1900, were widely studied in Musar circles. He emphasized that knowledge alone did not enable an individual to achieve a state of intense religiosity ("fear of the Lord"). Instead, one should contemplate one's finitude, sinfulness, and repeated failure in obeying God. Blaser also published several works on halakhah and many articles. In 1904 Blaser settled in Jerusalem, where he died.

BLASPHEMY, the reviling of God, that is, of his holy name, punishable according to the Bible by stoning (Lv. 24.15–16). The Talmud restricts capital punishment to blasphemy of the Tetragrammaton: when using any other of the divine names or attributes, the blasphemer is subject only to corporal punishment (San. 56a). Blasphemy is prohibited by one of the seven *Noahic laws, but the prohibition does not extend (as in other religions) to the reviling of sacred institutions or customs. In order to avoid repetition of the blasphemy during a trial, a special procedure, involving a substitution for the actual blasphemous phrase, is adopted in presenting the evidence. However, the court cannot pronounce the blasphemer guilty without having heard the exact words allegedly spoken by the accused. Therefore, upon the conclusion of the evidence, the court is cleared and one of the witnesses repeats the exact words used. On hearing the blasphemous words, the members of the court rend their garments as a sign of grief and pass sentence. Josephus records that the body of a person executed for blasphemy was exposed unburied until sunset (Antiquities of the Jews 4.202), the ignominy proclaiming the reprehensible and heinous nature of the crime. Despite the gravity of the offense, the blasphemer who does penance may become reconciled with God. After Jewish courts no longer had authority to inflict the death sentence, blasphemy was usually punished by excommunication.

BLEMISHES (Heb. mumim), physical defects that disqualify a priest from performing his office in the Temple (Lv. 21.17–21) and an animal for use as a sacrifice (Lv. 22.20–25). In addition to physical blemishes, the priest is disqualified from service if he was born in unlawful wedlock, is in mourning, is in a state of drunkenness, is disheveled, is practicing idolatry, has committed a homicide, has lost his voice (Hul. 24a), or is too young (Nm. 4.43). Nonphysical blemishes may also occur in the case of animals; for example, an animal is disqualified from use as a sacrifice if it has served as an object of worship. The reason for disqualification by blemish is stated by the prophet Malachi (Mal. 1.8): a gift that is unacceptable to an exalted personality is surely so when the presentation is to God. The sages went into great detail in enumerating blemishes in animals (Bekh. 6) and priests (Bekh. 7), and Maimonides listed fifty types of blemishes disqualifying animals and ninety types of blemishes disqualifying priests (Hilkhot Bi'at ha-Miqdash, chs. 7 and 8). Blemishes on a bride or groom that could not have been known by the other party prior to the marriage or that render intercourse between the parties unbearable are valid reasons to vitiate the marriage bond. Moral blemishes are treated at length in numerous rabbinic passages, typical of which is the statement that "he who finds fault in others is influenced by the blemish in himself" (Qid. 70b).

BLESSING AFTER DELIVERANCE FROM DANGER. See BIRKAT HA-GOMEL.

BLESSING AND CURSING. In Hebrew, the word barakh, commonly translated "bless," is used in the standard invocation to prayer (barekhu et Adonai, "Bless ye the Lord") and in benedictions for giving thanks and praise to God, not only for his benefits but even for such misfortunes as one is called upon to suffer. "In exactly the same way as a blessing is uttered for boons, so is one uttered for misfortunes" (Ber. 54a). The common belief is that not only can God bring good fortune (blessing) or misfortune (curse) upon a person but that this power is also invested—albeit indirectly—in humans, who can invoke God's blessing or curse on others. The strength of this belief is illustrated by the competition of Jacob and Esau for the blessing of their father, Isaac (Gn. 27). Prior to his death Jacob blessed his children (Gn. 49); and Moses, the children of Israel (Dt. 33). Balaam, the heathen prophet, was forced by a power greater than himself to turn his intended curses into blessings (Nm. 23–24). The power of blessing and cursing is held to be very great; thus David on his deathbed urges his son Solomon to execute Shimei ben Gera because "he cursed me with a grievous curse" (1 Kgs. 2.8), while the Talmud states, "The curse of a sage—even when undeserved—comes to pass" (Ber. 56a) and "Regard not lightly the blessing of an ordinary person" (Ber. 7a). On occasion, in rabbinic literature the verb barukh (bless) means to curse. Jewish folklore attributes great power to the curse, which was believed to hold power even over the dead. Specifically forbidden by the Bible is the cursing of God, parents, or the deaf; the penalty in the first two instances is death. While the rabbis prohibit cursing, it is allowed in certain instances, such as cursing the wicked (Men. 64b).

BLESSING OF CHILDREN (Heb. birkat banim). Although the importance attached to parental blessing is evident in many biblical passages (e.g., Gn. 27, 49), the custom of blessing the children on the eve of the Sabbath (and in some rites also on festivals) is a much later innovation, probably originating in the Middle Ages. The customary formula consists of the phrase "[May] God make you as Ephraim and Manasseh" (cf. Gn. 48.20) for boys, and "[May] God make you as Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, and Leah" (cf. Ru. 4.11) for girls, followed by the Birkat ha-Kohanim* (Nm. 6.24–26). The parent places both hands on the head of the child while pronouncing the blessing, which is given to adult children as well. In the Sephardi rite, a child is blessed after the father or child has performed a religious function in the synagogue (e.g., 'aliyyah). Special formulae of the blessing exist for particular occasions, for example, the eve of Yom Kippur.

BLINDNESS. A number of biblical figures, including Isaac, Jacob, and Eli, are reported to have lost their sight in their old age, while it is specifically stated that Moses at the age of a hundred twenty retained his sight (Dt. 34.7). God is said on occasion to have used blindness as a punishment; the term is often used metaphorically with various pejorative implications. In ancient times, the blind, like other disabled, were regarded as outcasts. Biblical law specifically forbids taking advantage of a person who is blind or in any other way physically disabled (Lv. 19.14; Dt. 27.18). Blindness was a ritual defect disqualifying a priest from performing any function at the altar (Lv. 21.17–23); blind animals were disqualified as sacrifices (Lv. 22.21–22).

The rabbis, in order not to stigmatize the blind, used various euphemisms to refer to them, such as me'or 'ei-nayim (bright of eyes) or saggi nahor (much light). They sought to dispel popular prejudices, insisting that the blind were fully normal and that any restrictions were due solely to their physical disability. They discussed which of the commandments had to be observed by the blind and from which commandments the blind were exempt. Rabbi Yehudah ha-Nasi' was prepared to exempt the blind from all commandments; others exempted them only from positive commandments. Rabbi Yosef ben Hiyya' and R. Sheshet, who were both blind, felt that the blind should observe all commandments (Pes. 116b). Most authorities, however, were more pragmatic in their approach and decided based on the nature of the particular mitsvah. For example, the Talmud says that a blind person is exempt from turning to Jerusalem in prayer if he has no way of determining the direction but rather should turn his heart toward God (Ber. 29a). The blind had to bless the new moon and the Hanukkah lights but not the Havdalah light. A totally blind man was not allowed to serve as judge (Shulhan 'Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 7.2), although this ruling was not accepted by some authorities. In modern times, the question of the permissibility of cornea transplants to save or restore sight has been decided positively by almost all rabbinic authorities.

BLOOD (Heb. dam), regarded in the Bible as the vital element of all living things, as is made clear from such verses as "the blood is life" (Lv. 17.11; Dt. 12.23–24). This is also the reason why Noah and his descendants were forbidden to consume the blood of animal flesh (Gn. 9.4); the consumption of blood was regarded as equivalent to eating the living animal. The prohibition against consuming blood is repeated several times in the Bible and is the basis of the detailed laws elaborated in the Talmud concerning the ritual preparation of *meat. Even after an animal or bird belonging to a permitted species (Lv. 11.2–8; Dt. 14.4–6, 11) has been slaughtered in accordance with ritual regulations, the blood is still forbidden. Whereas the meat of sacrificial animals was partly burned and partly eaten, the blood was poured away at the base of the altar. It is blood that unites families and tribes, and the obligation to avenge a murder falls on the kin (the *blood avenger). The Talmud, however, limits the prohibition to blood in the arteries, which is removed by ritual slaughter or by cutting the veins, and to blood which has emerged on the surface of the meat. Blood within the meat itself is permitted, but the surface blood must be removed by "kashering" (soaking the meat in water, salting, and rinsing) or by grilling the meat. Liver is regarded as containing so much blood that only grilling on an open fire is permitted. The blood of fish does not come under this prohibition, but so great was the abhorrence of blood by the rabbis that they extended the original prohibitions (for example, by forbidding the eating of bread stained from the blood of one's own gums—see DIETARY LAWS). Menstrual blood is considered especially unclean, and the biblical regulations concerning it are further extended by the Talmud (see MENSTRUATION).

BLOOD AVENGER, the term used in biblical law to denote the next of kin of a homicide victim. In the biblical view, the shedding of innocent human blood cannot go unexpiated: "Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed, for in his image did God make man" (Gn. 9.6). The blood of the victim is portrayed as "crying out from the ground" (Gn. 4.10) for redemption. It was assumed that the victim's nearest kin would be most interested in avenging the blood of the slain person, an expression of the tribal and familial solidarity characteristic of biblical times.

The Torah refers explicitly to the blood avenger in the context of accidental homicide, establishing the principle that a person found guilty of involuntary manslaughter may escape the blood avenger by taking refuge in an *asylum city (Nm. 35.12, 35.24–25). It may have been that, at an early stage, in cases of deliberate murder the next of kin was entitled to see to the execution of the killer. Joab, for instance, kills Abner to avenge the killing of his brother Asahel (2 Sm. 3.26–27). There are even cases of blood vengeance for crimes other than murder: Absalom kills his brother Amnon for raping his sister Tamar (2 Sm. 13.23–29). Eventually, however, the trial and execution of criminal murderers was deemed the responsibility of the court. Only in cases of accidental killing did the blood avenger have the right to exact vengeance—and only if the killer failed to take refuge in an asylum city (Nm. 35.19, 35.26–27). God is often referred to as Israel's blood avenger, punishing her enemies (Dt. 32.43; Ps. 79.10).

The subject of blood avengers is discussed by the sages in tractate Makkot*. They discuss whether blood vengeance is a right or a sacred duty, who is required to act as an avenger, and other related topics. It is uncertain whether the rules formulated by the Talmud relate to any particular historical reality.

BLOOD LIBEL, the accusation—frequently leveled in the Middle Ages, during the nineteenth century, and propagated again during the Nazi period—that Jews use the blood of a Christian for their religious rites, particularly in the preparation of unleavened bread for Pesah. The ritual murder libel dates from pre-Christian times; Apion charged the Jews with annually fattening a Greek for sacrifice in the Temple (Josephus, Against Apion 2.8.95), while the Romans made the same charge against the early Christians. The first well-known medieval accusation occurred in England in 1144, the alleged victim being William of Norwich. The libel subsequently spread throughout Europe and was expanded to include the theme that Jews torture Christian children in a reenactment of the Passion of Jesus. Another famous child martyr was Little St. Hugh of Lincoln, who was found dead in 1255 and who is the subject of the Prioress's Tale in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. (Lincoln Cathedral now has an inscription asking forgiveness for the sin of murderous slanders of libel.) The accusation frequently served as a pretext for anti-Jewish outrages and has been a major factor in Christian *antisemitism. Among the most notorious blood libels in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries were the Damascus Affair of 1840, the Tiszaeslar accusation of 1882, and the accusation against Mendel Beilis in Russia in 1912. During the Hitler persecution the allegation was constantly repeated by Julius Streicher in his obscene antisemitic publication Der Stürmer. The allegation, which has been repeatedly proved as completely baseless, was formally and repeatedly denounced by rulers and popes, but they were unable to eradicate the folk belief. Since Vatican II (1962–1965), the Catholic church has moved to eliminate the last practices of praying to victims of alleged ritual murders (for example, at Trent in Italy and Rinn in Austria).

BODY. The juxtaposition of body and *soul as representing the physical and spiritual, or evil and good, in man is nowhere evident in the Hebrew scriptures. Indeed, there are no specific terms for body and soul in biblical Hebrew. Man's creation is described as "the breath of life" breathed into the nostrils of man who was "formed of the dust of the ground" (Gn. 2.7). The notion that "the dust returneth to the earth as it was, and the spirit returneth unto God who gave it" (Eccl. 12.7) is a later development. At any rate, no distinction between body and soul is made during life. Ancient Hebrew does, however, make the distinction (still preserved in the New Testament) between flesh (basar) and spirit (ruah). In rabbinic writings, the body was sometimes regarded as the seat of passion and the cause of sin; yet both body and soul were held jointly accountable for deeds committed. The human body is deemed as the possession of God; man, as its custodian, is responsible for protecting it from mutilation, and Maimonides includes in his religious code a detailed regimen of diet, exercise, and other rules to ensure the health of the body (Yad, Hilkhot De'ot 4). In death, too, the body is inviolable; hence, the insistence on its speedy interment (cf. Dr. 12.23) and the Orthodox opposition to *cremation, *autopsies and dissections, embalming, or any other violation of its integrity. The belief in the physical *resurrection, as well as in the incorporeality of God, is incorporated in the *Thirteen Principles of Faith listed by Maimonides.

BOETHUSIANS, members of a religious-political party active in the century preceding the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE and existing for some time after that event. They were associated with the high priesthood and were close to, though not identical with, the *Sadducees. The rabbis considered them primarily a religious sect, founded by Boethus, a heretical disciple of the Mishnaic authority *Antigonus of Sokho. Other scholars connect the Boethusians with Shim'on ben Boethus, high priest in King Herod's time; the family is thought to have belonged to the Benei Hēzir, known from inscriptions up to the second century CE. The Talmud describes the Boethusians contemptuously and characterizes them as arrogant and selfish.

He was a follower of Avraham Miguel Cardoso, who often mentioned him in his letters, and he led Cardoso's supporters in Smyrna. In 1680 Bonafoux returned to Salonika but did not join the Shabbatean group that converted to Islam in 1683. Like his master Cardoso, he strongly opposed antinomic acts (except the "Messiah's" personal apostasy) as well as the doctrine of the apotheosis of the "Messiah." Nevertheless, after returning to Smyrna he continued to have visionary experiences and was expelled in 1702. In 1710 he was in Egypt and upon returning to Smyrna claimed to have received a letter from the ten lost tribes praising the "Messiah," Shabbetai Tsevi.

BOOK OF ADAM AND EVE, pseudepigraphous work extant in Greek, Latin, Slavonic, Armenian, and Georgian, as well as several Coptic fragments. These versions differ greatly from each other, and the work's textual history is far from clear. Its original language may have been Greek, but neither Hebrew nor Aramaic can be ruled out. Its date and place of composition are unknown, but a Jewish origin is probable in spite of several Christian interpolations. It recounts events in the life of Adam and Eve following their expulsion from paradise, including their encounters with Satan, the birth of their children, Adam's tour of heaven, his failed attempt to avoid death, Adam and Eve's recollections of their expulsion from the garden of Eden, and their deathbed instructions to their children. The work ends with Adam and Eve's death and burial.

BOOK OF AHIQAR, a court legend extant in widely divergent recensions in numerous languages, including Aramaic, Greek, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopian, Armenian, Slavonic, and Romanian. It probably was not written by Jews, but it was known both to the Jewish community of Elephantine (see YEB)—in its Aramaic recension—in the fifth century BCE and to the author of the Book of Tobit, which states that the hero of the work belonged to the lost ten tribes (cf. esp. Tb. 14.10). The story itself recounts how Ahiqar, the seal bearer of the Assyrian kings, is falsely accused of treason by his adopted son, Nadan. Ahiqar is sent to his death, but the executioner spares his life. Subsequently the king regrets having sentenced his wise counselor to death, and Ahiqar is summoned back to the royal court, where he again renders many useful services. An extensive part of the story is devoted to Ahiqar's wise proverbs and ethical sayings, in the familiar style of the *wisdom literature, with which he tries to educate his adopted son.

BOOK OF CREATION. See SEFER YETSIRAH.

BOOK OF JASHAR, name of a lost work of ancient Hebrew poetry mentioned in the Bible (Jos. 10.13; 2 Sm. 1.18) containing two short pieces of biblical poetry (Jos. 10.12–13; 2 Sm. 1.19–27). Since the references to the Book of Jashar in both Joshua and Samuel are in the context of military heroics (Joshua's battle at Gibeon and the noble deaths of Saul and Jonathan on the battlefield at Gilboa), the lost book is presumed to have been a collection of epic material detailing the battles of the early Israelites. An anonymous author in the Middle Ages, probably in eleventh-century Spain, borrowed the title for his compilation of popular midrashim, but there is no connection between this ethical work and the lost ancient work. BOOK OF LIFE. The metaphorical concept of the Book of Life is biblical (cf. Ex. 32.32; Mal. 3.16; Ps. 69.29); to be omitted or "blotted out" from the book meant death. This idea was subsequently connected with the notion of an annual balancing of each person's deeds by the heavenly bodies on the days of judgment—Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur. If an individual's balance is positive, he will be inscribed in the Book of Life on Ro'sh ha-Shanah; the entry will be sealed on Yom Kippur (R. ha-Sh. 16b). Various additions containing references to the Book of Life are inserted in the 'Amidah during the *Aseret Yemei Teshuvah. The traditional New Year's wish, "may you be inscribed and sealed for a good year," refers to the same idea. The Book of Life inspired two of the best-known sayings in Pirkei Avot: "Know what is above you: a seeing eye, a hearing ear, and all your deeds are written in a book" (2.1); and "The ledger is open and the hand records . . ." (3.20).

BOOK OF THE WARS OF THE LORD, name of a lost work of ancient Hebrew poetry mentioned only once in the Bible (Nm. 21.14). Two verses in the Torah (Nm. 21.14–15) are said to derive from an earlier source called the Book of the Wars of the Lord. These poetic lines are extremely difficult to interpret, though they clearly deal with the Israelites marching through the territory of Moab. Probably this book was an anthology of ancient poetry recalling God's triumphs on behalf of the people of Israel. The medieval commentator Moses Nahmanides suggested that the short victory poem in Numbers 21.27–30 is also derived from the Book of the Wars of the Lord or a similar source. BOOK OF ZERUBBABEL, a Hebrew apocalypse, originally written by a Byzantine Jew in the seventh century CE and preserved in several different recensions. It consists of the apocalyptic visions of *Zerubbabel, the governor of Judah during the Persian period, in which one Jewish *Messiah, Son of Joseph, will be killed by his archenemy Armilus, but a second Messiah, Son of David, will prevail, a new Temple will be built, and the whole of Israel will be gathered into Jerusalem.

BOOKS, BURNING OF. Jewish law forbids the burning of books that contain the divine name, even if they have become disused or are secular or heretical. Such books are put away to molder (Shab. 116a; see GENIZAH). Despite this, R. *Tarfon, in his vigorous denunciation of the "books of the sectarians" (probably in this context Judeo-Christians), declared that should such books come to his notice, he would unhesitatingly burn them, even if they should contain the mention of the divine name. Thus the ceremonial burning of books became a symbol of arch heresy. Such a fate was actually meted out to the philosophical works of Maimonides during the fierce controversy that erupted over the doctrines espoused in them, and they were publicly burned in southern France in 1233 (see MAIMONIDEAN CONTROVERSY). In this century the ceremonial burning of Mordecai Menahem *Kaplan's Reconstructionist prayer book by extreme Orthodox elements in New York City was an unusual modern example. On the other hand, Jewish books have often been consigned to the flames by non-Jewish authorities, notably the twenty-four cartloads of the Talmud burned in Paris in 1242, the burning of Jewish books in Rome in 1332 and 1553 (see TALMUD, BURNING OF THE), and the Nazi burning of books by Jewish authors in 1933.

BOOKS, PROHIBITED. The Mishnah lists those who "have no share in the world to come" (San. 10.1), among whom, R. 'Aqiva' adds, is "he that reads the external books" (probably a reference to noncanonical books; see APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA). Rabbinic literature seems, therefore, to prohibit the reading of certain books. The only book that can be positively identified as banned in the Talmudic discussion in Sanhedrin 100b is the Wisdom of Ben Sira, although the Talmud itself quotes from it extensively on various occasions. There is, therefore, reason to believe that the prohibition is only against public and not private reading of such books. Another case of rabbinical prohibition concerned the book of "Hamiros" (sometimes identified with Homer), mentioned as a forbidden book in the Talmud Yerushalmi, Sanhedrin 10.28. This work, however, is regarded by R. 'Aqiva' as permitted, "as though one were reading an epistle."

There is no equivalent in Judaism to the Index expurgatorius of the Roman Catholic church, although certain heretical books are popularly referred to as treif pasul (Yiddish vernacular, "unfit and invalid"). In the Middle Ages, fierce controversy raged around rabbinical attempts to ban philosophical works, especially those of Maimonides, at least to readers under the age of twenty-five (see MAIMONIDEAN CONTROVERSY). BRAZEN SEA, an immense, molten-bronze water receptacle that stood in the courtyard of Solomon's Temple (1 Kgs. 7.23–26; 2 Chr. 4.2–5). It is said to have been ten cubits in diameter, five cubits deep, and thirty cubits in circumference. It was supported by twelve bronze oxen and featured elaborate floral ornamentation. According to Exodus 30.17–21, priests were required to wash their hands and feet before entering the sacred precincts to perform their cultic duties; the Brazen Sea in the Temple was the successor to the much simpler laver in the Tabernacle. Still, its size indicates that it may also have been symbolic. In ancient Near Eastern tradition, the Temple was often thought of as a microcosm or cosmic center; the Brazen Sea would thus represent the actual waters of the seas. The Brazen Sea is reported to have been lowered to floor level by Ahaz (2 Kgs. 16.17) and later smashed and carried off to Babylon (2 Kgs. 25.13). The magnificent Brazen Sea of Solomonic times was replaced by a kiyyor (laver), a private immersion chamber for the priest, and a functioning outer miqveh* in the Second Temple.

BREACH OF TRUST. The only biblical laws relating to breach of trust refer to a bailee, one who holds property in trust (see SHOMERIM). As in the case of a guardian who must, if suspect, take an oath to the effect that "he has not put his hand to his neighbor's goods" (Ex. 22.10), others, such as a partner at the dissolution of joint interests who is suspected of wrongdoing by another partner or a middleman suspected by a principal party, are obligated to take the same oath. An exception is the testamentary guardian, who cannot be compelled to swear on mere suspicion but must, however, render full account. If a bailee falsely denies possession of the bailment and his deceit is proved, he is rendered untrustworthy and consequently debarred from taking an oath or acting as a witness.

BREAD (Heb. lehem). The Semitic word from which lehem is derived originally referred to the main element of a meal. In Hebrew civilization this came to mean bread; namely, a baked dough prepared from one of the five species of grain (wheat, barley, rye, oats, and spelt). The blessing over bread ("Blessed are you . . . who brings forth bread from the earth"; see BIRKAT HA-MOTS'!) is considered adequate for the whole meal, and no separate benedictions* have to be recited over individual foods. Hands should be ritually washed before partaking of bread, and the full Birkat ha-Mazon* is recited only when bread has been eaten. A portion of the dough (hallah*) when baking bread was formerly given to the priests, and twelve loaves of bread were kept on a golden table in the inner sanctuary of the Temple (see SHOW-BREAD). During the festival of Pesah*, the eating of regular leavened bread is forbidden, and only unleavened bread (matsah*) is permitted. The manna* was welcomed as "bread from heaven" (Ex. 16.4), and on the Sabbath two loaves are placed on the table in remembrance of the double portion of manna gathered in the wilderness on Sabbath eves. According to the Talmud (Ber. 50b), bread must be handled with respect and not thrown from one person to another. Some considered bread sprinkled with salt as the food of the poor (Ber. 2b), while others regarded the combination as efficacious in repelling evil spirits.

BREAKING OF THE VESSELS (Heb. shevirat ha-kelim), the fracturing of the vessels or channels into which the powerful divine light was pouring during the process of creation. This primordial catastrophe occupies a central position in the creation myth formulated by R. Yitsḥaq Luria*, though most of his disciples, especially R. Ḥayyim Vital (see VITAL FAMILY), almost completely concealed it because of the audacity of its theological implications. The doctrine is nevertheless disclosed in the writings of R. Yosef ibn Tabul. Occurring before the universe came into existence, this catastrophe affected the sefirot*, which constitute the divine pleroma. Luria used and transformed concepts developed by earlier kabbalists, including Mosheh ben Ya'aqov Cordovero*, the leading kabbalist in Safed before him, in describing this breaking of the vessels and the consequent falling and scattering of sparks of the divine light. Lurianic myth describes every subsequent crisis, such as the sin of Adam or the golden calf, as a repetition of the primordial shevirah.

BRESLAU RABBINICAL SEMINARY, institution in Breslau for the training of rabbis; the first modern seminary in central Europe, known as the Jüdische-Theologische Seminar, it was founded with a bequest from a local philanthropist, Jonas Fränkel, who wished it to be headed by Abraham Geiger* (who conceived the project). However, Geiger was judged too liberal by Fränkel's executors, who appointed Zacharias Frankel* as president of the institution that opened in 1854 with a number of noted scholars (including Heinrich Graetz*) on its faculty. Initially, the seminary included departments for rabbinic students, teacher training, and high school students; however, the latter two departments were closed in 1867 and 1887, respectively. Teacher training was resumed in the 1920s. The seminary promulgated the teaching of "positive, historical Judaism," which meant that while its instruction was basically Orthodox, the critical study of sources was permitted. Its rabbis served congregations (some of them Reform) in Europe and the United States. On Kristallnacht, 9 November 1938, the seminary and most of its impressive library were destroyed; teaching ceased early in 1939.

BREUER FAMILY, leaders of German Orthodoxy in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Salomon Breuer (1850–1926), leader of the separatists in German *Neo-Orthodoxy. Born in Nitra, Slovakia, he received both a traditional education at the yeshivah in Pressburg and a university education before assuming the rabbinate of Pápa, Hungary. From 1888, when he succeeded his father-in-law, Samson Raphael *Hirsch, as rabbi of the Frankfurt *Austrittsgemeinde, Breuer displayed unrelenting hostility toward communal Orthodox and Zionist endeavors and was a cofounder of the *Agudat Israel movement. He also established an important Lithuanian-style yeshivah in Frankfurt.

Isaac Breuer (1883–1946), son of Salomon Breuer, a practicing lawyer, and one of the *Agudat Israel's leading spokesmen and ideologists from 1912. Breuer, however, gradually modified his anti-Zionist sentiments after the Balfour Declaration of 1917 and after his departure from Nazi Germany in 1936. As head of the breakaway Po'alei Agudat Yisra'el (Ultra-Orthodox Labor) movement in British-ruled Palestine, he criticized traditional Agudist attitudes and spoke for the establishment of an independent Jewish state in which all parties would endeavor to cooperate under the rule of the Torah. His major works include Messiasspuren (1918), and Das jüdische Nationalheim (1925).

BRIBERY (Heb. shohad), the conveyance of a gift in order to influence judgment; prohibited in Exodus 23.8 and Deuteronomy 16.19. Whereas culpability extends to the person who offers the bribe and to the person who accepts it, the Bible directs its remarks primarily to judges. The rabbis considered all forms of gift taking by a judge as impairing his impartiality, even if the bribe was offered with a view to condemning the guilty or vindicating the innocent (Ket. 105a). The slightest courtesy or favor received often provided grounds for the self-disqualification of the judge. Bribery is mentioned as one of the twelve crimes that evoke the curse of heaven (Dt. 27.25). The strictness of the laws concerning bribery led in very early times, when a judge received no fixed stipend, to the practice of his receiving an equal fee from both parties. In order, however, to ensure the freedom and integrity of the judicial authority, it gradually became the custom for communities to pay a judge's stipend from communal funds.

BROKERAGE, the function of an intermediary in any legal transaction. In Jewish law, the broker is considered an agent, but since he is paid for his services, he is liable for loss, theft, or any personal negligence, as is the paid bailee. In disputes concerning the broker's activities, he may clear himself by oath if there are no witnesses and he insists that he was authorized to accept the terms realized. The marriage broker (shaddekhan), who acts as a go-between in arranging marriages, is also classed as a broker and is legally entitled to remuneration.

BRUNA, YISRA'EL (c.1400–1480), rabbinic scholar, communal leader, and legal authority. He studied with R. Yisra'el Isserlein and with R. Ya'aqov Weil. Many issues concerning the prerogatives and parameters of the nascent professional rabbinate in Ashkenaz surfaced during his career. In his first post in his native Brno, he had to endure the competition of a later arrival. When he went to Regensburg, where he opened a yeshivah, he was vigorously attacked by another academy head. With the death of this rival, he was acknowledged as the leader of the community, and with the deaths of Isserlein and Weil, he was recognized as the leading halakhic authority in Germany.

Bruna was imprisoned by the authorities on at least two occasions: in 1456, to spur the collection of a coronation tax imposed by Frederick III; and in 1474, as the result of a spurious blood libel charge brought by an apostate. Frederick III, among others, was instrumental in securing his release. A collection of Bruna's responsa has survived (Salonika, 1788).

BUBER, MARTIN (1878–1965), religious philosopher. Born in Vienna, but raised in Lemberg, the capital of the Austrian crownland of Galicia, he received a traditional Jewish education in conjunction with secular studies. Although he had abandoned religious observance already in his teens, he maintained an active interest in the classical texts of Judaism, especially scripture, and in Hasidism. He became a renowned interpreter of both of these expressions, as he put it, of Israel's dialogue with God. He took from Hasidism the concept of personal piety as the essence of Judaism, but selectively rejected those aspects which he felt had no place in true religiosity. His presentation of Hasidism in a series of works recounting Hasidic anecdotes and parables (including The Legend of the Baal Shem [1955]; The Tales of Rabbi Nachman [1956]; and Tales of the Hasidim, 2 vols. [1947–1948]), and his adaptation of its ideas to Western thought (see NEO-HASIDISM) brought this east European movement to the Western world. Buber joined the Zionist movement soon after it was founded by Theodor Herzl, with whom he worked closely. They eventually parted ways when Buber endorsed the view that the movement's primary task was not attainment of Jewish political power but rather the promotion of Jewish cultural renewal. Henceforth, he found himself in a minority position on most issues facing the movement (e.g., the Arab question), to which he remained loyal until his death in Jerusalem, where he settled in 1938.

Buber's religious thought gained its most mature expression in I and Thou (Ich und Du, 1923; Eng. I and Thou [New York, 1970]). At the heart of his teachings is the concept of dialogue, which posits that God, the "Eternal Thou," addresses the individual through the varied experiences of life (from the seemingly ephemeral and trivial to the grand and momentous). These demand from the individual a dialogical response, or a confirmation of the Thou, the unique presence of the other who stands before one. In responding to the other as Thou, the self, or I, in turn, finds his or her own presence confirmed in turn. As a response to the continuously renewing presence and address of the other, dialogue must be born ever anew. The I-Thou response thus requires spontaneity and cannot be determined by fixed expressions, gestures and formulations. It also follows that God's address, refracted or revealed as it is through the other, is also spontaneous. Accordingly, authentic divine service to God is grounded in spontaneous responses to God who continuously turns to one in the eternal flux of life. The conclusion Buber drew was that formal prayer and ritual were not the preeminent expressions of religious devotion. This view, he acknowledged, placed him in an anomalous position within Jewish religious thought. Yet, he insisted, as a community of faith Judaism is ultimately distinguished by its witness to the dialogical principle, which informs its central myths and sacred texts. As a Zionist, he held that Jewish religious life in the Diaspora had been falsely constricted to the synagogue and the home, and had thus lost hold of dialogue as the founding moment of Judaism. By restoring to the Jews the sociological conditions of a full communal life, Zionism would allow for the possibility that the Jews' public life, guided once again by the principle of dialogue, would become a realm of relation to divinity. The reappropriation of the public sphere as the "dialogical" responsibility of the community of faith, Buber taught, is in consonance with the supreme injunction of the prophets, and thus constitutes the renewal of what he called Hebrew, or biblical, humanism. Buber also applied the concept of dialogue to the Jewish-Christian relationship, holding that both Judaism and Christianity were authentic paths to God. Together with Franz Rosenzweig, he pioneered the major shift in focus in the Jewish-Christian relationship that developed after World War II. Also with Rosenzweig he translated the Bible into German, a version which sought to capture the meanings and rhythms of the original Hebrew. Among Buber's other books were The Kingship of God (1967), Moses (1946), The Knowledge of Man (1965), and Israel and the World (1963).

BÜCHLER, ADOLF (1867–1939), historian and theologian. Born in Hungary, he graduated from the Budapest Rabbinical Seminary in 1891 and became professor of Talmud and history at the Israelitisch-Theologische Lehranstalt in Vienna in 1893. From 1906 until his death, he was principal of Jews' College in London. Büchler wrote widely on such topics as Bible, Talmud, Midrash, and archaeology. He is best known for his work on the Second Temple period. Especially noteworthy was his study Das Synedrium in Jerusalem und das grosse Beth-din in der Quaderkammer des jerusalemischen Tempels (1902), which analyzed the existence of an institution responsible for overseeing Jewish religious life—ha-Beit Din ha-Gadol—distinct from the Sanhedrin.

BUDAPEST RABBINICAL SEMINARY, a school for the training of rabbis that opened in 1877. In 1864 the Hungarian authorities had asked three rabbis to draw up plans for such a seminary, but the Orthodox rabbis of Hungary—who fought all innovations and reforms—opposed the proposal, which was supported by the Neologists and Status Quo Ante elements. However, an Orthodox petition to the emperor in 1877 to postpone the opening of the seminary was turned down, and the seminary commenced its activities under its rector R. Moses Bloch. Shortly after the seminary opened, Emperor Francis Joseph I visited, and in 1917 the school was renamed the Francis Joseph National Rabbinical Seminary (later the National Rabbinical Seminary). Many distinguished scholars have served on its faculty, including rectors Wilhelm Bacher and Ludwig Blau. Like the Breslau Rabbinical Seminary, instruction at the Budapest seminary was Orthodox, but the critical study of sources was permitted. Classes were suspended in October 1944, and the Hungarian Nazis occupied the building. Much of the three-hundred-thousand-volume library was destroyed. Teaching resumed in March 1945, and the seminary's postwar rectors have been David Samuel Löwinger, Alexander Schreiber, and Joseph Schweitzer. Since World War II, the Budapest Rabbinical Seminary has been the only rabbinical seminary in eastern Europe.

BURGLARY (Heb. maḥteret). According to the Bible, a thief found breaking into a home may be killed by the owner (Ex. 22.1). It is assumed (San. 62a) that the burglar, knowing that every man will do his utmost to defend his property, is prepared to kill if necessary. The owner may therefore anticipate the burglar and act first in self-defense. The Bible adds (Ex. 22.2), "If the sun be risen upon him there shall be bloodguilt for him," which is understood to mean that should it be clear that the thief has not come with the intention to kill but is nevertheless killed, the killer is guilty of a capital crime. BURIAL. The only method of disposing of the dead, according to traditional Jewish law, is by placing the body of the deceased in the earth or in a sepulcher. *Cremation is therefore prohibited, but it is permitted by Reform Judaism. This practice of burying the dead is based on Deuteronomy 21.23, which enjoins the decent disposal of the body of the publicly hanged criminal by burial on the selfsame day. Because even a convicted felon must receive an honorable burial, it follows that to be denied burial is the greatest humiliation that can be inflicted upon the deceased. The reverence attached to burial is an outstanding feature of Jewish practice. Respect for the dead is the guiding principle of Jewish funeral and burial practices. The task of ensuring a proper burial is regarded as one of the greatest acts of benevolence, and the prohibition against deriving any benefit from the dead has resulted in the custom of responsibility for burial being assumed by the communal organization known as the hevrah qaddisha'* (holy society). In North America, it is common for the burial society to work in cooperation with a commercial funeral home. According to Jewish law, burial must take place as soon as possible. Funeral (levayah) and burial do not take place on the Sabbath or festivals because of the prohibitions against work. However, because of the honor of the deceased, burial may take place on the second day of a festival. The body is ritually washed (tohorah*) and wrapped in a simple shroud (the practice of tohorah is not generally observed by Reform Jews). In Western countries, as in biblical times (Gn. 50.26), a coffin generally is used; however, in Eastern countries and the State of Israel, a coffin is dispensed with. Burial customs vary from country to country, but in general they are characterized by the utmost simplicity. The body is borne to the grave on a bier and interred with a brief *funeral service. Exhumation is forbidden except for reinterment in a family grave or in Erets Yisra'el. Jews of priestly descent (kohanim) are forbidden to contaminate themselves by contact with the dead or by too close proximity (4 cubits, approximately 6 feet) to a grave, except when they are mourners, that is, the deceased is a parent, sibling, spouse, or child. Kohanim are therefore usually buried at the end of a row or in the front row to enable their relatives who are kohanim to visit the grave. Attendance at a funeral is regarded as an act of particular piety and part of the fulfillment of the commandment to comfort the mourners. At the conclusion of burial, those present form two rows, and the mourners pass between them and are offered condolence with the words Ha-Maqom yenaḥem ethem betokh she'ar avelei Tsiyyon vi-Yerushalayim, "May God comfort you among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem." It is from this moment that official *mourning commences. See also SHIV'AH.

BURNING BUSH, the thorn bush, possibly a wild acacia shrub, from which God spoke to Moses in the wilderness and called him to his prophetic mission (Ex. 3.1–10). The divine appearance was in the form of a flame of fire, but though "the bush burned with fire . . . the bush was not consumed." The burning bush has often been interpreted, in homiletics and in art, as a symbol of Israel.

BURNT OFFERING (Heb. 'olah), one type of animal *sacrifices in ancient times. The distinguishing feature of the 'olah is that all of the animal's flesh is consumed on the altar; no part (other than the hide) is left for the consumption or use of the priest or the worshiper (Lv. 1). This is expressed in its name, 'olah (that which goes up [in smoke]), and its alternative name kalil (entire); its traditional English name is holocaust. It is the most profound expression of the worshiper's desire to present a gift to God, in recognition, reverence, homage, thanks, or for expiation. Its versatility can be seen in the fact that the Bible does not specify when an individual might choose to sacrifice a voluntary burnt offering. It was required, however, in the consecration of the priests (Ex. 29.15), the purification of the leper (Lv. 15.15, 30), the purification following childbirth (Lv. 12.6–8), and by the Nazirite at the conclusion of his vow (Nm. 6.11ff.). The rabbis also held that it was required in order to atone for failure to observe performative commands. Three types of burnt offerings were acceptable: a bull from the herd, a sheep or a goat from the flock, or a fowl. In the public sacrificial system, the tamid (daily morning and evening sacrifices; see PERPETUAL OFFERING) and the musaf (additional sacrifices on Sabbaths, Ro'sh Hodesh, and festivals) were all burnt offerings (Ex. 29.38–42; Nm. 28–29) from the herd or flock.

BUZAGLO, SHALOM (c.1700–1780), rabbi and kabbalist. He was born in Marrakesh and brought up in southern Morocco, which was then a kabbalistic center. He fled persecution by the sultan and settled in London, where he wrote his major kabbalistic works Hadrat Melekh and Miqdash Melekh, a commentary on the Zohar (Amsterdam and London, 1750–1755). He strove to rec-oncile Mosheh ben Ya'aqov Cordovero's kabbalistic system with doctrines of the Lurianic school, as did many contemporary kabbalists. In addition to his literary activities, Buzaglo served as a judge on the Ashkenazi rabbinical court (beit din) of London.

BYZANTINE RITE, the prayer rite of the Jews of the eastern Roman empire, akin in some respects to the Italian rite. The Byzantine rite contains many special poems (piyyutim, seliḥot, etc.) added to the regular prayers. It was contained in the Maḥazor Romaniyyah, which was printed a number of times in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries but was eventually superseded in Turkey and the Balkans by the Sephardi rite. Since the eighteenth century the Byzantine rite has survived only in Corfu and Kaffa in the Crimea.

CAIN AND ABEL (Heb. Qayin and Hevel), oldest sons of *Adam and *Eve, born after the banishment from the garden of Eden. Cain was a tiller of the soil, and Abel, the younger of the two, was a shepherd. When each made an offering to the Lord—Abel from the firstlings of the flock and Cain from the fruits of the soil—only that of Abel was accepted. Cain, in frustration and jealousy, then killed his brother, for which he was doubly cursed: the ground would no longer yield to him its produce, and he was condemned to be a ceaseless wanderer on earth. God, however, provided him with a bodily mark that would serve to protect him against all future murderers. He eventually settled in the land of Nod, married, and had a child, Enoch (Gn. 4). According to rabbinic legend, he was accidentally killed by his descendant Lamech (Tanḥuma' Be-Re'shit, Vienna ed., 6b).

CALEB (Heb. Kalev), one of the twelve spies sent by Moses to scout out the land of Canaan prior to the Israelite invasion (Nm. 13.1–20). Only Caleb, the representative of the tribe of Judah, and Joshua, from the tribe of Ephraim, favored the immediate conquest, whereas the other ten spies demurred. As a result, the Israelites refused to engage in the attack and were condemned not to enter Israel but to wander for forty years in the wilderness. From that generation, only Caleb, Joshua, and those Israelites who were under the age of twenty finally entered the Promised Land (Nm. 14). As a reward for his faithfulness, Caleb was granted by Joshua the city of Hebron (Jos. 14.6–14), and Caleb dispossessed the giants who lived there (Jos. 15.13–14). He promised his daughter Achsah in marriage to whomever would capture the city of Debir, a feat accomplished by Othniel, son of Kenaz (Jos. 15.17; Jgs. 1.12–13).

CALENDAR. The Jewish calendar, though complicated, is so accurate that, unlike the Julian and Gregorian calendars, it has never had to be adjusted.

The Lunisolar Calendar. Until *Hillel II instituted a permanent calendar based on astronomical calculations (in 358), the fixing of *Ro'sh Ḥodesh (the new moon) was determined by observation and the evidence of witnesses. Earlier, the practice of adding a second day to festivals (except for Yom Kippur) was introduced for communities lying at a distance from Erets Yisra'el, because they would not know in time on precisely which of two days the appearance of the new moon had been officially confirmed by the authorities in Jerusalem, and this could lead to confusion regarding the exact date of a festival occurring during that month. The length of the lunar month was established by the rabbis as twenty-nine days, twelve hours, and 793 parts (thousandths). Ignoring the fraction, twelve lunar months in this system comprise 354 days. Since the solar year consists of 365 days (again ignoring the fractions), it was therefore necessary to make provision for a discrepancy of eleven days per year. This was achieved by intercalating seven leap months (Adar II) over the course of a nineteen-year cycle. The third, sixth, eighth, eleventh, fourteenth, seventeenth, and nineteenth years are designated leap years and contain thirteen months (the year 5749 [=1988–1989], for instance, began such a cycle). Adjustments are made to provide for the fractions, and a completely recurrent cycle occurs every 371 years. With regard to the lunar months, the twelve extra hours accumulated over each month are provided for by making some months “defective,” that is twenty-nine days long, and others “full,” consisting of thirty days. Ideally Nisan, Sivan, Av, Tishrei, Kislev, and Shevat have thirty days, and Iyyar, Tammuz, Elul, Ḥeshvan, Tevet, and Adar have twenty-nine (that is, a strict alternation of full and defective months). However, because of necessary adjustments, this regular alternation is not strictly followed, though no year may have less than five or more than seven “full” months. In a leap year, Adar I has thirty days and Adar II has twenty-nine. In the case of a “full” month, both the thirtieth day of that month and the first of the next are celebrated as Ro'sh Ḥodesh, since the second half of the thirtieth day actually belongs to the new moon. In the case of *Ro'sh ha-Shanah, the only festival of the Jewish calendar to occur on the first of the month, it proved impracticable to rely on the observation of the new moon of Tishrei, as the information would have arrived too late to notify all the various communities of the advent of the New Year. Therefore both the first day of Tishrei and the thirtieth day of the previous month, Elul, were regarded as the New Year; of all the biblical festivals, Ro'sh ha-Shanah alone is observed for two days, even in Erets Yisra'el. (There was, however, a period during the Middle Ages when Ro'sh ha-Shanah was observed for one day only in Erets Yisra'el). Elul is always defective, with the result that the two days of Ro'sh ha-Shanah (1 and 2 Tishrei) are traditionally regarded as “one long day.” The accepted names of the months are of Babylonian origin. Before the Babylonian exile, they had other names or were merely identified by their numerical order. The first month was Nisan, but the religious year began in Tishrei. The rabbis were greatly concerned with establishing the precise moment between twilight and complete darkness, when one day ends and the next begins, in order to determine the commencement, and more particularly the conclusion, of Sabbaths and festivals. Nightfall was designated as that moment when three stars of the second magnitude become visible, estimated as the moment when the sun is seven degrees below the horizon. The Jewish calendar is reckoned from the date of Creation, which, on the basis of other biblical dates, is placed at 3760 BCE. To calculate Jewish dates one first deducts 1240 from the Common Era date and then adds 5000 (for dates falling between Ro'sh ha-Shanah and 31 December, one adds another year); thus 2000 CE corresponds to the Jewish year 5760–5761. Various sectarian groups had calendars that differed from that determined by the rabbis. These included the Samaritans, the Sadducees, and the Dead Sea sect. These calendars created friction when festivals were observed on different dates. See also DAY AND NIGHT; entries for individual months.

Sectarian Calendars. Jewish sectarian groups have calculated months and holidays by non-normative systems. Two non-canonical books of the late Second Temple period, Enoch and Jubilees, refer to a 364-day solar calendar. The year comprises twelve months of thirty days each, two solstice days and two equinox days. There are indications that the Dead Sea sect adopted this calendar. Intercalations in a six-year cycle may have been used to keep the calendar synchronous with the 365-1/4-day solar year. According to the Bible, the 'omer is to be offered on the "morrow of the Sabbath." For the normative calendar, this is interpreted as the second day of Pesah. Those who advocate the solar calendar take the "morrow of the Sabbath" to mean Sunday, as do the Boethusians and Samaritans. The Samaritan calendar fixes the first day of the month by the conjunction of the moon with the sun, not by the new moon. Months are numbered rather than named. Leap years occur seven times in nineteen years, but months are not intercalated at set intervals. Jews of the Diaspora did not always comply with calendrical rulings. In Syrian Antioch from 328–342, Pesah was celebrated in March, with no regard to rabbinical dicta. Nor did sects in Erets Yisra'el always follow the standard calendar without variation. In the eighth century, the Karaites, following Muslim practice, returned to direct observation of the new moon. Eleven centuries later, after much controversy, it was decided, at least among Crimean Karaites, that mathematical calculation, like for the Rabbanite calendar, would supplement observation. Although the Beta Israel consider Enoch and Jubilees sacred, their calendar is lunisolar with a leap year every fourth year.

CANAAN, LAND OF. The name Kinakhnum (Canaanites) appears for the first time in an Akkadian document from the archives of the kingdom of Mari (19th–18th cent. BCE). The Canaanites are frequently mentioned in Akkadian, Ugaritic, and Egyptian documents from the fifteenth through the thirteenth century BCE, when the name Canaan was applied to the land west of the Euphrates up to the Mediterranean. This definition is supported by a proposed etymology of the name Canaan from the West Semitic root k n ' (bow down). Thus, Canaan is the land where the sun bows down, that is, sets in the evening, or the West Land.

A more precise definition for Canaan is suggested by other documents, beginning with the fourteenth century BCE. A letter from a Babylonian king to the pharaoh, found in the archives of the Egyptian foreign office at Tell al-'Amarna, states: "Canaan is your land and its kings are your servants." From here it appears that the name Canaan was applied to the Egyptian realm in Asia, which expanded or shrank according to political developments in the ancient Near East.

According to Numbers 34.1–12, the borders of Canaan stretched from Wadi el-'Arish to Mount Hor to Hama to the area northeast of Damascus on the fringes of the Syrian Desert. This description, however, most likely reflects the Egyptian province of Canaan of the thirteenth century BCE.

In the Bible, the name Canaan became a designation for Erets Yisra'el, and its non-Israelite population (except for the Philistines) were generally called Canaanites. At times, the Bible differentiated between the Canaanites, who inhabited the coastal plain and the valleys, and the Amorites, who inhabited the highland (cf. Nm. 13. 29). In the tenth century BCE, the era of the united monarchy of Israel, the names Canaan and Canaanites were confined to the Phoenicians, who lived on the coast of the Mediterranean, stretching from Mount Carmel northward. Since the Phoenicians were occupied in international commerce, the word Canaanite became synonymous with merchant (cf. Is. 23.8: "Who was it that planned this for crown-wearing Tyre, whose merchants are nobles, whose traders [lit. Canaanites] the world honored?"). From here, too, was derived the word kin'ah, meaning merchandise (Jer. 10.17).

The Phoenicians themselves never used the names Canaan or Canaanites, since the political fragmentation of Phoenicia prevented the emergence of a national identity; these names were used only by foreigners. A rare exception is a bilingual coin from Laodicea on the northern Syrian coast that states in Phoenician: "Laodicea which is in Canaan." The Punic inhabitants of North Africa in the fourth century CE, aware of their heritage, still called themselves Chananai, that is, Canaanites. The Bible equates Canaanite cultic practices with idolatry and immorality and warns the people, on pain of dire punishment, against "walking in their ways" and intermarrying with them. After the Israelites settled in the land of Canaan and adapted to a sedentary agricultural way of life with its concomitant fertility and Baal cults, these prohibitions were often ignored, and it was only after a long struggle, waged mainly by the prophets, that the Israelite religious culture prevailed.

CANAANITES, name given by the Bible to the original inhabitants of the land of Canaan prior to the Israelite conquest under *Joshua. In biblical tradition, the Canaanites are believed to have descended from Canaan, youngest son of Ham, one of the three sons of Noah (Gn. 9.14, 10.6). They include several peoples or tribes, but always numbered among them were the Canaanites proper, Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, Jebusites, and Hivites. Sometimes Girgashites are listed; occasionally other tribes, such as Sidonites, Hamathites, Refaim, and Kenites are named as well. Noah cursed Canaan for the depravity of Ham his father (Gn. 9.24–25), destining him to be subjugated by Shem—thereby foretelling the eventual displacement of the Canaanites by the Israelites (descended from Shem), consistently justified by the Bible as the inevitable outcome of the sexual licentiousness practiced by the Canaanites (Gn. 15.16, 18.4–9, 19.31–38, 20.1–12; esp. Lv. 18.24–30, 20.22–24). Though the Bible may have exaggerated the extent, Canaanite sexual practices were, in fact, less strictly controlled than Israelite sexual practices.

While the patriarchs lived as nomadic sojourners among the Canaanites, at the time of the *Exodus from Egypt, the Israelites were told that under God's leadership and with his assistance they would succeed in effortlessly taking over the Canaanites' land (Ex. 3.8, 3.17, 23.20–33), so long as they refrained from any contact with Canaanite gods, eradicated all traces of their forms of worship (Ex. 23.24–25), shunned all sexual and marital intermingling with them (Ex. 34.11–16), and avoided the temptation to grant them reprieve from the divine edict of expulsion (Ex. 23.27–33; Dt. 7.2). The aversion to intermarrying with the Canaanites is alluded to in the stories of the patriarchs (Gn. 24.3, 28.6).

Elsewhere God charges the Israelites themselves with the task of dispossessing the Canaanites (Nm. 33.50–56), threatening dire consequences if they fail to do so, and in Deuteronomy it is made clear that the conquest is to be a war of annihilation of the local peoples (Dt. 7.1–26, 20.16–18). Deuteronomy 12.29–31, as well as certain prophetic books (e.g., Hos. 1–3), expresses a particular abhorrence for Canaanite religious practices; Canaanite paganism, in which the gods El and Baal and the goddess Asherah figured prominently, is held by many scholars to have been a fertility cult, in which sexual practices were central, though recently this assumption has been questioned.

CANDLES. In Jewish tradition the lighting of candles (formerly oil lamps) is characteristic of occasions both of joy and sorrow. As a symbol of joy it is an essential feature of the festive board on Sabbaths and holidays. The custom of lighting candles was instituted by the *Pharisees during the time of the Second Temple. The lighting of two Sabbath candles (because of the two versions of the Decalogue that speak of "remembering" and "observing" the Sabbath day), together with the recitation of the appropriate blessing, is the prerogative of the mistress of the household (Shab. 2.6–7). A Talmudic legend relates that the angels who accompany a man from the synagogue on the Sabbath eve bless his home as soon as they see the lighted candles. Among Ashkenazim, a special braided candle is lit in the *Havdalah service at the end of the Sabbath. The kindling of lights is the core of the Hanukkah festival, while a lighted candle is used on Pesah eve in the search for hamets (leaven). In some communities the parents of the bride and groom hold lighted candles at the marriage ceremony. The verse "the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord" (Prov. 20.27) is considered the origin of the use of candles in *mourning rites. Candles are kindled and placed at the head of the deceased; they are also lit during the week of mourning, on the anniversary of the death, and on the eve of Yom Kippur. The candles may not be made of tallow, which is a nonkosher fat. See also LIGHT; MEMORIAL LIGHT; MENORAH.

CANTOR (Heb. hazzan). The ritual of the Temple service was presided over by a priest (kohen) and Levitical choir(s). The notion of a single individual leading communal worship is related to the evolution of the synagogue after the destruction of the Temple. The earliest references (in the Talmud Yerushalmi) to a prayer leader use the term sheliaḥ tsibbur* (representative of the community). At first, there was no need for a professional rendering of the liturgy; the congregation could be led by any knowledgeable member. The term hazzan originally denoted a community official carrying out a variety of nonmusical functions. The necessity for special expertise arose in the geonic period because of the decline of Hebrew and the incorporation into the service of piyyutim, many of which were expected to be extemporaneously improvised by the cantor. An exclusive caste of hazzanim emerged as the position was handed down from father to son.

The cantor's status varied with the times. The qualifications for office were many (cf. Ta'an. 16a): the hazzan had to be of mature age, preferably married and with children, well versed in scripture and liturgy, and a respected and religiously observant member of the community with a pleasant voice and appearance. In many communities it was customary to limit the cantor's salary, so that his prayers on behalf of the congregation, particularly those for physical and economic sustenance, would be especially fervent. In the course of time, emphasis was laid almost exclusively on vocal quality, and complaints were frequently leveled by rabbis against the shortcomings of those cantors whose fervor was of a histrionic rather than a religious nature.

The first use of the term cantor came in conjunction with the synagogue reforms of the nineteenth century. Using the model of J. S. Bach, the famed eighteenth-century Kantor of Leipzig, German synagogues eliminated traditional synagogue nussah and expected their cantors to function more as choral directors and composers than as soloists. Salomon *Sulzer of Vienna was the first to combine classical Western musical training with a strong grounding in synagogue music. He and those who followed him endeavored to raise the artistic standards of synagogue music and of the cantorate. Formal schools to train cantors were established in Germany and have also existed in the United States since 1948.

Some congregations have restricted or even eliminated the musical role of the cantor in favor of greater congregational participation. This is especially common among smaller congregations, who continue to depend upon the sheliaḥ tsibbur for their routine musical needs. Just as frequently, though, the modern cantor, like the hazzan of old, serves a variety of synagogue and community functions. He, or in recent years she (except among Orthodox congregations), performs pastoral and educational as well as musical roles.

CANTORIAL MUSIC (Heb. hazzanut) today refers to the body of music used in the ritual recitation of liturgical texts by a specially trained precentor (hazzan; see CANTOR). Its roots go back to the music of the ancient Temple, where Levitical choirs chanted antiphonal and responsorial songs. The first use of the term (in Hebrew) was a pejorative ninth-century reference to the practice of adding elaborately sung religious poetry (piyyutim) to the worship service. The rendering of these liturgical poems became increasingly popular during the Middle Ages, requiring the talents of an expert soloist; as the expectation grew that the singer himself would extemporaneously compose new piyyutim, the task became reserved for a specially trained cadre of performers, hazzanim. Some piyyutim had specific melodies composed for them (or compiled from other sources, including older piyyutim whose texts had fallen out of favor), but it also fell to the hazzan to chant other sections of the service utilizing a system of nussah*. The hazzan rendered a text, ordinarily combining fixed series of musical motives with passages freely improvised within the parameters of a particular scale. In this era, long before published prayer books, cantorial music helped worshipers and hazzanim alike recall the proper texts, and the chanting of liturgical passages according to their accepted melodies became obligatory. A variety of these musical traditions evolved among separate Ashkenazi, Sephardi, and 'Adot ha-Mizrah communities, all containing specific themes that help to identify the section of the service being chanted and even the specific occasion on which the prayers are being offered. In the Sephardi and 'Adot ha-Mizrah communities, quasi-liturgical hymns associated with holiday and life-cycle celebrations were also included in the body of traditional cantorial music and were generally sung in a similar (if somewhat more elaborate) manner. Notwithstanding the level of musical interest generated by these complex systems, cantorial music always took its cues from the text, which remained of primary importance.

Since the nineteenth century, some Ashkenazi communities, influenced by the Western culture surrounding them, have rejected the limiting assumptions associated with traditional cantorial music in favor of freer assimilation of external musical practices. In particular, operatic conventions gave birth to the hazzanic recitative and a golden age of hazzanut, during which talented cantor-composers chanted their new brand of cantorial music both in the synagogue and on the concert stage, sometimes accompanied by a *choir. On the other hand, Reform synagogues replaced the Eastern-based idea of nussah with German hymn tunes sung in four-part harmony to *organ accompaniment. As the synagogue service has adapted to the needs of contemporary worshipers, congregational melodies, in some cases adhering to the traditional nussah, while in other cases ignoring it entirely, have again changed the face of cantorial music. CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. Although biblical law specifies the death penalty for various types of crime, this form of punishment was rarely carried out. Rabbinic interpretation of biblical law made it almost impossible to sentence a person to death: two witnesses to the crime were required to come forward, and the perpetrator had to be given specific warning about the gravity of the act and the punishment it carried prior to his actually committing the crime. Thus the death penalty came in time to be no more than an indication of the seriousness of a sin. Indeed, a court that over a period of seventy years condemned a single person to death was considered by some rabbis of the Talmud to be a "bloodthirsty" court (Mak. 1.10). The offenses for which biblical law ordered the death penalty were murder; adultery; incest; and certain other sexual sins; blasphemy; idolatry; desecration of the Sabbath; witchcraft; kidnapping; and striking or dishonoring one's parents. Bodies of those executed were publicly exhibited until nightfall (Dt. 21.22-23). Capital cases could be tried only by a beit din of at least twenty-three judges. Methods of execution were stoning, burning, slaying with a sword, and strangulation, depending upon the crime. Strangulation was the method of execution in all cases where the manner of capital punishment was not specifically described in the Bible (San. 52b, 89a). Hanging was not permitted as a method of execution, and the reference to hanging in Deuteronomy 21.22 is interpreted as meaning exposure after death, to be imposed in the case of idolaters and blasphemers. Stoning in biblical times consisted of the people throwing stones at the convicted person until death resulted (cf. Lv. 24.23), but according to later rabbinic interpretation, stoning should take the form of throwing the guilty person from an elevation. The rabbinic definition of burning (forcing a hot wick, later taken to mean molten metal [San. 7.2] down the throat of the condemned individual) also differs from what is ordinarily meant by the term, though the Sadducees disagreed with the Pharisees about this question. There is no record of the application of this method of execution. Long before the destruction of the Temple, Roman authorities denied the Sanhedrin the right to impose capital punishment on sinners. Rare cases of capital punishment decreed by Jewish courts, usually against informers, are mentioned, however, in the literature of the Middle Ages. In the State of Israel, capital punishment has been abolished except for the crimes of genocide and wartime treason (and has only been applied in the case of Adolf Eichmann).

CAPTIVES. The Bible makes no provision for the treatment of captives taken by Israelites, with the exception of the laws concerning the marriage of an Israelite and a captive woman (Dt. 21.10-14). The Talmud and other Jewish sources did, however, concern themselves with the very real problems facing Jews in captivity. The rabbis regarded captivity in foreign lands as worse than death or famine (B. B. 8b). Consequently the ransoming of captives was regarded as the most sacred duty a Jew could fulfill, taking precedence over all other forms of benevolence or charity (see RANSOM). One was permitted to use money originally collected for another cause in order to provide the necessary funds, and even a Torah scroll could be sold to raise money to ransom captives (tosafot on B. B. 8b). A woman taken into captivity by foreign soldiers took precedence over a man when it came to ransom, but she was, upon her release, barred from marrying into the priesthood; if she was the wife of a priest, she had to be divorced. The extreme lengths to which Jewish communities were willing to go in order to redeem their brethren forced up the ransom price of Jewish captives, and as a measure of self-protection, an enactment was promulgated forbidding the ransoming of a captive at a price higher than the normal value, except under exceptional circumstances (Git. 45a). Among the notable captives in Jewish history is *Mosheh ben Hanokh (10th cent.), who was taken by a Moorish pirate in the Mediterranean. Ransomed by the Cordova community, he later laid the foundations for the study of the Talmud in Spain. When R. *Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg (13th cent.) was imprisoned by Emperor Rudolf I and held for ransom in Alsace, he refused to allow his community to provide the necessary funds for his release, lest it encourage the authorities to blackmail other communities by imprisoning and holding their rabbis for ransom.

CARCASS (Heb. nevelah), the body of an animal that died other than by valid *ritual slaughter (sheḥitah) or as prey of a wild beast. A carcass may not be eaten but is to be given to a resident alien or sold to a non-Jew (Dt. 15.21; Pes. 21b). One who touches or eats a piece of carcass contracts ritual impurity (Lv. 11.39-40). These laws apply both to animals that are normally permitted as food and to those that are forbidden. A limb torn from a living animal (eiver min ha-ḥai*) is also considered a carcass.

CARDOSO FAMILY, a family of Spanish conversos.

Isaac Cardoso (1604-1683), physician and scholar. He was born in Portugal to a converso family that moved to Spain in order to ameliorate its living conditions. Cardoso was raised in Spain, educated at the universities of Salamanca and Valladolid, and for almost five decades lived as a nominal Christian. After a brilliant academic career at Valladolid, he moved to Madrid, where he gained access to its social and intellectual life and published several literary and scientific books. He eventually rose to court physician. In 1648, at the height of his fame, he suddenly left Spain for Italy together with his much younger brother, Avraham Miguel, probably out of fear of the Inquisition. Cardoso first settled in Venice as a professing Jew, where he wrote and published Philosophia libera (1673), his magnum opus. Later, he settled in Verona as physician of the ghetto. Like most of the former conversos he adopted the messianic enthusiasm of the Shabbatean movement. However, after *Shabbetai Tsevi converted to Islam, Isaac strongly disagreed with his brother, who fervently continued to support the movement and severed their relations. Cardoso defended Jews and Judaism in his famous work Las excelencias y calumnias de los Hebreos (Amsterdam, 1679), in which he refuted accusations against the Jews found in classical and contemporary literature, praising their merits and their contributions to the countries in which they resided.

Avraham Miguel Cardoso (1626–1706), Shabbatean leader; brother of Isaac. Born in Rio Secco, Spain, he studied theology and perhaps also medicine in a Spanish university. He escaped in 1648 to Venice, Italy, where he openly professed his Judaism. After several years in Leghorn and Cairo, he settled in Tripoli as the bey's physician. In 1655 he became a fervent follower of Shabbetai Tsevi, persisting in his belief even after the "Messiah's" apostasy. Cardoso became an active propagandist of the messianic movement, traveling between Italy, Tunis, Constantinople, Smyrna, Gallipoli, Adrianople, Chios, Crete, and Rodosto. In 1703 he tried to settle in Safed but was prevented from doing so by the spiritual leaders in the Holy Land. He was excommunicated in almost all of the communities in which he stayed and was eventually expelled from them. Finally, he reached Alexandria, where he was killed by his nephew during a family quarrel.

Although Cardoso headed a small Shabbatean sect, he was recognized and venerated by the believers as one of the three major leaders beside the "Messiah" and Nathan of Gaza. He vehemently opposed the apostates, except Shabbetai Tsevi, and railed against the attempts to apotheosize the "Messiah" and against the antinomian trends within the movement. He also attacked the Christian Trinity, regarding it as a distortion of the true secret of divinity. Toward the end of his days, Cardoso referred to himself as "Messiah ben Joseph," claiming his role was to reveal to the "Messiah ben David" (Shabbetai Tsevi) the secret of divinity, which had been forgotten during the course of the long galut (exile), the knowledge of which is a precondition for the redemption to come. For this purpose, Cardoso wrote more than sixty derushim (tractates), which were disseminated in many communities. His distinction between the "First Cause," accepted by all people in every age as the supreme divinity, and the God of Israel, who emanated from the "First Cause," does not indicate, according to Cardoso, any ontological dichotomy between them but rather the limited ability of the human intellect to apprehend the supreme phase of the divine. In fact, it is the God of Israel, the internal soul of the divinity, who is to be worshiped. His views reflect his Neoplatonic education, and his support of the metaphoric interpretative school of Lurianic Kabbalah was also inspired by his academic education.

CASPI, YOSEF BEN ABBA' MARI (1279–1340), southern French commentator and philosopher. Caspi wrote a commentary on Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed; commentaries on the Bible, stressing literal interpretations of the text; and books on Hebrew grammar. Some of his philosophical conclusions (such as arguing for the eternity of the universe) and his naturalistic explanations of biblical miracles were condemned as heretical by many rabbinical authorities. In a testament to his son, Caspi gives a program of studies for the young that reflects his intellectual universe. Alongside traditional Jewish learning, such as Bible and Talmud, his curriculum includes arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, ethics (especially the Mishnaic tractate Avot with Maimonides' commentaries), logic, theology, Aristotle's Metaphysics, and the Guide of Maimonides.

CASSUTO, UMBERTO (1883–1951), Italian-born Israeli Bible scholar. An ordained rabbi, Cassuto devoted the earlier part of his career to research on Italian-Jewish history. From 1939 until his death, he taught Bible at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. He was one of the early pioneers in Ugaritic studies, demonstrating the many links and contrasts between ancient Canaanite and biblical literature. Cassuto was particularly interested in the composition of the Book of Genesis. According to the documentary hypothesis, Genesis was a clumsy composite of three distinctive written sources; Cassuto, on the other hand, highlighted the literary artistry that drew together an epic substratum along with various oral traditions into a unified whole. Two of Cassuto's major works are Biblical and Oriental Studies, translated from the Hebrew and Italian by I. Abrahams (Jerusalem, 1973 and 1975); and A Commentary on the Book of Genesis, translated from the Hebrew by I. Abrahams (Jerusalem, 1961 and 1964).

CASTRATION. The Hebrews were one of the few nations of antiquity to enact a religious prohibition against the emasculation of men and even animals. Originally the biblical interdict only stipulated the exclusion of castrated animals from serving as sacrifices on the altar (Lev. 22.24) and of him "that is crushed or maimed in his privy parts" from entering "into the assembly of the Lord," that is, from marrying within the Jewish congregation (Dt. 23.2; Shab. 110b–111a). In the Talmud and codes, the prohibition is extended to include any impairment of the male reproductive organs in domestic animals, beasts, or birds, as well as in man, in addition to the castration of a person who is already impotent (Shab. 110b). It is suggested that this is a universal prohibition included in the Noahic laws (San. 56b).

The problems that this raised for animal husbandry are discussed in halakhic literature (see STERILIZATION).

CATACOMBS, subterranean burial vaults. This method of *burial is thought to have originated in Jewish Palestine, and detailed descriptions of it are given in the Talmud. It was usual for bodies to be placed in sarcophagi and then after a year for the bones to be put in smaller ossuaries that were inserted in vaults in the catacombs. Six specifically Jewish catacombs have been discovered in Rome (where the system was adopted by Christians), and they contain such characteristic Jewish symbols as the seven-branched candelabrum, the lulav, and the etrog; the inscriptions are in Greek and Latin, with some in Hebrew. Examples of this method of burial can be seen in the Herodian family sepulcher and the graves of the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem, as well as in the extensive array of second-, third-, and fourth-century sepulchers at *Beit She'arim used by Jews from all parts of the Middle East.

CATECHISM, a compendium of instruction, mostly in the form of questions and answers, designed for children and uneducated persons. It was especially favored as a means of instruction for prospective proselytes. The earliest known example of a catechism is contained in the Didache, a Christian manual of instruction for converts dating probably from the second century; that catechism was originally a Jewish manual of instruction later adapted for Christian use. As a rule, Jewish religious instruction focused on the study of the basic texts—Bible, Mishnah, and Talmud—and the use of catechismal literature was discouraged. Leqah Tov, by Avraham Jagel of Venice (1587), one of the first catechisms introduced into Jewish literature, went through a number of editions, but the author's hope for its use as a textbook in schools was never fulfilled. Since the Emancipation, scores of such manuals have been published and were particularly favored by Reform Judaism in the nineteenth century. Question-and-answer handbooks setting forth rules of circumcision and ritual slaughter (shehitah) have been common.

CELIBACY. The idea that a person ought not to marry is entirely foreign to Judaism. The opening phrase in the major code of matrimonial law leaves no doubt as to the obligation to marry and raise children: "Every man is obliged to marry in order to fulfil the duty of procreation, and whoever is not engaged in propagating the race is accounted as if he shed blood, diminishing the divine image and causing his presence to depart from Israel" (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 1.1). Only one exception to this rule is recognized by the Talmud, and that is the case of an individual such as Ben 'Azzai whose "soul was bound up with the Torah and is constantly occupied with it" (Maimonides, Laws of Marriage 15.3). Not only is matrimony regarded as the ideal state of existence, but an unmarried person is debarred from high religious and judicial office. Both high priests and judges in capital cases must be married, and single men are, in principle, unfit to act as synagogue readers (Yoma 1.1; San. 36b; Shulhan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Ḥayyim 53.9). No Jewish moralist has ever encouraged celibacy, and in this respect, there is a marked difference between Jewish values and those of Christianity.

CEMETERY. Even the smallest of Jewish communities had their own cemetery or at least a designated section of a non-Jewish cemetery set aside for the *burial of the dead. It is the community's responsibility to see that there is a proper burial place for the indigent or for unclaimed bodies (meit mitsvah). Various names for a cemetery are used in the Bible and in Jewish tradition, such as "the house of graves" (Neh. 11.3), "the house of eternity," and the euphemistic "house of the living" (based on Jb. 30.23). Since dead bodies and graves are a source of ritual impurity, the cemetery is usually situated beyond town limits. The cemetery is also invested with a certain sanctity, and any activity therein that might tend to show disregard for the dead, such as eating or drinking, is forbidden. Out of respect for the dead, individuals should not walk on graves, except where it is impossible to get from one grave to another. A new cemetery is dedicated with a special service. While it is the practice to bury only Jews in a Jewish cemetery, cemeteries owned by Reform congregations permit the non-Jewish spouse of a member to be buried in the family plot. It is the usual practice to bury husband and wife next to each other. Frequently, a cemetery contains buildings for the performance of burial rites (see TOHORAH). In some cases, graves were allotted in strict rotation, conforming to the notion of death as the great leveler; however, priests are usually interred in plots accessible to relatives, and a group of graves can be obtained to serve as family plots. In North America, it is the almost universal custom for individuals and families to purchase specific plots in advance. In some cemeteries, special sections are set aside for people to be honored. Suicides as well as apostates and individuals of evil repute are buried outside the line of graves, near the cemetery wall. According to Jewish law, however, this discriminatory practice does not apply in the case of a suicide of unsound mind. Since that is the usual verdict today, the regulation is largely disregarded. It is customary to visit a grave on the anniversary of death, on fast days, during the month of Elul, and on the eve of Yom Kippur, but the rabbis warned against visiting cemeteries too often and suggested that visits should not be made more than once every thirty days. CENSORSHIP of Hebrew books for the purpose of removing words or passages considered offensive to *Christianity was undertaken from time to time during the Middle Ages on the instructions of government or church authority, and the practice continued until the end of the czarist regime. The earliest example followed the Disputation of *Barcelona when Jews in Aragon were ordered to expunge all passages from Hebrew books regarded as objectionable. At its most extreme, Christian censorship of Jewish books resulted in the burning of all copies of the Talmud and other works (see BOOKS, BURNING OF; TALMUD, BURNING OF THE). More generally it consisted of orders to replace such words as *goy (gentile) with Samaritan or idolater (to show that the reference was not to Christians) or to delete complete passages. For example, whole passages that referred to Christianity (as well as Islam) as a relative advance—although based on error—toward the acknowledgment by the entire world of the sovereignty of God were extensively expurgated from the last chapter of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah. The papal bull of 1554, allowing Jews to possess only those books that were not considered blasphemous, signaled the systematic censorship of Jewish books in Italy; as a result of this censorship, which was often undertaken by Jewish apostates, all passages regarded as hostile or contradictory to Christian doctrines were blacked out. In 1595 the Catholic church instituted the Index expurgatorius of Hebrew books. Censors blacked out passages in thousands of Hebrew books, while many Hebrew classics were placed on the general Index of banned books. In the nineteenth century, government censorship in eastern Europe was applied to Hebrew and Yiddish literature, and Hasidic works in particular were destroyed.

Rabbinic law prohibits the Jew from reading heretical or immoral books (cf. San. 100b). To ensure that a book contained no objectionable material, the custom arose of fixing *approbations by eminent rabbis to printed works; this prevented the expression of heterodox views. In 1554, Italian rabbis established a system of self-censorship aimed at anticipating church censorship, an example that was followed in other countries. One case of self-censorship was the deletion by Ashkenazi Jews of a sentence from the *Aleinu prayer in the face of (unjustified) allegations that the passage in question was meant as a disparagement of Jesus. Books were banned because they were considered erotic or because they contained legal decisions regarded as incorrect. Censorship was also a tool in ideological struggles, for example, between Hasidim and Mitnaggedim, or in the Orthodox fight against Reform. Another form of self-censorship was practiced by some philosophical and kabbalistic authors, who feared that their at times audacious doctrines might be misunderstood or even lead to heresy.

CENSUS. Possible census records from the ancient Near East are related to taxes, military conscription, and land apportionment. The Bible reports instances in which the entire population of Israel was enumerated (2 Sm. 24; 1 Chr. 21); instances in which all males of military age were enumerated (Nm. 1–4, 26); and several cases in which armed forces were counted before battle (Jos. 8.10–12; 1 Sm. 11.8, 13.15, 15.4, 17.5, 18.1; 1 Kgs. 20.15, 20.26–27; 2 Kgs. 3.6; 2 Chr. 25.5).

The first census of Israelites, taken at the foot of Mount Sinai, was held in the second year after the Exodus (Nm. 1.1–2). The second census, taken in the Plains of Moab, was carried out in the fortieth year. Since entry into Canaan was to have occurred immediately after departing from Sinai, both censuses served the dual purpose of preparing the camp for the wars of conquest as well as enumerating the population for dividing up the land. Because the numbers of Israelites recorded in these censuses seem so large, modern scholars have proposed nonliteral interpretations, such as translating the word elef as military unit rather than one thousand. These explanations seem unlikely.

Jewish authorities hold that biblical censuses were carried out by indirect counting. Each person would give a half-shekel in silver; the total weight of all silver collected would be multiplied by two, and the resulting number would be equal to the total population. This was to avoid direct enumeration of the people and prevent disasters, which, it was feared, might occur as a result (Ex. 30.11–16). However, it is more likely that the desert censuses were conducted by registering the names of individuals and then counting the names, a method that would also have avoided a direct count of the people.

The taking of a census was regarded as a source of bad luck. David incurred divine wrath and a plague when counting the Israelites (2 Sm. 24.1; 1 Chr. 21, 27.24). Traditional authorities attribute this to the fact that David's census was not authorized and served no purpose other than royal conceit. To prevent plagues from occurring when censuses were carried out, a poll tax was levied to ransom the lives of the enumerées. A fear of censuses may be rooted in ancient beliefs that numbering implied limiting or control (cf. Hos. 2.1). It has also been suggested that since censuses were associated with military activity, and that many of the people counted in a military muster would not return from battle alive, the very act of counting people induced fear. Certain Jews are still reluctant to be counted in censuses, and until recently some Orthodox Jews in Israel would not participate in censuses. When gathering the ten men needed for a "minyan", it is customary to count not with numbers but according to a verse with ten words, such as Psalms 28.9, or, popularly, by the fiction of counting negatives, as in "not one, not two. . . ."

CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN RABBIS (CCAR), organization of Reform rabbis in the United States and Canada, with members in other parts of the world. Founded in 1889 by Isaac Mayer *Wise, by 1994 it had a membership of over a thousand six hundred rabbis, with a constantly growing proportion of women. The CCAR publishes prayer books for Reform congregations (Gates of Prayer for Sabbaths and weekdays, and Gates of Repentance for the High Holy Days) and has produced hymnals, Pesah Haggadahs, and a rabbi's manual. In the early part of the twentieth century, the conference adopted a critical attitude toward Jewish nationalism, despite the fervent pro-Zionist position of such prominent members as Stephen S. *Wise and Abba Hillel Silver. This course was sharply reversed in the 1930s when the conference adopted a pro-Zionist stand, at the same time returning to Hebrew in the service and promoting a more positive attitude toward ritual in the synagogue and in family life. The CCAR has always upheld the separation of church and state in America and also in the State of Israel. The conference publishes an annual Yearbook (of which over one hundred volumes have appeared and have been cumulatively indexed). Conference headquarters are in New York City. See also UNION OF AMERICAN HEBREW CONGREGATIONS.

CEREMONIAL OBJECTS. Many types of appurtenances have been crafted for use in ritual ceremonies. Some are essential to the ritual; others are used to beautify the religious practice. The precept of hiddur mitsvah (beautification of the commandment), requiring the performance of religious commandments in a beautiful way (Shab. 133b), is based on the verse "this is my Lord and I will beautify him" (Ex. 15.2). Decorated instruments (knives, shields, medicine bottles) are often used by the mohel performing ritual circumcisions. At the Pidyon ha-Ben ceremony, the infant is placed on a tray; silver examples of such trays frequently depict the 'aqedah. Decorated ceremonial objects associated with weddings include the huppah (canopy) under which the ceremony takes place, special cups (often interlocking), rings, and ornamented ketubbot (marriage contracts). Water vessels, combs, and nail-cleaning implements for use in ritually cleansing a corpse are often ornamented with inscriptions or imagery related to death. Many objects are associated with Sabbath meals, including Qiddush cups and various objects related to the hallah (plates, knives, covers). Special lamps or candlesticks are used for kindling the Sabbath lights; the star-shaped hanging lamp known as a Judenstern was popular. Plates, cups, candleholders, and spice containers are used in the Havdalah ceremony, which concludes the Sabbath. In Ashkenazi communities, tower-shaped spice containers, echoing central European architecture, are very common, as are fruit- and flower-shaped containers. Inscribed, decorated shofars were used in some communities on Ro'sh ha-Shanah. Decorative containers, frequently of silver, are used to store the etrog on Sukkot. Hanukkah lamps are essential to the celebration of the holiday. There are two basic types of Hanukkah menorot: eight-branched lamps resembling the seven-branched Menorah of the Tabernacle and Temple; and bench-type lamps, with eight lights arranged along a slightly elevated horizontal surface, frequently with a decorative backplate. Esther scrolls, read on Purim, are often ornamented with decorative borders or illustrations, or are housed in ornamental cases. Also associated with Purim are decorative noisemakers and plates for sending gifts (mishloah manot). Decorative vessels are often used for the foods of the Pesah Seder: wine cups and decanters; matsah covers or bags; and plates (often three-tiered) or containers to hold the ceremonial foods. Ceremonial cups (for Sabbath or festival Qiddush, circumcision, weddings, Elijah, etc.) are sometimes modeled after sumptuous, contemporary wine vessels. In Islamic countries, where the consumption of alcohol was prohibited, Jewish ceremonial cups were often modeled after Western examples. Ceremonial objects often stylistically resemble secular artifacts crafted of the same material or having a parallel function in the same locale and period, and often incorporate local decorative motifs and approaches. Objects originally crafted for secular use were frequently adapted for ceremonial purposes. See also ART; SYNAGOGUE; TORAH ORNAMENTS.

CHAJES, TSEVI HIRSCH (1805–1855), Galician rabbi and author. He was appointed rabbi of the prestigious community of Zolkiew in 1828, where he came under the influence of Nahman Krochmal, head of the community at that time, and other moderate Maskilim. In his writings and in his public activities, Chajes took a unique and often lonely stance, identifying neither with the Maskilim nor the Ḥasidim. Although he agreed with many of the demands of the Maskilim for changes in Jewish life (for example, he supported calls for Jews to engage in agriculture and presented himself for examinations in secular knowledge, the only traditional rabbi to do so), Chajes remained a staunch defender of tradition. His relations with Hasidic leaders and the Hasidic masses were mixed. Leading rabbis differed with his critical approach to traditional texts, while Maskilim found his approach too moderate and apologetic. A move to the rabbinate of Kalisz in 1852 brought Chajes no respite. He encountered severe opposition from local Ḥasidim and the suspicion of Russian officialdom. His works include Torat Nevi'im (1836), on the eternity of Torah and the principles of the written and oral Torah; Iggeret Biqoret (1853), studies on the Targum and Midrash and their history; Mevo' ha-Talmud (1845), an introduction to the Talmud outlining the history of the oral law (translated into English as Student's Guide through the Talmud [London, 1952; New York, 1960]); and Darkhei ha-Hora'ah (1842), on the principles for deciding matters of Jewish law. His collected works were published in two volumes (Kol Sifrei Maharat Chajes [Jerusalem, 1958]).

CHAPLAINS. The appointment of chaplains in the military is a comparatively recent innovation, although the "priest anointed for war"—a Talmudic term for the priest referred to in Deuteronomy 20.2—could possibly be regarded as a prototype. The first Jewish military chaplains in the United States were appointed in 1862 during the Civil War. The National Jewish Welfare Board's chaplains' committee first organized the chaplaincy in the United States during World War I. It published special prayer books and other publications for Jews in the armed forces. During World War II, there were 311 Jewish chaplains in the U.S. military. The first Jewish chaplain to the British Army was officially appointed in 1892. Jewish chaplains have also served in other countries, including France, Italy, and Germany. With the establishment of the State of Israel, a chief rabbi was appointed to the Israeli army with the rank of aluf-mishneh (lieutenant colonel). A chaplain is attached to each brigade and a chaplain-sergeant to each battalion. The Israeli chaplaincy has published a unified prayer book for use by all Israeli soldiers. Rabbis may also serve as chaplains in hospitals and nursing homes.

CHARIOT MYSTICISM. See MA'ASEH MERKAVAH.

CHARITY. The Hebrew word tsedaqah, which in the Bible refers to any kind of righteous conduct, is limited in the Talmud to one aspect of righteousness, namely, the giving of alms or assistance to the poor through material gifts. For all other acts of benevolence or kindness the phrase gemilut hesed (or ḥasadim) is employed, and the distinction between the two types is defined by the following passage: "In three respects gemilut ḥasadim is superior to tsedaqah. Tsedaqah can be performed only with one's material possessions, gemilut ḥasadim both in kind and in personal service. Tsedaqah can be given only to the poor, gemilut ḥasadim to both rich and poor. Tsedaqah can be performed only for the living, gemilut ḥasadim for the living and the dead" (Suk. 49b). Although gemilut ḥasadim has "no fixed measure" and is one of the three pillars upon which the world stands (Avot 1.2), the rabbis nevertheless extol the virtue of tsedaqah, in the simple sense of almsgiving, as one of the greatest of good deeds. Together with prayer and atonement, it can avert an evil fate divinely decreed for the coming year on Ro'sh ha-Shanah. The practice of tsedaqah is enjoined throughout the Bible: "You shall open your hand wide to your brother, to the poor and the needy in your land" (Dt. 15.11); "He that has pity on the poor lends to the Lord" (Ps. 19.17); and the righteous man is one who is "father to the poor" (Jb. 29.15). Provision for those in want has at all times been regarded as a sacred duty. The very use of the word tsedaqah, which is derived from the Hebrew word for justice, shows that the relief of poverty is a matter of duty—an assessment upon the rich for the benefit of the poor—and not voluntary philanthropy. It is for this reason that the rendering of tsedaqah as charity—which implies an act of pure and unrequited benevolence—is incorrect. The duty of tsedaqah will never end as long as "the poor shall not cease out of the land" (Dt. 15.11), and the prophet enjoins us to "deal your bread to the hungry, and that you bring the poor that are cast out to your house. When you see the naked man cover him, that you do not hide yourself from your own flesh" (Is. 58.7). The rabbis lay great stress upon the spirit in which tsedaqah is given, rather than upon the act of giving or the amount involved. Referring to Deuteronomy 15.11, they demand not only that "you shall surely give to him" but that "your heart shall not be grieved when you give to him"; the reward for tsedaqah is directly related to the measure of kindness in it. Hillel, in giving tsedaqah, took into consideration the standard of living to which the recipient had been accustomed before falling upon evil days, and even provided one unfortunate with a horse and servant (Ket. 67b). Tsedaqah should represent at least a tenth of one's income (see TITHES) but should not exceed 20 percent, lest the giver lapse into penury (Ket. 50a). Under no circumstances is a male recipient to be put to shame by having the alms given to him in public, while giving alms to a female secretly is frowned upon by some authorities, lest suspicion be cast on her character (Ḥag. 5a). The highest form of almsgiving is when the donor and recipient are ignorant of each other's identity. Maimonides (Hilkhot Mattenot 'Aniyyim 10.7-18) enumerated eight degrees of tsedaqah, ranging from the highest level, rehabilitative tsedaqah, to the lowest, tsedaqah given with feelings of resentment. Customary forms of tsedaqah have included hakhnasat kallah* (aiding a couple about to be married to obtain the necessary items for setting up a household); me'ot hittim* (supplying the poor with their Pesaḥ needs); the *ransom of captives; and provision for education, soup kitchens, temporary lodgings for poor travelers, hospital services, old-age homes for the needy, and free burial for the indigent.

CHAZARS. See KHAZARS.

CHERUBIM (Heb. keruvim), celestial beings, depicted as winged creatures with both human and animal characteristics. Placed east of Eden after Adam's sin, to prevent further access to the tree of life (Gn. 3.24), the cherubim were assigned primarily, according to the Bible, to serve as the seat, or throne, of the kevod YHVH, the divine majesty (or presence; see SHEKHINAH). They fulfill this task in two ways: first, by spiriting him from place to place throughout the universe (God is described as riding upon a cherub as he glides through the heavens [2 Sm. 22.11; Ps. 18.11]); thus, the cherubim symbolize his omnipresence; and second, by bearing him aloft on a throne in his heavenly palace (God is depicted as a king "who sits upon the cherubim" [Is. 37.16; Ps. 80.2, 99.1]).

The cover of the *Ark of the Covenant, earthly symbol of God's presence, consisted of two golden cherubim with outspread wings, upon which the divine majesty was said to be enthroned in his earthly abode and upon which he was carried (Ex. 25.18ff.; 1 Sm. 4.4; 2 Sm. 6.2); the cherub motif was also woven into the fabric of the Tabernacle curtains and veil (Ex. 26). Likewise, in the inner sanctum of Solomon's Temple, two enormous, self-standing cherubim stood with their wings outstretched over the Ark (1 Kgs. 6.23ff.). These earthly cherubim are to be understood as substitutes for the real, heavenly ones, since sculptural representations of the deity were shunned by the Israelite religion. The most explicit description of these heavenly beings is found in Ezekiel's vision of the four-faced cherubim of the divine chariot (see MA'ASEH MERKAVAH). In the prophet's vision, their appearance (Ez. 1) and gradual exit from the Temple (Ez. 10–11) signify the departure of God from his dwelling, the destruction of the Temple, and the exile of the people. Their promised return (Ez. 43) signifies Israel's eventual ingathering and the rebuilding of the Temple. Some aspects of the cherub motif are common to other ancient Near Eastern peoples; the name itself may be related to the Akkadian kuribu, a protective spirit with specific nonhuman features.

The cherubim also figure prominently in mystical literature and are identified with God's invisible glory, an emanation of the great fire of the divine presence, and as the model used by God in the creation of man.

CHIEF RABBINATE, an office of preeminence. Since the cessation of the Sanhedrin, there has been no basis in Jewish law for the institution of a chief rabbinate, since in theory every rabbi who has the necessary qualifications possesses spiritual authority equal to that of every other rabbi. Nevertheless, throughout the Common Era it has become the practice in various countries to appoint one rabbi as the spiritual or representative head of the community, to whose authority all other rabbis in his jurisdiction are subject. Three factors contributed to the institution of such an office: the appointment of one man by the civil authorities in order to establish a channel of communication between the government and the Jewish community (see CROWN RABBI); the voluntary acceptance by the Jewish community and its rabbis of one outstanding figure as chief rabbi; and an appointment made by the Jewish community on its own initiative as a necessary consequence of its internal communal organization. In the first category belong the appointments by the kings of Aragon and Castile of district chief rabbis during the Middle Ages, the appointment by the kings of England of archpresbyters, and the appointment by the German emperors of chief rabbis who, in addition to their rabbinic duties, were responsible for the collection of taxes imposed upon the community. Among the titles in use since the Middle Ages for the rabbi filling such a position are rab de la corte* (Castile), arrai moor* (Portugal), Landesrabbiner* (Germany) and hakham bashi* (Turkey). The chief rabbis of France in the years from 1807 to 1906, whose appointments were made by state-controlled consistories first established by Napoléon, belong in a similar category. Examples of chief rabbis in the second category, those chosen for their outstanding merits by the Jewish community, are such medieval figures as R. Shelomoh ben Avraham *Adret (Rashba) of Barcelona, known as El Rab d'España, and R. *Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg (who also belongs to the first category). The chief rabbinate of the British Commonwealth is the most extensive and best-organized example of the third category and has its parallels on a lesser scale in various European countries and in South Africa. In the United States and in Canada the institution is unknown, although there were aborted attempts to institute a chief rabbinate in the United States at the turn of the century. In 1920, the British mandatory authorities in Palestine passed an ordinance instituting a chief rabbinate, an institution that was taken over by the State of Israel. The chief rabbinate in Israel is headed by two chief rabbis, one Ashkenazi and one Sephardi, as had been the case under the mandatory ordinance. While each such chief rabbi in Israel has the title of rav ra'shi (chief rabbi), the Sephardi chief rabbi also has the title of ri'shon le-Tsiy- yon, a title in use since the sixteenth century, and probably much earlier. According to one tradition, when Mosheh ben Yehonatan Galante (1620–1689; see GALANTE FAMILY) was appointed spiritual head of the Jerusalem community, he modestly refused to assume the title of Ra'vad (an acronym for rav, av beit din, "rabbi, head of the rabbinic court"), hitherto held by the chief rabbi, but agreed to the title of ri'shon le-Tsiyyon (cf. Is. 41.27) on the principle of first among equals. The Sephardi community decided that in the future all chief rabbis of Jerusalem would be known by the appellation ri'shon le-Tsiyyon. The authority of the Turkish chief rabbi of Constantinople extended to Erets Yisra'el during the period from the death of Galante until 1842, when a new ri'shon le-Tsiyyon was elected, confirmed by the Turkish authorities, and granted official status, equal to that of the Christian patriarchs, with jurisdiction over the entire province. Today, on formal occasions, as a sign of his office, the ri'shon le-Tsiyyon appears in an elaborately embroidered gown and ornate round hat.

In Israel, the office of chief rabbi is elective, and those elected serve for a single ten-year term and are not eligible for reelection. In addition to the national chief rabbis, each large city in Israel has two chief rabbis, one Ashkenazi and one Sephardi, while smaller towns will often have a single chief rabbi. All questions of personal status in Israel are governed solely by rabbinic laws. That and the governmental nature of the appointment invests the Israeli chief rabbinate with great practical authority, aside from its natural prestige in the Orthodox Jewish world.

CHILDREN. Barrenness and childlessness are regarded in Judaism as the greatest of misfortunes. The cry of Abraham, "O Lord God, what will you give me, seeing I go childless" (Gn. 15.2), and Rachel's lament, "Give me children, else I die" (Gn. 30.1), are echoed by the Talmudic statement that includes "him who is childless" (Ned. 64b) among the four categories of living men who are considered as dead. A male is regarded as a child until attaining the age of thirteen and a day; a female twelve and a day. Children are free of all legal and religious obligations and are not punishable for misdeeds, although they are expected to begin accustoming themselves to Jewish practices as they approach their majority. The Jewish attitude toward children is one of unbounded love, combined with a solid sense of sober responsibility. This love is expressed in the rhetorical question "Is it possible for a father to hate his son?" (San. 105a) and the statement "a man can be envious of anyone except his own son and his disciple" (San. 105a). The father-child relationship is a symbol for the relationship between God and Israel, thus the passage in the Ro'sh ha-Shanah liturgy "If you regard us as your children, have mercy on us as a father to his child." Parents discharge their responsibility toward their children by teaching them the precepts of Judaism. A child who follows the path of the Torah not only ensures the continuity of Judaism but also confers salvation upon the souls of his parents after death: the *Qaddish, insofar as it became a prayer for mourners, derives from this idea. According to the Talmud, one of the three categories of people who will inherit the world to come is those "who bring up their children in the way of the Torah" (Pes. 113a), and "he who has a son who toils in the Torah is regarded as not having died" (Gn. Rab. 49). A father is enjoined never to favor one child over another (Shab. 10b); the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt is traced back to the favoritism shown by Jacob to Joseph. Similarly, a father should never fail to fulfill the promises he has made to his children, lest he lead them to tell untruths (Suk. 46b). The ideal child is one who attends a school of religious study (Shab. 119b) and to whom the rabbis apply the verse "touch not my anointed" (1 Chr. 16.20), in contrast to the "child brought up in captivity among the heathens." A striking exception to the otherwise universally accepted doctrine of a child's lack of responsibility and consequent freedom from punishment is noted in the law of the rebellious son (see BEN SORER U-MOREH). The rabbis believed the responsibility for a child's rebelliousness rested ultimately on the shoulders of the parents (San. 71–72). See also FATHER; MOTHER.

CHILDREN'S PRAYERS AND SERVICES. Parents are encouraged to familiarize their children from a very early age with basic prayers. The most widely taught in this connection are *Modeh Ani and the *Shema'. Some modern prayer books (such as the Authorised Daily Prayer Book, edited by S. Singer, the standard British prayer book) include brief morning and night prayers for young children.

Organized children's Sabbath and festival services were introduced by Reform Judaism in nineteenth-century Germany. The custom was adopted by Conservative and some Orthodox congregations. The tendency is for much or all of the services to be conducted by the children themselves. The services usually consist of an abbreviated version of the regular prayers and are often conducted in the vernacular. Special prayer books have been published for children's services.

Certain Sephardi congregations encourage boys who have not yet reached bar mitsvah age to recite a certain sentence in the morning service or even read the haftarah, while in Ashkenazi synagogues it has become common for a young boy (or girl in non-Orthodox congregations) to lead the reading of the An'im Zemirot prayer (see SHIR HA-KAVOD). Children's services are virtually unknown in Israel.

CHIROMANCY. The belief in reading an individual's character from the lines on his palms and forehead seems to have been prevalent in Judaism in antiquity. The earliest detailed description of chiromancy occurs among the treatises of Heikhalot and Merkavah literature, the mysticism of the Talmudic period. The key treatise, Hakkarat Panim ve-Sidrei Sirtutin, has been published and analyzed by Gershom Scholem; some other texts were published later. These served as a basis for the detailed elaboration of chiromancy that was included in the Zohar, the most influential text of Jewish mysticism. Several sections are dedicated to this subject (vol. 2, 70a-77a), as is an independent treatise that is part of the Zohar, Raza' de-Razin. Numerous kabbalists included such material in their works. This practice reflects the belief that an individual's character and fate are imprinted on his body before birth, and that life is actually the unraveling of these potentialities, which can be recognized by an expert.

CHOIR. Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun, of the tribe of Levi, were appointed by King David to lead choral singing accompanying the placement of the Ark of the Covenant in Jerusalem; they and their families also presided over ceremonies at the dedication of the Temple. Choral singing (by all-male choirs) of antiphonal and responsorial songs played an important role in regular worship in the First and Second Temples but was banned when the Temple was destroyed in 70 CE. In 1605 R. Leone *Modena issued a responsum permitting choral music for the purpose of glorifying God. Salamone *Rossi of Mantua reintroduced choral singing to the synagogue with the publication (1622-1623) of thirty-three settings of psalms and other liturgical texts, but the regular addition of choral music to the synagogue service came to an end with the Austrian conquest of Mantua between 1628 and 1630. Sephardi communities seemed more accepting of choral music for various festive occasions; Jewish and non-Jewish composers wrote choral-orchestral works for the dedications of Italian synagogues in Venice and Ferrara, as well as choral hymns for congregations in Amsterdam. However, the regular inclusion of choral singing in the synagogue began with the German reforms of the nineteenth century. The practice began in Reform congregations to have "mixed choirs" (men and women) and also non-Jewish choristers. Salomon *Sulzer was the first composer to set to music for cantor and choir the entire annual liturgy. His student, Louis *Lewandowski, who was not a cantor but the first full-time synagogue choral conductor, published a similar work with organ accompaniment. Russian composers like David Nowakowsky and Zavel Zilberts contributed to the traditional chorskul (choral synagogue) with works for all-male choruses. For a time choral singing threatened to inhibit the participation of lay congregants, but since the 1950s, North American composers writing choral music for Reform and Conservative congregations have increasingly produced singable melodies and refrains that encourage all worshippers to participate. CHORIN, AHARON BEN KALMAN (1766-1844), pioneer advocate of *Reform Judaism in Hungary. Born in Moravia, he graduated from the yeshivah of Yehezqel Landau in Prague and then served as rabbi of Arad, Transylvania, from 1789. Imbued with the spirit of Jewish Enlightenment, Chorin took a highly independent line in his responsa and sermons, declaring sturgeon to be kosher and condemning practices (e.g., kapparat and the use of amulets) that he regarded as superstitious. However, it was the publication of 'Emeq ha-Shaveh (Prague, 1803), which heralded a series of controversial works reinterpreting the oral law, that first angered the traditional rabbinate. After justifying the Berlin and Hamburg Reform temple innovations (1818), Chorin supported and often anticipated radical Reform measures: bareheaded worship, an abbreviated mourning period (shiv'ah), abolition of the Kol Nidrei prayer on Yom Kippur eve, the deletion of Jewish national elements from the liturgy, the granting of permission to play the organ in the synagogue and to travel and write on the Sabbath, and even mixed marriages. Chorin's opponents dubbed him Aher, an acronym of his name recalling the apostate *Elisha' ben Avuyah.

CHOSEN PEOPLE. The belief that the Jewish people have been chosen by God above all other peoples (also called election) is frequently mentioned in the Bible and occupies a prominent place in Jewish liturgy. Deuteronomy 14.2 states, "For you are a holy people unto the Lord your God, and the Lord has chosen you to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all the nations that are upon the face of the earth." The blessing recited by a person called to the reading of the Torah is "Blessed are you . . . who has chosen us out of all peoples and given us the Torah"; and the specific festival portion of the 'Amidah begins "You have chosen us from all peoples; you have loved us and taken pleasure in us, and have exalted us over all tongues." The doctrine of a chosen people is therefore central in Jewish theology, but there are differences of opinion as to its precise meaning.

Interpretations vary from a narrow concept of superiority to attempts at ethical and even universalist formulations. The frequent biblical emphasis on the election of Israel led to the idea, also found in later rabbinic literature, that there was a moral or even racial excellence inherent in the Jewish people as such, and references to the superiority of those who are "of the seed of Abraham our Father" (e.g., Beits. 32b) abound. Inevitably the doctrine of election also led to an ethnocentric view of world history. The notion of a chosen people is also related to that of a "holy nation" (e.g., Ex. 19.5-6: "Now therefore if you will obey my commandments and keep my covenant, then you shall be a peculiar people unto me above all people"), and election is accounted for as an act of divine love and faithfulness to the divine promise (Dt. 7.6-9). In spite of their severe castigation of Israel's failings, the prophets generally assumed the permanence of Israel's election under the *covenant. If election meant heavier responsibility and stricter standards rather than greater privileges (Am. 3.2), then Israel was proved to be God's chosen people also in exile and punishment (Jeremiah, Ezekiel). Although Deutero-Isaiah had proclaimed that God's dealings with Israel would make the latter a source of light to all the nations, the idea was not systematically developed, and Jewish commentators did not as a rule interpret the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53 as a figure of Israel suffering for the sake of mankind. The emphasis on Israel's continued election became stronger when rival religions (e.g., the claim of the Roman Catholic church to be the true Israel) or historical circumstances (e.g., oppression and persecution) contradicted Israel's claim to be the chosen people. The treatment that medieval Jewry received at the hands of its neighbors was not such as to encourage universalist tendencies. Medieval philosophers paid relatively little attention to the doctrine of the chosen people (it is not mentioned in Maimonides' Thirteen Principles of Faith), the major exception being Yehudah ha-Levi, for whom Israel was a superior race. The unique historic and cosmic status of Israel was a fundamental tenet of the Kabbalah (echoed in Hasidism and in the teachings of Yehudah Liva' ben Betsal'el and Avraham Yitshaq Kook), but rationalism, modernism, and emancipation made the notion of a chosen people increasingly problematical. Abraham Geiger still held that the Jewish people possessed a unique gift for religion, and he and other Reform thinkers tended to regard the dispersion as part of Israel's mission to serve as God's instrument in disseminating its specific insight of the relationship between the human and the divine. This attitude has been modified subsequently, and some groups (Reform, Reconstructionist) have repudiated the traditional doctrine of a chosen people and have deleted all references to it from the prayer book. The sociohistorical and spiritual rather than racial character of the traditional concept of the chosen people is clearly brought out by rabbinic law, which accords to the convert all the rights and privileges of the born Jew. This attitude, the earliest expression of which is found in the biblical Book of Ruth, was succinctly formulated by Maimonides: "Whosoever adopts Judaism and confesses the unity of God as is prescribed in the Torah is counted among the disciples of Abraham our father. These men are Abraham's household." This principle strictly applied in halakhic procedure—a convert discards his (or her) patronymic and becomes "the son [or daughter] of Abraham our father."

CHRISTIANITY, a religion that grew out of Judaism and at first existed as a Jewish sect. The founder and early adherents were all Jews (see JEWISH CHRISTIANS) and much light has been thrown on their teachings by comparing them with both rabbinic doctrines and those contained in the *Dead Sea Scrolls. Christianity adopted not only the Hebrew Bible but much of its traditional interpretation as well, in addition to many elements from Jewish liturgy. *Jesus preached the imminent advent of the kingdom of heaven, but in spite of his anti-Pharisaic criticisms he was in many ways closer to the Pharisees than to their opponents, the Sadducees. He did not intend to abolish the traditional law (cf. Mt. 5.17), and his supplication prayer, known as the Lord's Prayer, bears a striking resemblance to the traditional Short Prayer (*Tefillah Qetsarah). After the Crucifixion, his followers regarded themselves as Jews who were committed to a belief in the messiahship of Jesus and his early return. It was *Paul who developed Christianity in a way that prepared for a complete break with the parent religion.

Drawing on doctrines current in sectarian circles, Paul developed a theology that laid the foundation for gentile Christianity: Jesus' death had redeemed sinful man from his state of sin; the Law had been fulfilled and superseded (i.e., abolished), and salvation was now attainable through baptism and faith in the Messiah. With the growth of gentile Christianity, the original Jewish Christians (*Ebionites, also called minim [sectarians, heretics]) became a minority of "heretics," even inside the church. With the introduction of a solemn curse on minim into the 'Amidah prayer, the Jewish community finalized its breach with Christianity. However, Christianity could never regard Judaism as just another religion. The Roman Catholic church insisted that its roots were sunk deep in the history of Israel, that the events recounted in the *New Testament were the fulfillment of the promises made in the Hebrew Bible (now called the *Old Testament), that its founder was the Messiah and son of David expected by Jewish tradition, that it was the heir of God's covenant with Israel—in short, that it was the "true Israel" (verus Israel).

Early church practices and liturgy strongly influenced by Judaism included the Eucharist, the prominent role of the Psalms in prayer, and the concept of the Sabbath day and of the institution of the church (which derived from the synagogue). Christian theology was deeply indebted to typology according to which the Hebrew Bible was to be read as a preparation for Christianity. This position inevitably led to a complicated and ambivalent attitude toward Israel in which affirmation and utter rejection, acceptance and hatred, were intertwined. In order to come into its own, the church had to picture Israel as dispossessed, rejected, or even cursed. This competitive situation, aggravated by Israel's stubborn refusal throughout the centuries to be in any way impressed by the religious claims of Christianity, has provided the basis for the tragic history of Christian *antisemitism.

The development and growth of Christian antisemitism can be traced through the books of the New Testament and beyond those to the writings of the church fathers and later authors. The destruction of the Temple and the disastrous failure of the first and second (Bar Kokhba') rebellions were taken as proof that Israel's historic role had come to an end, whereas Christianity continued to spread until it finally became the official religion of the Roman empire. (From the Jewish point of view, Rome, with all its evil associations [Edom], was henceforth identified with Christianity.) Although Judaism was tolerated and given a status of its own in medieval Europe, Jews were subjected to humiliation, persecution, and frequent violence. The official theory claimed that Jews should be allowed to live, albeit in abject degradation, as a terrible warning to all those who would reject the Christian savior. Toward the later Middle Ages, Christian antisemitism became more violent. The *Crusades, with their wholesale massacres of Jewish communities, the repeated accusations of ritual murder (see BLOOD LIBEL) and desecration of the Host, expulsions, forced conversions (see CONVERSION, FORCED), and the activities of the *Inquisition brought Jewish suffering at the hands of Christianity to an unprecedented high. Antisemitic stereotypes became deeply ingrained throughout the Christian world, with the Jews branded as "Christ killers." Theological disputations that at one time had been conducted in a spirit of relative fairness were increasingly forced on the Jews in order to embarrass them. All the more extensive was the development of polemical literature (see APOLOGETICS; POLEMICS)—both on a high philosophical plane and on a crudely derogatory (e.g., Toledot Yeshu) level.

In spite of the conflicts, there were mutual influences between the two religions, in the sense both of adopting and rejecting certain ideas and practices; for example, Maimonides exercised considerable influence on Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, and Meister Eckhart, whereas Jewish theological doctrines were often formulated with polemical intent against Christian teachings. Christian influence is noticeable in such Jewish customs as yortsayt and prayers for the dead. The church dissociated its Easter date from that of Pesah to avoid celebrating on the Jewish festival; conversely, Jewish customs were discontinued because they were also practiced by Christians, for example, kneeling at prayer (see also HUQQAT HA-GOYYIM). These mutual influences, however, had little affect on the general moral climate.

Luther's hostile attitude to Judaism was the same as that prevalent in the earlier Middle Ages, and the Counter-Reformation in the Roman Catholic church served to revive and enforce even more severe anti-Jewish legislation (the yellow badge, the *ghetto system). Some English Puritans seemed ready to adopt a different attitude toward the Jews, but, generally speaking, it is only in recent times that Christian churches and theologians, largely under the shock of Hitler's persecution, began to press for a radical revision of the Christian approach to Judaism. It was realized that traditional church teaching had created antisemitic prejudices that contributed to the atmosphere in which the Holocaust became possible. The Roman Catholic church in the 1965 Nostra aetate document of the Second Vatican Council repudiated the teaching that Jews of all times were to be held responsible for the death of Jesus and subsequently insisted on the continuing validity of God's covenant with the Jewish people. Most Protestant churches have also revised their attitude toward the Jews, with all Christians condemning antisemitism. Western churches are beginning to stress the Jewish roots of Christianity. On the Jewish side, theological evaluation of Christianity varied with the times and individual thinkers. It was generally admitted that Christianity, like Islam, was different from paganism, and as a monotheistic faith could be considered as one of the ways by which Providence gradually led the gentiles toward true religion. It was never doubted, however, that Christianity was essentially a false religion, and according to some authorities (e.g., Maimonides) it could not even be regarded as a genuinely monotheistic faith. Some modern thinkers (particularly Franz *Rosenzweig) have assigned an especially important role to Christianity and describe its relationship to Judaism as a complementary one. CHRONICLES, BOOK OF (Heb. Divrei ha-Yamim), the last book in the *Hagiographa section of the Hebrew Bible, which describes the history of the kingdom of Judah up to the Babylonian exile. In the *Septuagint, Chronicles is included among the historical books and placed between Kings and Ezra. Originally one work, by the sixteenth century it had entered printed Hebrew Bibles as 1 Chronicles and 2 Chronicles, following the precedents of the Greek translation and the Vulgate. On the basis of its style, language, and genealogical information, Chronicles can be dated to the end of the Persian period or the beginning of the Hellenistic period, the fourth century BCE. Chronicles contains genealogies, beginning with Adam, including the twelve sons of Jacob and the tribal composition of Israel, and ending with the lists of inhabitants of Jerusalem at the time of the return from the Babylonian exile (1 Chr. 1–9); a description of CIRCUMCISION (Heb. milah), removal of the foreskin in an operation performed on all male Jewish children on the eighth day after birth and also upon male converts to Judaism. Circumcision was enjoined by God upon Abraham and his descendants (Gn. 17.10–12) and has always been regarded as the supreme obligatory sign of loyalty and adherence to Judaism. As the sign of the *covenant (berit) "sealed in the flesh," circumcision came to be known as berit milah or the "covenant of our father Abraham." The presence of the foreskin was regarded as a blemish, and perfection was to be attained by its removal (cf. Ned. 31b). The generation born in the wilderness, however, was not circumcised, an omission repaired by Joshua (Jos. 5.2–9). Many Hellenistic Jews, particularly those who participated in athletics at the gymnasium, had an operation performed to conceal the fact of their circumcision (1 Mc. 1.15). Similar action was taken during the Hadrianic persecution, in which period a prohibition against circumcision was issued. It was probably in order to prevent the possibility of obliterating the traces of circumcision that the rabbis added to the requirement of cutting the foreskin that of peri'ah (laying bare the glans). To this was added a third requirement, metsitsah (sucking of the blood). This was originally done by the mohel (circumciser) applying his lips to the penis and drawing off the blood by sucking. For hygienic reasons, a glass tube with a wad of cotton wool inserted in the middle is now generally employed, or the blood is simply drawn off by the use of some absorbent material. Unless medical reasons interpose, the circumcision must take place on the eighth day after birth, even if that day falls on a Sabbath or Yom Kippur. If circumcision has been postponed for medical reasons, the ceremony may not take place on a Sabbath or major festival. The only exception permitted to the otherwise universal requirement of circumcision is if two previous children of the family have died as a result of the operation; that is, in cases of hereditary hemophilia. The duty of circumcising the child is the responsibility of the father. In his absence or in case of his failure to do so, the religious authorities are bound to see that it is performed. The occasion of a circumcision is regarded as a festive event for the whole community and takes place, where possible, in the presence of a minyan. If one of the participants (the father, godfather, or mohel) is in synagogue on that day, all penitential and supplicatory prayers are omitted. A sentence in the prayer of Elijah (1 Kgs. 19.10), "for the children of Israel have forsaken your covenant," was understood by the rabbis to mean that the Israelites had abandoned the rite of circumcision, which is always referred to (on the basis of Gn. 17.9) as the berit (covenant). Elijah is regarded as the patron of circumcision, and it is said that his spirit is present at all circumcisions. This is the origin of the chair of Elijah (see ELIJAH, CHAIR OF), now an integral part of the ceremony. In eastern communities, and in Hasidic groups, where the ceremony takes place in the synagogue, such a chair is a permanent feature of synagogue appurtenances. Among Ashkenazim, it is customary to appoint a couple as kvatter (godparents). The godmother carries the child from his mother's room to the room in which the ceremony will take place and gives him to the child's father, who, in turn, hands him to the mohel. The mohel places the child upon the chair of Elijah and proclaims, "this is the chair of Elijah, may he be remembered for good." He then lifts up the child, places him upon a cushion in the lap of the godfather (sandag*), and, in this position, after the mohel recites the appropriate blessings, the operation is performed. The father also recites a blessing to God "who has sanctified us by his commandments and commanded us to enter our sons into the covenant of Abraham." According to some authorities, the father also says the *She-Heḥeyanu blessing. The mohel then recites a prayer dating from geonic times, in the course of which a name is bestowed on the child. The circumcision ceremony is normally followed by a Se'udat Mitsvah, a meal of religious character. Special hymns are sung, and blessings for the parents, the sandag, the child, and the mohel, as well as for the advent of the Messiah and the righteous priest, are inserted in the Birkat ha-Mazon. Nineteenth-century Reform Jews were opposed to circumcision, but now it is usually performed, although often by a doctor rather than a mohel. Circumcision is enjoined upon male proselytes (and slaves) as an essential condition of their acceptance into the Jewish faith. Circumcision was widespread in many ancient cultures. Some of these also practiced female circumcision, which was never allowed in Judaism.

CIVIL COURTS. Jewish law contains a prohibition against recourse to non-Jewish courts of justice. The prohibition originally derived from the fear of being inveigled into a recognition of idolatry ('A. Z. 13a). Certain exceptions were made; for example, for the witnessing of documents, except in the case of writs of divorce or manumission (Git. 90b). In the second century, however, R. Tarfon issued a blanket prohibition against Jews having any recourse to non-Jewish courts, even if their dispensation of justice was identical with that of the Jewish courts. He quoted Exodus 21.1 in support of his decision (Git. 88b).

In their desire and anxiety to maintain the autonomy of Jewish communities in the Diaspora, medieval Jewish authorities insisted that Jews bring their disputes only before their own courts and harshly condemned those having recourse to civil courts even by mutual agreement. The only generally recognized exception permitted by the Shulhan 'Arukh (Hoshen Mishpat 26.1) was if the defendant failed to appear before the Jewish court (beit din) after three successive summonses, in which case the beit din issued permission to the plaintiff to apply to the civil authorities.

The scope of the prohibition against litigating in civil courts has been subject to a considerable amount of controversy since the abandonment of Jewish judicial autonomy. A number of different approaches have been suggested. Some say that using Jewish courts, even if not run according to Jewish law, is not inconsistent with the prohibition against civil courts. Others recommend arbitration panels that are not actually part of any legal system. Yet others rule that administrative law courts are not prohibited. Some nineteenth-century authorities suggested that *arbitration, whether by Jews or gentiles, was permitted.

Equally problematic was the relationship between public and private law. The prohibition against litigating in secular courts is not applicable when the cause of action lies primarily with the secular government. As the relationship between public and private secular law grows more complex, the proper role of the prohibition against litigating in secular courts becomes more unclear.

Finally, the status of the secular courts in the State of Israel is in dispute. Some are inclined to rule that secular courts in Israel are like the Talmudic "courts of Syria" that were not completely prohibited by Jewish law. Yet others see no distinction between Israeli courts and the civil courts of other countries.

CIVIL LAW. Jewish civil law may be defined as that area of divinely authorized law that deals with matters other than criminal and ritual. Civil law occupies a modest place in the Bible itself, but as it developed during the Talmudic period and later, it came to constitute the main part of Jewish law. The civil law of the Bible reflects the life of a predominantly agricultural community, and there is little material dealing with commerce. With the development of commerce from the Second Temple period onward, and the necessity of paying taxes to foreign rulers, the area of commercial law expanded greatly, as is reflected in the Mishnah and in the Talmud. The laws of contracts, expressed or implied, were studied in detail. The development of civil law continued during the geonic period and later in responsa and codes. The basic orders of the Mishnah concerned with civil law are Nashim and Neziqin (though these sections also deal with other matters). The former treats the laws of marriage and divorce, property rights of husbands and wives, and the rights and obligations of slaves. The nature of civil courts, legal procedure, the administration of oaths, as well as most laws dealing with money matters, land, inheritance, pledges, loans and interest, torts, and bailments are found in Neziqin, particularly in the first three tractates of this order: Bava' Qamma', Bava' Metsi'a', and Bava' Batra'. Rabbinic sources distinguish between rules applicable in ritual law (issur'a) and rules applicable in civil law (mamon'a). The principle of equity (for example, in application of the biblical commandment "and you shall do that which is right and good") was often enforced in order to mitigate any special severity that might arise from the strict application of the law in certain cases. Whereas no non-Jewish authority could change or influence ceremonial law, in matters of civil law, the law of the land would be considered valid (dina' de-malkhuta' dina'*) by rabbinic legislators for certain purposes. Nevertheless, Jews were always urged to bring litigation to rabbinic courts and not to the *civil courts. In many parts of the Diaspora, rabbinic courts were given full jurisdiction by the government; elsewhere their status was that of a court of arbitration. In the State of Israel, litigants can choose to go to rabbinic instead of secular courts in civil suits.

In modern Israel, the field of civil law has been greatly transformed by the reinvigorated study of those areas of Jewish law that correspond to modern civil law in the rubric of mishpat 'Ivri, as Jewish civil law is now called. It is hoped that mishpat 'Ivri will address the many modern problems of commerce and life by incorporating Jewish law into modern Israeli civil law (for example, in the areas of civil procedure or the return of lost property). This has met, however, with considerable opposition from both religious and secular segments of the community.

CIVIL RIGHTS. See EMANCIPATION.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAR ANIMALS. Animals whose flesh may be eaten according to Jewish *dietary laws are considered clean; those whose flesh is not permitted are considered unclean. Clean and unclean animals are first mentioned in the Bible in the story of Noah, who took into the ark seven pairs of every clean animal but only two pairs of unclean animals. Leviticus 11.1–47 and Deuteronomy 14.3–25 list clean and unclean animals together with the principles by which they are classified. Clean quadrupeds are those that both chew their cuds and have cloven hooves. Pigs, which are unclean, have cloven hooves but do not chew their cuds. True fish are those having both fins and scales. These are clean, while, for example, eels and shellfish are excluded. No general principles are given to determine the cleanness of fowl, but about twenty unclean fowl are listed. In general, it may be said that the specific list of unclean fowl in the Bible consists of birds of prey only, thus implying the permissible character of those not birds of prey. All reptiles and insects are prohibited, with the exception of four types of locusts mentioned by name and which the biblical list specifies as having "knees above their legs to jump with upon the ground."

CLEANLINESS. Personal cleanliness and hygiene are stressed in the Bible (Dt. 23.10–15), in rabbinic literature, and in all Jewish law codes. Cleanliness is not to be confused with the concept and practices of tohorah* (ritual purity), but immersion in the ritual bath (miqveh*), which is the major means of obtaining ritual cleanness, requires prior cleaning and washing of the body (see IMPURITY). In certain instances, such as *ablu-tion of the hands before partaking of bread or engaging in prayer, ritual and hygienic motives are intertwined. Halakhic insistence on ritual immersion at regular intervals (for example, in the case of the menstruous woman and the frequent voluntary immersion of males), although motivated by considerations of ritual purity, gave rise to a high level of personal hygiene among Jews. In fact, so important does Judaism consider personal cleanliness that the obligatory abstention from washing on Yom Kippur is taken to be an "affliction" (Yoma 8). The rabbis taught that daily washing honored God (Shab. 50b). Personal hygiene is considered by the rabbis to extend also to modesty, decency, and cleanliness of dress, an attitude voiced in an extreme fashion by the statement "A scholar upon whose garment a speck of dirt is found is worthy of death" (Shab. 114a). A person with a soiled or torn garment may not lead prayers (Meg. 4.6). During the Middle Ages, Jews prided themselves on their clean habits and neatness of dress. Maimonides considered the achievement of cleanliness in dress and body to be among the general objectives of the Bible, adding that an outer appearance of cleanliness and propriety should reflect inner purity of heart. The Shulhan 'Arukh (Orah Hayyim 4.18, 158–165) lists occasions when hands should be washed: upon arising each morning, after urination and defecation, after taking off one's shoes or touching any part of the body customarily covered, after visiting a cemetery, after undressing, before and after meals, after marital relations, and after coming into contact with lice.

CODIFICATION OF LAW. Since at least the first century of the common era, Jewish observance has been predicated upon the rabbinic interpretation of the Bible as expressed in the *oral law. By the second century, the oral law was being formulated in various academies in Erets Yisra'el in a brief, prescriptive form that marked the beginning of the creation of legal collections. Approximately at the end of the second century, a number of these collections were edited by R. *Yehudah ha-Nasi' into what became known as the *Mishnah. In terms of its presentation, the Mishnah was detached from its biblical foundations. Organized topically, the work gave few biblical sources for its rulings, though it did cite numerous variant opinions. However, the detailed discussion of the Mishnah by the amora'im in both *Talmuds only increased the possibilities for uncertainty. Abandoning the style, form, and mission of the Mishnah, the amora'im rarely came to clear conclusions.

Emerging from the Talmudic period without a clear code of law, contemporary rabbis had to decide numerous questions of practice. Many decisions from the savoraic and early geonic periods were ultimately collected by Yehuda'i ben Nahman Ga'on (fl. 8th cent.) and recorded by his students in the Halakhot Pesuqot. More than simply a collection of precedents, the monograph attempted to come to practical legal conclusions on numerous matters that remained unclear in the Talmud Bavli. Generally following Talmudic organization, the work seems to have been directed at those familiar with the Talmudic but not expert enough in it to come to practical conclusions independently. The compilation served as a source for many legal summaries and popularizations, most notably the Halakhot Qetsuvot* (9th cent., perhaps Italy) and the Halakhot Gedolot* attributed to Shim'on Qayyara'.

With the rise of Talmudic learning in North Africa and Spain around the year 1000, further attempts at codification were made, the most important among them being Yitshaq *Alfasi's eleventh-century Halakhot. Independent of the ge'onim, yet generally agreeing with their legal conclusions, the work presented its author's views. Set in the language and form of the Talmud, the work eliminated most of the Talmudic discussion, presenting only the relevant legal conclusions and the occasional original exposition meant to justify specific rulings. Most significantly, Alfasi added rules for determining the law when the Talmudic discussion led to no clear conclusion. While Alfasi primarily relied on the Talmud Bavli, he made use of the Talmud Yerushalmi for those matters on which the Talmud Bavli did not reach a decision or was silent.

Undoubtedly one of the most original works of codification was Moses *Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, written in Egypt in the second half of the twelfth century. Maimonides, who frequently disagreed with the legal views of the ge'onim, noted that he was writing the code because the conditions of his time had made study ever more difficult, resulting in a decline in knowledge. To ease accessibility to the law, Maimonides abandoned Mishnaic organization and divided his work topically into fourteen books. The code, written in Mishnaic Hebrew, again to ease its use, rarely attempted to justify legal conclusions or divulged sources for rulings. Unlike all other codes, the Mishneh Torah dealt with every aspect of Jewish law, irrespective of whether it could currently be observed (e.g., laws of sacrifice, monarchy).

Codification continued in Spain and Provence, where authorities like Yitshaq ibn Ghiyyat, *Yehudah ben Barzillai al-Bargeloni of Barcelona, *Avraham ben Yitshaq of Narbonne, and *Yitshaq ben Abba' Mari of Marseilles, relied heavily upon the geonic tradition in compiling their collections. Provence only began to emerge as an independent center of legal thought with *Avraham ben David of Posquières (12th cent.), who was unencumbered by geonic perceptions of Talmudic sources. Yet the emerging Provençal school was quickly eclipsed by the legal methodology of the tosafists.

Nothing could have been further removed from the apodictic approach of Maimonides' code than the halakhic activities of the tosafists in northern France and Germany during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Unaware of Maimonides' efforts, the tosafists returned to the Talmudic sources, where their dialectics produced myriad new halakhic possibilities. The relatively simple, definitive codes that had previously characterized halakhic codification in Franco-Germany, works such as the Rokeah of *El'azar ben Yehudah of Worms, could not stand in the face of the massive textual and halakhic alternatives that had been raised. Subsequently works, such as the thirteenth-century Or Zaru'a of *Yitshaq ben Mosheh, demanded keen intellect and independence of thought to decide the law in an age of so many legal possibilities.

One of Yitshaq ben Mosheh's students, *Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg, had great influence on subsequent developments in halakhic codification. Although not a codifier himself, he was viewed as a master of halakhah and his behavior and teachings were assiduously noted by his students, who often based their practical decisions upon them. Two halakhic works by his disciples became standard texts: *Mordekhai ben Hillel's Sefer Mordekhai and *Asher ben Yehi'el's Hilkhot ha-Ro'sh. The latter gained particularly wide currency as its author, forced to flee persecutions in Germany, became the leading halakhic figure in early fourteenth-century Spain and often incorporated both Ashkenazi and Sephardi traditions in his work.

The tosafist methodology became ensconced in Spanish-Jewish jurisprudence in the thirteenth century through its use by Moses *Nahmanides. His student Shelomoh ben Avraham *Adret attempted a work of codification in which he paid great attention to halakhic development from the Talmudic period. The work, however, is incomplete. A second student of Nahmanides, Shemu'el ben Yitshaq ha-Sardi, composed Sefer ha-Terumot, a code of civil law that also attempted to show the progression of legal thought.

By the mid-fourteenth century, there was little consensus on practical legal matters. As Asher ben Yehi'el's son, *Ya'aqov ben Asher, wrote, "there is no law that does not have difference of opinions." To remove such doubt, Ya'aqov composed a new legal code, the Arba'ah Turim, which eschewed all previous manners of organization, being divided into four books that discussed, respectively, blessings, festivals, and fast days; laws of kashrut, menstrual purity, mourning, and other rituals; matrimonial law; and civil and criminal law. After reviewing a number of opinions on each matter, Ya'aqov presented his own rulings, often giving great weight to his father's decisions. The work remained a preeminent code until the early seventeenth century.

Even after the completion of the Arba'ah Turim, legal compendiums continued to be written. The trend toward briefer presentations continued with the appearance of Yosef *Karo's Shulhan 'Arukh in Venice in 1564 and 1565. Following the organization of the Arba'ah Turim and generally basing himself on a consensus of opinion among Alfasi, Maimonides, and Asher ben Yehi'el, Karo presented the law in the briefest of terms, although he had laid the foundations for his decisions in a separate commentary on the Arba'ah Turim, entitled Beit Yosef.

Due to Karo's use of consensus, the Shulhan 'Arukh had a distinctly Sephardi emphasis. It became acceptable in the Ashkenazi world only when glossed by Mosheh *Isserles of Kraków, who added both Ashkenazi customs and recent Ashkenazi rulings to the work (1570–1571). Like previous attempts at codification, the Shulhan 'Arukh was initially opposed by many who believed that the law could not be reduced to simple rules. However, by the seventeenth century, there had appeared super-commentaries to various sections of the Shulhan 'Arukh, such as those by Yehoshu'a *Falk, *Shabbetai ben Me'ir ha-Kohen, and *David ben Shemu'el ha-Levi, effectively ensuring that work's position as the point of departure for subsequent discussion.

Halakhic works continued to be produced in subsequent centuries, most comprising responsa and commentaries on the Shulhan 'Arukh. This prompted various attempts to incorporate recent legal thought into codes organized along the lines of the Shulhan 'Arukh. A popular example of this genre was Avraham *Danzig's Hayyei Adam (1810) and Hokhmat Adam (1814–1815) on matters of ritual, while the Shulhan 'Arukh of *Shneur Zalman of Lyady was a more scholarly undertaking in this direction. Yehi'el Mikhal *Epstein's 'Arukh ha-Shulhan (1884–1917) was unusual in its scope, dealing with all aspects of contemporary law as well as with many matters not in current use (e.g., Sanhedrin). It also attempted to return to a fuller presentation of the law. *Yisra'el Me'ir ha-Kohen's Mishnah Berurah (1892–1898), which has attained a high reputation in many modern circles, is a commentary on the first section of Shulhan 'Arukh that attempts to provide background to the rulings of Shulhan 'Arukh while incorporating recent developments in halakhic thought and practice. Ya'aqov Hayyim Sofer produced a similar work reflecting developments in the Sephardi community, entitled Kaf ha-Hayyim (1905–1957). That work also represents a concerted effort to incorporate the kabbalistic practices of Yitshaq Luria into normative halakhic practice.

In the last decades of the twentieth century, numerous legal digests have appeared, almost exclusively in the area of ritual law (e.g., Sabbath), and with a tendency toward stringency. Such works have been published in Modern Hebrew, English, and other languages to facilitate a broader familiarization with practical rules. Non-Orthodox (Conservative, Reform, and Reconstructionist) views of halakhah have yet to be detailed in a recognized code.

COFFIN. The practice in the ancient Middle East was to bury bodies in wood, stone, or clay coffins decorated with designs and inscriptions. However, the only biblical reference to a coffin is in the case of Joseph (Gen. 50.26), and use of coffins by Jews dates only from the late Second Temple period. In some places it was customary to remove the bottom of the coffin in accordance with the verse "You are dust and to dust you shall return" (Gen. 3.19). It was strictly forbidden to plunder or derive benefit from a coffin. Maimonides ruled that coffins should be made of wood and be without ornamentation so as to emphasize the equality of all. No metal nails may be used, and the cover must be made of a single flat board. French pietists made the coffin of a scholar from the wood of the table at which he had studied. The use of coffins became widespread in the Diaspora, although many communities, including the kabbalists, did not use them. In recent centuries, the use of coffins has become common practice in order to conform to the requirements of secular law. In the State of Israel, *burials are generally made on a bier, without a coffin. An exception is made for leaders of the state and for fallen soldiers.

COHEN. See PRIESTHOOD; for last name, see also KOHN.

COHEN, HERMANN (1842–1916), German philosopher and founder of the Marburg school of neo-Kantianism. Prominently associated with Reform Judaism, Cohen sought to demonstrate the fundamental compatibility of the Reform conception of Jewish faith with Kant's ethical idealism. Interpreting the latter's teachings in a novel fashion, he understood ethics as summoning society to the task of forging the future in accordance with rationally determined moral principles of justice and peace. This understanding of ethics, he held, was anticipated by biblical monotheism, especially as interpreted by the prophets who envisioned a messianic future—which would witness the manifestation of God's oneness in the moral unity of humanity—as paradoxically a divine promise, whose realization was a human, moral responsibility. In his last years—after his retirement from his professorial position in Marburg in 1912 and his move to Berlin—he emended his views by introducing the notion of "sin"—or the individual's anguished realization of his or her own moral failings. This consciousness of one's sin, Cohen contended, bears the danger that the sinful individual will despair of his or her own moral worth, and abandon all subsequent moral effort. The self-estrangement brought about by the feeling of one's sinfulness requires, in Cohen's judgment, the concept of a forbearing God who by the act of forgiveness serves to reintegrate the individual into an ethically committed humanity. The atonement for sin is not effected by God's grace, but by the individual who, in acknowledging God's forgiveness, in effect rededicates him or herself to the moral task incumbent upon rational humanity. Religion is thus preeminently a series of acts of atonement, in the form of rites and prayers expressing remorse and repentance, focused on a merciful, forgiving God. The reconciliation between God and the individual thus achieved, in turn, requires that God be conceived not as an idea but as a being who relates to the finite, ever-changing world of becoming, of which the human being is a part. Despite the fundamental ontological distinction separating them, being and becoming—God and the individual—are interrelated through what Cohen called "correlation." God and the individual are in correlation when an individual cognizant of God's mercy—a solicitous, forgiving love—rededicates him or herself to emulating these divine qualities. Cohen spoke of correlation as a shared holiness in which God and the individual are "coworkers in the work of creation." Cohen set forth these views most forcefully in his posthumously published work, Religion der Vernunft aus den Quellen des Judentums (1919; English translation by Simon Kaplan, Religion of Reason Out of the Sources of Judaism [New York, 1972]), in which he expounded his new conception of religion through a selective exegesis of the sources of classical Judaism in the Bible, Midrash, and liturgy. These traditional expressions of Jewish piety, Cohen argues, exemplify the most refined conception of religion. A selection of his Jewish writings, translated by Eva Jospe, appeared under the title Reason and Hope (New York, 1971).

COHEN DE HERRERA, AVRAHAM (c.1562–1635), kabbalist. Born to a converso family, probably in Italy, he was captured by Lord Essex while in Cadiz, Spain, in the commercial service of Sultan al-Mansur of Morocco, and taken to London as a Spanish prisoner. He was freed before 1600 after a long diplomatic exchange between the sultan and Queen Elizabeth. Back in Italy, he met Yisra'el *Sarug, who taught him Lurianic Kabbalah. After a short stay in Hamburg, Cohen de Herrera moved, in 1619, to Amsterdam, where he continued his commercial activities and spiritual assignments, such as heading a rabbinical committee to approve Yosef Shelomoh *Del-Medigo's Elim.

Cohen de Herrera wrote Casa de la divinidad, Puerto del cielo as well as the Epitome y compendio de la logica in Spanish in order to familiarize his fellow ex-conversos with Lurianic Kabbalah. The first two writings were translated into Hebrew by his disciple Yitshaq *Aboab da Fonseca and published in 1655, twenty years after Cohen de Herrera's death.

Cohen de Herrera, like Spinoza, integrated many elements of Renaissance philosophy into his work and was recognized by his followers (Yitshaq Aboab da Fonseca, Avraham Miguel Cardoso, Yosef Ergas, David Nieto, and Barukh of Kosov) as the father of the metaphoric interpretative school of Lurianic Kabbalah, where the tsim-tsum* (contraction) is a nonrealistic metaphor.

COLLEGIO RABBINICO ITALIANO, the first modern rabbinical seminary, founded in 1829 in Padua. Its most outstanding teacher was Shemu'el David *Luzatto. The school closed in 1871 and reopened on a smaller scale in Rome in 1887. In 1899 the seminary moved to Florence under the leadership of Shemu'el Hirsch Margulies, and back to Rome in 1939. Closed by the Fascists, it reopened in 1955. A Sephardi branch was opened on the island of Rhodes in 1928 and closed in 1939.

COLON, YOSEF (c.1420–1480) Italian halakhist, also known as Mahariq. Colon was raised in Chambray, the capital of Savoy. Educated primarily by his father, he early distinguished himself in the rabbinic culture of Savoy. In the early 1450s, he moved to Piedmont and later lived in the vicinity of Venice, Mantua, and Pavia.

Colon was, along with Yisra'el ben Petahyah Isserlein, the outstanding Ashkenazi authority of the age. His opinion was solicited by scholars throughout Italy and Germany, and his responsa had a decisive influence not only upon Italian Jewry but on all subsequent halakhic developments. Editions of his responsa (Venice, 1519 et al.) achieved wide distribution. His opinions were cited extensively by later authorities and exerted critical influence upon Yosef Karo and Mosheh Isserles.

Colon's responsa are distinguished by his encyclopedic knowledge and methodical analysis of sources. He attempts to identify the basic principles underlying his sources and to elucidate the conceptual framework within which he gives rulings. The Mishneh Torah of Maimonides enjoys a preeminent place in his writings.

Colon's responsa are marked by great deference to authorities of the past. Hesitating to decide among them, he resorted to methods of legal determination that removed or minimized this necessity. He maintained great independence from his contemporaries, however, and became embroiled in a number of controversies with prominent rabbinic authorities, such as Yisra'el Bruna and Mosheh Capsali, hakham bashi* of the Ottoman empire.

COLUMBUS PLATFORM, document outlining the "Guiding Principles of *Reform Judaism" adopted by the *Central Conference of American Rabbis at a convention held in Columbus, Ohio, in 1937. The platform superseded the *Pittsburgh platform adopted in 1885, which had served as the basic document of American Reform Judaism. The Columbus platform consisted of three sections—Judaism and Its Foundations, Ethics, and Religious Practice—and differed on many essential points from its predecessor. For example, it defined Judaism as "a way of life," not exclusively as a religion, and emphasized customs, symbols, and ceremonies, the cultivation of distinctive forms of religious art and music, and the use of Hebrew in worship and instruction. One of the most striking changes came in the modification of the previous hostile attitude toward Zionism and Erets Yisra'el. It accepted the principle of Jewish peoplehood and stated that it was "the obligation of all Jewry to aid in the upbuilding of the Jewish homeland by making it not only a haven of refuge for the oppressed but also a center of Jewish cultural and spiritual life." The platform also rejected the charge of dual loyalties by saying that while Jews assume the full duties and responsibilities of citizenship in all lands where they live, this did not contradict their obligation to help in the rebuilding of Palestine. It concluded by linking the restoration of Palestine with the establishment of the Kingdom of God.

COMMANDMENT. See MITSVAH.

COMMANDMENTS, REASONS FOR (Heb. ta'amei ha-mitsvot). It has long been debated whether the positive and negative biblical commandments (613 in number according to rabbinic tradition; see COMMANDMENTS, 613) had reasons beyond the arbitrary will of the divine legislator, and, more specifically, reasons that made sense to human understanding. The precept to wear fringes on the garment is explained in the Pentateuch (Nm. 15.39) "that ye may look upon it and remember all the commandments." The subject was discussed in Talmudic and Midrashic literature. The purification ritual with the ashes of a *red heifer (Nm. 19) was usually cited as an example of a rationally inexplicable law. The problem was compounded by the rationalist tendencies of medieval philosophy. *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on distinguished between legal and moral rules that human reason would have formulated even without scripture and those that depended wholly on revelation. Moses *Maimonides held that all divinely given commandments were rational; the distinction was between those whose reason we could understand and those who were as yet beyond our limited comprehension. The overriding purpose of all mitsvot, from the dietary and ceremonial laws to theological doctrines (e.g., the prohibition of idolatrous practices), was to provide a physical, social, moral, and intellectual regime that would lead individuals to the highest spiritual perfection. This view was shared, with minor differences in emphasis, by most thinkers and expounded in works such as the Sefer ha-Hinnukh ascribed to R. Aharon ha-Levi of Barcelona (c.1300). The kabbalists interpreted the commandments very differently. The Torah being essentially a manifestation of the Godhead, that is, of the ten *sefirot, the system of mitsvot corresponds to this sefirotic realm, and every commandment is thus correlated to some point in it and has as its purpose the promotion of the inner divine union, namely (in Lurianic terminology) the "raising of the sparks." The earliest kabbalistic writings are devoted to expounding this mystical significance of the commandments. On the exoteric level, observance is understood as the way to serve God, as an aid in our struggle against the evil inclination (see YETSER HA-RA' AND YETSER HA-TOV), and as a gift of God to enhance life, gain merit, and become worthy of the world to come (see 'OLAM HA-ZEH AND 'OLAM HA-BA').

With the exception of Samson Raphael *Hirsch, who treated the subject in a manner similar to that of Maimonides and gave a reason for each specific mitsvah, most writers in the modern period write about the mitsvot in more general terms. Thinkers such as Moses *Mendelssohn, Shemu'el David *Luzzatto, Mordecai

Menahem *Kaplan, Eliezer *Berkovits, Abraham Joshua *Heschel, and Louis Jacobs write within an ongoing tradition. Nevertheless, the nature of the question has changed significantly in modern times. Instead of asking, "What reasons did God have for commanding us to keep the mitsvot?" modern authors ask, "What reasons do I have for keeping the mitsvot?"

COMMANDMENTS, 613 (Heb. taryag mitsvot). According to a tradition recorded in the Talmud Bavli (Mak. 23b), the number of commandments in the Torah is 613. They are divided into 248 positive and 365 negative commandments, said to correspond to the 248 bones of the body and the 365 days of the solar year (also to the 365 muscles of the human body). Although it is physically impossible for any one person to fulfill all of the commandments, it is nevertheless customary to refer to a particularly righteous person as one who fulfills all taryag mitsvot (see Rash ion Gn. 32.5). The 613 commandments are binding only on Jews; gentiles are obligated to the seven commandments of the *Noahic laws.

The antiquity of the tradition of 613 commandments is the subject of dispute. Although there are tannaitic passages that reflect this tradition, Efraim Elimelech Urbach has argued that the concept of 613 commandments is amoraic and that any such statements in the tannaitic literature are later interpolations. The veracity of the concept of 613 commandments has also been questioned, in particular by the medieval moralist Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda' and the biblical commentators Avraham ibn Ezra and Nahmanides. According to Ibn Paquda', the 613 commandments only refer to "duties of the limbs" but do not take into account "duties of the heart."

Because no count of the Pentateuchal laws yields precisely the number 613, various rules were formulated defining the principles according to which the biblical injunctions and prohibitions should be counted. A number of medieval scholars produced divergent lists of the 613 commandments. The first of these lists is found in Halakhot Gedolot*, a halakhic work dating from the geonic period. Later enumerations of the commandments are to be found in works by such renowned scholars as Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on and Hefets ben Yatsliah.

The most famous enumeration of the 613 commandments is Moses Maimonides' Sefer ha-Mitsvot. This work, originally written in Arabic, divides the commandments into positive and negative. In his introduction, Maimonides sets down fourteen rules that explain his method. These rules became the starting point for all later discussions of theories of enumeration. Both Maimonides' introduction, as well as his detailed enumeration, were subject to great dispute, and the critical strictures of Nahmanides stand out in this regard. In the 1980's the Lubavitch movement, as part of its emphasis on the writings of Maimonides, appealed to all Jewish women to study one commandment a day from Sefer ha-Mitsvot.

Among the post-Maimonidean works that record and comment on the 613 commandments, noteworthy is the thirteenth-century anonymous Sefer ha-Hinnukh*. Written in Spain, this work is structured around the various Torah portions rather than the positive and negative commandments. Other important works dating from the thirteenth century are Sefer Mitsvot Gadol, by the French Talmudist Mosheh ben Ya'aqov of Coucy, and Sefer Mitsvot Qatan, by Yitshaq ben Yosef of Corbeil. In addition to the prose works based on the 613 commandments, there is also a poetic genre known as azharot* (warnings; the numerical value of the Hebrew word is 613). The best known of the azharot is a poem by Shelomoh ibn Gabirol that is included in the Sephardi liturgy.

COMMUNITY, a term used to render a variety of Hebrew expressions (such as qehillah, 'edah, qahal, tsibbur, kelal), each with specific legal, social, and ethical connotations. The widest and at the same time most fundamental concept of the Jewish community is that of a "people" or "nation." Within this general framework, the large community has organized itself into many types of individual communities in its unceasing endeavor to survive under changing conditions. Loose tribal associations gave way in the period of the First Temple to a growing centralization of wealth and power, which did not, however, affect the largely autonomous life of the small towns. With agriculture dominating trade and industry, Erets Yisra'el's towns—with populations seldom above one thousand—were economically and in a great measure politically self-sufficient. The tradition of local autonomy (for example, the "elders at the gate of the city" and the assemblies for purposes of worship) was to a great extent responsible for the later ability of the Jews to survive in exile. The disintegrating effects of the destruction of the First Temple and deportation were countered by a new form of religious and national association, centered around the *synagogue. It appears that the Babylonian exiles in the sixth century BCE gathered on Sabbaths for a service of prayer and for encouragement from their spiritual leader. But the synagogue was not merely a new type of center for worship; the congregation also marked a new form of local association, which, with variations, has served as the nucleus of Jewish community organization in the Diaspora down to the present day. These local congregations, which fulfilled secular as well as religious functions, depended for whatever unity they were able to achieve upon the authority of the spiritual and lay leadership that guided them—elders, priests, prophets, teachers, and rabbis. Spiritual leadership often transcended national territories, as evidenced by the authority wielded by the Erets Yisra'el patriarchs over the Diaspora Jewish communities throughout the widespread Roman empire and the authority of the Babylonian academies over North African and Spanish Jewry. Religious authority and communal solidarity were so strong that when the Roman government deprived the Jewish courts of justice of their authority by converting them into courts of arbitration (398 CE), or after the suppression of the Erets Yisra'el patriarchate (425 CE), there was still no weakening of internal Jewish community organization. In the Talmudic era, Jews lived in "villages," "cities," or "walled towns," and fell into three categories—"full residents," who had lived in the area for more than twelve months; "half-residents," who had lived there between thirty days and a year; and "transients," who had lived in the area for less than thirty days. At first these Jewish communities were governed by councils consisting of three or seven members, although later there were cases of councils consisting of twelve members. These councils were in charge of communal institutions, raising taxes and disbursing the monies raised, and even regulating prices and wages. They also appointed individuals to supervise the raising and distribution of charitable funds. For centuries congregations and the network of welfare and mutual aid activities that they fostered have served as cohesive agents in Jewish communities throughout the world. Such an organizational form was particularly effective in the small towns that made up the Jewish world of the medieval and early modern periods. The leaders of different communities sometimes met together in *councils and synods, thereby evolving patterns of organization transcending the local community. The Jewish community thus played a key role in safeguarding the Jewish people and their values. It was a corporate body responsible for every aspect of Jewish life. The local community provided the requisite instruments for dealing with both the outside world and the basic structure of inner life. The fact that Jews lived in their own quarter, either forcibly (see GHETTO) or voluntarily, facilitated the existence of an essentially closed society, which had only limited contact with the non-Jewish population. The community—called in Hebrew "the holy community" (qehillah qedoshah or qahal qadosh)—combined its mundane tasks with a sense of divine mission, based on the Torah and halakhah. Intellectual ability, based on mastery of the Jewish law, helped to determine the community leadership, which was shared with the affluent. The community assembly was a main instrument of policy making. The obligations of mutual help were accepted by all members of the community, in accordance with the Talmudic dictum that "All Israelites are responsible for each other" (Shev. 39a). This involved the establishment in every community of a network of religious, educational, social, and philanthropic institutions. The community maintained the synagogue, the school, and the cemetery, while "societies" looked after the sick and aged, buried the dead, ransomed Jews in captivity, dowered poor brides, and cared for the needy, orphans, and widows. The hub of community life was the synagogue, which served many functions—place of prayer, house of study for children and adults, seat of the law court, place of community assembly, and social center.

The nature of the Jewish community changed with emancipation. Under Napoléon (see SANHEDRIN, FRENCH) Jews lost their traditional autonomy and were recognized as citizens like all others, though sharing, as individuals, a particular religion. This trend spread throughout Europe (and was always the case in the United States): membership in the community was no longer compulsory but voluntary. Jews had to decide whether or not to contribute to community funds. Jewish courts of law were relevant only for those who chose to have recourse to them. General schooling was provided by the state, and only education in Jewish matters remained the responsibility of the community or the synagogue. State social-security and health schemes provided services for which Jews had previously depended on the community. New priorities emerged, including support for the State of Israel and Jews in distress in other countries, community relations and interfaith activities, public relations, and support for Jewish education, including higher education. In the United States an umbrella federation of constituent associations has become an important expression of Jewish communal organization.

The modern trend toward the concentration of Jewish populations in and around large cities and the heterogeneity of thought and behavior characteristic of modern democratic societies have largely destroyed the unified and homogeneous character of the traditional local community. New community organizations on a national level are of different kinds. Freedom of association in a democratic society, the phenomenon of antisemitism, and the establishment of the State of Israel brought new challenges and problems. In both the sociology and theology of Judaism the precise nature of the Jewish community continues to be a major issue, about which opinions range from traditional conceptions originating in rabbinic theology of the Community of Israel (Keneset Yisra'el) as a mystical body whose transcendent character is merely reflected in the earthly, historical people to sociological definitions of the community in terms of its identifying racial, cultural, or social traits. COMPASSION (Heb. rahāmim). The Hebrew word for compassion is etymologically related to rehem (womb), and compassion is regarded as the quintessential feeling of a mother for her child (cf. Is. 49.15, "Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb?"). It is considered an outstanding virtue. The Talmud states that "Whosoever shows compassion to God's creatures is surely of the seed of Abraham," and conversely, "he who fails to show compassion is certainly not of such descent" (Beits. 32b; cf. Yev. 79a). The Jewish people are referred to by the rabbis as the "compassionate children of compassionate sires" (based on Qid. 4a). The Torah repeatedly enjoins compassion for the powerless and defenseless, such as widows, orphans, and strangers. Mercy is a divine attribute, and God is often referred to as ha-rahāman (the compassionate one) or as av ha-rahāmim (father of compassion); thus, showing compassion is one of the main examples of the *imitation of God. A synonym for both God and the Torah is the frequently used Talmudic word rahāmana. The Talmud relates that when the Egyptians, who had been so cruel to the Israelites, were drowned in the Red Sea, the angels sought to sing songs of praise to God. God, though, forbade them to do so, exclaiming, "My creatures are drowning in the sea, and you would rejoice!" (Meg. 10b). Since "God's compassion is extended to all his creatures" (Ps. 145.9), compassion should likewise extend beyond the human race to the lowliest of God's creatures (Gn. Rab. 33.3), and cruelty to animals is considered a biblical prohibition (see ANIMALS, TREATMENT OF). On the other hand, misplaced compassion often leads to cruelty and crime; the rabbis cite Saul's compassion in his battle against the Amalekites as a case in point (cf. 1 Sm. 15.9, 22.17–19). Compassion must not interfere with the proper exercise of justice, though the law sometimes takes compassion into account in the passing of judgments (cf. Ket. 9.2).

COMPROMISE (Heb. pesharah), a term for the court-directed process by which disputes are settled. Unlike other legal systems, Jewish law permitted direct judicial participation in the settlement process and created rules governing the parameters of a court-mandated compromise. Indeed, the classical codes recount that a beit din offered litigants either law (din) or compromise (pesharah). There is a dispute between various authorities as to how compromise differs from din; R. 'Aqiva' Eger (19th cent.) stated that a settlement achieved through compromise may deviate from the award that one would receive according to law by no more than a third. Others disagree and grant greater latitude to court-ordered compromise. In modern times nearly all beit din proceedings are done through the rubric of compromise rather than law.

COMPULSION. See DURESS.

COMTAT VENAISON, name of a former province of southeast France, now the Département of Vaucluse, in which were located four historic Jewish communities: Avignon, Carpentras, Cavaillon, and L'Isle-sur-la Sorgue. Avignon was founded in the second or third century CE; the others are apparently not older than the twelfth century. The Jews of the area spoke their own language, Judeo-Provençal, and had their own liturgical traditions. Among the latter was the replacement of Sim Shalom (the final benediction of the *Amidah in the morning service) by Shalom Rav, which does not occur at all in the Sephardi liturgy and which in the Ashkenazi liturgy is read only in the afternoon and evening services. Other unique features of the ritual were the omission of the 'Aleinu prayer at the conclusion of each service, and the substitution for the regular Birkat ha-Shir on the Sabbath during the Christian Holy Week with a prayer entitled Nishmat de-Yom Hesger which commemorates an old prohibition against Jews leaving their homes during that period.

CONCUBINAGE, cohabitation of a woman with one particular man but without either qiddushin or a ketubah (San. 21a). Medieval authorities disagreed over the question of whether the taking of a concubine is prohibited or permitted. Some authorities permit it, provided that the concubine observes the rules of niddah. The majority prohibit concubinage, although there is a dispute as to the nature of the prohibition (Otsar ha-Poseqim, Even ha-'Ezer 26.3-8). In more recent times, the prohibition is almost unanimous and it is generally agreed that "no woman is permitted to any man except through qiddushin, huppah, sheva' berakhot and ketubah" (Resp. Radbaz 4, no. 225). Concubinage carries none of the rights associated with marriage, although some authorities do require a "get out of stringency." Children born to a concubine do, however, acquire rights of both a personal status and a pecuniary nature (Resp. Rashba' 4, no. 314). A "common law wife" under Israeli law is in a position similar to that of a concubine in terms of personal status.

CONDITIONS (Heb. tena'im). Jewish law allows the imposition of conditions on many different types of transactions. For example, conditions can be imposed on financial transactions (e.g., Shulhan 'Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 307) or ritual actions (e.g., Shulhan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Hayyim 273.1). Unlike other legal systems, Jewish law allowed one to impose both prospective and retrospective conditions on a marriage or divorce (e.g., Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 38). As a general rule, when a condition is imposed on a transaction and is not fulfilled, the underlying activity is retroactively void: if a woman is conditionally divorced but the condition is not fulfilled, she does not have the status of a divorcee in Jewish law (Shulhan 'Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer 6.1).

Jewish law recognizes implicit, as well as explicit, conditions. Thus, one who enters into a labor contract when no conditions of employment are specified does so in accordance with the customary conditions imposed on all such agreements in the locale in which that person resides. Indeed, a condition can be conditionally imposed by merely announcing that one's actions are predicated on a future event, even if that event is not explicitly stated as a condition (Shulhan 'Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 207.1-4).

The Talmud (Ket. 74a; Yev. 106a) states, however, that conditions may not be imposed on a halitsah (see LEVIRATE MARRIAGE) ceremony. Tosafot on Ketubbot 74a states that halitsah is different from marriage and divorce in that halitsah cannot be done through an agent, and there can be no conditions imposed on anything that cannot be done through an agent. Nahmanides, commenting on Bava' Batra 126, notes a different limitation on the right to impose conditions. He says that conditions can be made that affect only the people in the transaction and not others. Mosheh Feinstein (Iggerot Mosheh, Yoreh De'ah 2.124) notes the possibility of conditional conversions. The Shulhan 'Arukh discusses the precise legal formulation needed to validly make a condition in Even ha-'Ezer 39-40 and Hoshen Mishpat 307.

CONFESSION, a term with distinct meanings in Jewish liturgy and in Jewish law.

In Liturgy. Confession is the admission and acknowledgment of guilt or wrongdoing that might otherwise remain undisclosed. Confession (viddui) is a means of expiation and atonement for such wrongdoing and is one of the three essential elements of true *repentance (the other two being regret for the action committed and a resolve not to repeat it). Thus the sin offering in the Temple was accompanied by confession, and, relying on further biblical traditions (e.g. 2 Sm. 12), the rabbis held that there could be no remission of sin without confession. Confession is made directly to God (and by no means through an intermediary) and may be said individually, in one's private prayers, or collectively, institutionalized in public congregational confession, such as during *Yom Kippur. The wording of the liturgical confession is based upon that given by the high priest in the Temple following the ordinance (Lv. 16.21) "Aaron shall . . . confess . . . all the iniquities and transgressions of the Israelites," and although there was originally no fixed wording for the confession, traditional formulas emerged and were incorporated into the liturgy. Various formulas for private confessions are also suggested in rabbinic literature; for example: "How shall a man make [private] confession on the eve of the Day of Atonement? He should say 'I confess for all the wrongs that I have committed. I have taken the path of evil and all I did I will not do alike. May it be your will, O Lord my God, to pardon me for all my iniquities, forgive me all my transgressions, and grant me atonement for all my sins'" (Lv. Rab. 3.3). Public confessions appear in the liturgies for penitential and fast days (for example the last lines of *Avinu Malkenu), as well as for every Monday and Thursday (see SHENI VA-ĤAMISHI), containing, in contrast to their congregational setting, detailed enumerations of sins. Private confession is said by some at night before retiring and also by a bridegroom and bride before their wedding. Since confession in general is recognized as having the power to effect atonement for sins, confession on one's deathbed is a matter of great importance and is recommended in the Talmud (Shab. 32a), which cites the precedent of *Achan (Jos. 7.19). A traditional formula, which incorporates the Mishnaic petition "May my death be an atonement for all the sins . . . of which I have been guilty toward you" (San. 6.2), evolved and is recorded by Nahmanides. The custom of confession regularly to a trusted friend or master was practiced in some mystic circles, particularly in some of the sixteenth century kabbalistic brotherhoods, but did not gain wider currency.

In Law. Confession denotes two different legal concepts. The first is confession of judgment in a civil matter, which Jewish law rules to be a valid acknowledgment of debt. Unlike other forms of testimony that can be impeached on the basis of countertestimony, a confession of judgment in a civil matter is irrefutable evidence of the validity of the debt; such a confession of judgment is the equivalent of one hundred witnesses and is unimpeachable. This is so even if the confession of judgment is clearly untrue, unless the presence of the debt diminishes the rights of other creditors.

The second form of confession is confession of guilt in a criminal or ritual matter. In this case, a contrary rule is adopted, which maintains that confessions of guilt are categorically inadmissible to prove legal guilt and that one may not confess to a violation of law that would label one an evildoer. Thus, one who confesses to a murder may not be punished based on the confession, and the confession is inadmissible in a beit din. (Jewish law does, however, recognize the validity of a Noahic court that uses confessions to determine guilt.) In a case where a person confesses to a violation of law that has both civil and criminal consequences, the civil consequences are applied and the criminal consequences are not. Thus, a woman who confesses to adultery would forfeit the ketubbah upon divorce but would not be punished as an adulteress and need not be divorced, as is the law in cases of provable adultery.

CONFIRMATION, a religious innovation introduced in 1810 in Kassel, Germany, as a Reform alternative, for young men and women, to the bar mitsvah. As a rite of passage at age sixteen, it was felt to be more in keeping with the times, as it was closer to adulthood. It also ensured that young people would continue to study for several years after the age of twelve or thirteen. There was never a fixed formula for the ceremony, though the group ceremony often takes place on Shavu'ot to symbolize the commitment of a new generation to the Sinai covenant. Today it is practiced in the Reform and Reconstructionist movements, and, in a more limited way, in the Conservative movement as an additional life-cycle event. During the first half of the twentieth century, in the Conservative movement, confirmation enabled adolescent girls to participate in a public, religious, rite-of-passage ceremony.

CONFISCATION. The Talmud (Yev. 89b; Mak. 16a) rules that Jewish courts may expropriate property and impose fines other than those mentioned in the Bible (e.g., Ex. 21.32). The source of this power is referred to as hefker beit din hefker, which loosely translates as "court ordered abandonment of property is validly abandoned." It is generally understood that this power can be exercised not only by rabbinic authorities but also by the government of the community (Shulhan Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 2.1). Included in the power to divest one of ownership was the power to assign ownership to another. However, this power was significantly limited when used by the government; the government is obligated to pay just compensation for items that it confiscates from individuals other than as a form of punishment (Mishneh Torah, Hilkhot Melakhim 3.8), and any items taken from an individual without compensation are considered stolen.

The power of hefker beit din is significant not only in terms of the punishment of criminals or the orderly operation of public laws, but as a source of legislative power in law. Many of the laws enacted by Talmudic sages that shifted property rights from one person to another were justified through the power of hefker beit din; for example, the rule that minors could sell property. The power of expropriation significantly enhanced the sages' authority over areas of law other than financial law. For example, the power of expropriation provided the source to annul improper marriages (Yev. 110a) and other regulations in the field of family law. Any change in legal rule that caused a financial loss to one party, or any change in status predicated on receiving financial consideration, could be effected by the operation of hefker beit din.

CONFLICT OF OPINION (Heb. mahloket ha-poseqim). The process by which a conflict of opinion is resolved is one of the unique features of post-Talmudic law. There is frequently more than one answer to any particular question of law, each of which is a fully legitimate expression of law consistent with the Talmudic data and yet not so analytically persuasive as to disprove other possible explanations. In addition, Jewish law developed certain procedural rules for functionally resolving disputes in cases where no substantive resolution is actually possible.

In the Second Temple era, disputes of law were ultimately resolved by the Sanhedrin, which was the final authority on Jewish law. One who defied this body was liable to the death penalty under the laws of zaqen mamre'. However, when this body ceased functioning, Jewish law was essentially decentralized. Since that time, individual decisors and communities have been charged with making decisions consistent with the substantive rules of law found in the Talmud and later codes.

Since conflicting answers to any particular question of Jewish law could be provided by different decisors, later authorities would evaluate the analytic soundness of each of these possible answers and discard those that were considered inconsistent with the Talmudic data. Frequently it would not be possible to determine with certainty which opinion among decisors was the one most consistent with the Talmudic data, which is the primary method of determining correctness. In those apparently unresolvable disputes, later authorities used other principles (such as following the majority of decisors; being strict in the case of a biblical prohibition and lenient in the case of a rabbinic one; following the lenient rule in the laws of mourning; or following the case-specific rules of double doubt). Beneath these principles were a considerable number of other rules designed to resolve still unresolvable disputes. Included in this category were such concepts as custom, economic necessity, and time of need.

Some decisors engrossed themselves in the Talmudic discourse to resolve disputes. Other decisors were more inclined to use the other principles in cases where the favored method did not produce clear results.

CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM, a religious movement that developed primarily in the United States in the twentieth century, inspired by the nineteenth-century Historical school of Judaism in Europe (see HISTORICAL MOVEMENT). The Enlightenment ideology that brought full citizenship to the Jews of western Europe and the United States in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries simultaneously engendered considerable intermarriage and assimilation. The Historical movement, led by Zacharias *Frankel (1801–1875), sought to stem that tide by applying new, historical methods to the study of the Jewish tradition within the context of traditional Jewish practices and a commitment to Jewish nationhood, Erets Yisra'el, and the Hebrew language. It sought, in other words, to conserve tradition in the modern setting, hence, the name of the movement, Conservative Judaism.

Jewish law and thought have changed over time. The tradition remained coherent, however, because those calling it their own saw their ideas and practices as deeply rooted in the concepts and acts of their forebears. The Historical view thus puts great emphasis on Judaism as practiced by the Jewish people from generation to generation. Solomon *Schechter called attention to this in his concept of catholic Israel (kelal Yisra'el), according to which it is Judaism as practiced by the people committed to it that ultimately has authority. This emphasis on Jewish peoplehood, while influenced by Jewish secularists like Aḥad ha-'Am, was, in the hands of the progenitors of the Conservative movement, distinctly religious in character: Jewish law and thought were important not only because they were the heritage of the Jewish people, but because they represented the ways in which Jews conceive of and worship God.

This prepared the groundwork for the ideological and legal developments of the twentieth century. Since the Conservative movement saw Judaism as a dynamic, developing tradition practiced by a people, it hesitated, in contrast to the Reform movement, which, in 1885 and 1937, issued platform statements, to draw sharp ideological lines. In the judgment of its mid-twentieth-century exponents, like Robert Gordis, Simon Greenberg, Mordecai Menahem *Kaplan, and Mordecai Waxman, and their successors, such as Elliot N. Dorff and Neil Gillman, that would not only be counterproductive but untrue to the historical realities of tradition. They each wrote books on what they conceived Conservative Judaism to be. Though these writings expressed the views and ideas of their individual authors, they also enabled the movement to maintain a sense of identity while not proscribing other variations. Even with the creation of a Commission on the Philosophy of the Conservative Movement, the document it produced in 1988, Emet ve-Emunah: Statement of Principles of Conservative Judaism, was a consensus document that set out the broad parameters of Conservative Jewish belief and practice but left much room for inclusion of affiliates of varying ideologies. Common to all Conservative ideologies has been a strong emphasis on the Jewish people and their culture and home in Erets Yisra'el; an affirmation of the indispensably religious character of Jewish identity, albeit with wide variations as to how Jewish religious commitments are interpreted; an assertion of the binding, but developing character of Jewish law; a dedication to the study of Jewish sources in both traditional and new, historical ways; and a strong commitment to both Jewish tradition and modernity and to the need to integrate, rather than bifurcate, the two.

There has not emerged a similar, movement-sponsored code of Jewish practice. The closest approximation, Isaac Klein's A Guide to Jewish Religious Practice (1979), is a respected but also only an individual articulation. The communal decisions of the Conservative movement on matters of Jewish practice are made by its Committee on Law and Standards. That body has produced a rich corpus of rabbinic responsa, but only some of them have been published to date, and they, in any case, do not even pretend to be a full-fledged code guiding every aspect of Jewish practice. With regard to many issues of Jewish law, Conservative Jewish practice has been determined by communal custom, leaving no need for such a code, and where there is no agreement, the differences among synagogues are viewed as a healthy sign of wrestling with tradition and applying it to regional circumstances.

There have, however, been movement-sponsored prayer books. One of the first genuine voices of the Conservative movement was the Sabbath and Festival Prayer Book, edited by Morris Silverman and published first in 1946 by a joint Prayer Book Commission of the movement's rabbinic and congregational bodies, which contained the traditional liturgy in its usual, Hebrew form, but included several notable changes. Three of the opening morning blessings were rephrased from the negative to the positive—specifically, from “who has not made me a gentile” to “who has made me an Israelite”; from “who has not made me a slave” to “who has made me a free person”; and from “who has not made me a woman” to “who has made me in his image.” Another important change occurred in the Musaf service, where the traditional prayer for the restoration of the sacrificial services in the Temple was changed to the past tense so that those sacrifices are remembered as a stimulus for the worshiper's own form of devotion to God, prayer. This effectively articulated that the Conservative movement did not look forward to the rebuilding of the Temple and the restoration of its sacrificial cult. These changes have been maintained and amplified in the Weekday Prayer Book (1961) and in the full prayer book, Siddur Sim Shalom (1985).

Conservative Judaism construes Jewish law as binding, but changes can be made through its rabbinic leaders, especially through its Committee on Jewish Law and Standards. Most of the Conservative movement's rabbinic decisions have simply applied Jewish law to new circumstances, but Conservative Judaism has instituted important changes in the role of *women in Jewish life. Mixed seating during worship has characterized Conservative synagogues from their earliest days in America; the first bat mitsvah, that of Mordecai Kaplan's daughter, took place in 1922; women were allowed to read the Torah and recite the blessings over it according to a 1954 ruling; a clause was introduced into the Conservative marriage document (ketubbah) to alleviate the inequality embedded in traditional Jewish divorce law; women could be counted for a prayer quorum according to a 1973 ruling; women were admitted to rabbinical school beginning in 1984; and many Conservative synagogues are now fully egalitarian, men and women playing equal roles in worship and in the other aspects of synagogue leadership.

The schools of higher Jewish learning of the Conservative movement are the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York; the *University of Judaism in Los Angeles; the *Seminario Rabínico Latinoamericano in Buenos Aires; and the Beit Midrash in Jerusalem (in Israel the Conservative movement is referred to as the Masorti movement). Conservative rabbis, cantors, and teachers are organized, respectively, through the Rabbinical Assembly, the Cantors' Assembly, the Educators' Assembly. The Solomon Schechter Day School Association is affiliated with the Conservative movement, as are other youth and camping programs. The synagogue arm of the Conservative movement is the *United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and the *World Council of Synagogues.

There have been two breakaways from the Conservative movement. The left wing began *Reconstructionism, while the Conservative decision to allow women into rabbinical school led the right wing to form its own organization, the Union for Traditional Conservative Judaism. In 1990 the latter dropped its affiliation with the Conservative movement and changed its name to the Union for Traditional Judaism. This group subsequently opened a rabbinical school and established its own board of halakhic inquiry.

CONSISTOIRE, governing body of a Jewish communal district. The institution was established by the Napoleonic decree of 1808 following the outcome of the French *Sanhedrin, which provided for the creation of consistories of both clerical and lay participants throughout France with a central consistoire in Paris under three grand rabbis and two laymen. This replaced the previous rabbinical and communal structure. It was later responsible for the maintenance of the rabbinical seminary (founded in 1830) and the chief rabbinate (established in 1844). Algeria had a consistoire from 1845. The system still prevails in France, Belgium, and Luxembourg.

CONSOLATION. See MOURNING.

CONTEMPT OF COURT. There is no crime in Jewish law called contempt of court, as is found in common law. Rather the idea of contempt of court posits a general obligation to obey the rulings of a beit din. This manifests itself in different ways. Defiance of an order of a beit din can lead to excommunication. More frequently, however, court-authorized social pressure is applied to individuals who refuse to abide by a decision of the beit din. This is repeatedly referred to in the law codes (Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 334.43; Hoshen Mishpat 1.5, 1.6, 2.1, 8.5, 11.1, 11.5, 16.3, 18.3, 100.3). Even in cases where a court cannot issue an order directing a person to perform or not to perform a particular act, but in which the beit din merely states that this particular conduct is a mitsvah, it is a form of contempt of court to decline to listen to the words of the sages, which can be addressed through social punishment. This was probably first used in the context of a husband who refused to participate in a Jewish divorce, in a case where Jewish law does not mandate that a divorce be given. Nonetheless, a beit din may inform the husband that a divorce is a mitsvah and authorize social sanctions if he does not participate in the Jewish divorce. This is given the formal name harhaqot de-Rabbenu Tam, the separations ordered by R. *Ya'akov ben Me'ir Tam, creator of this form of social pressure.

CONTROVERSIES. The existence or emergence of deviating views or movements (schismatic, heretical, or sectarian) inevitably produced controversies in which one group attacked the other's position and defended its own. Controversies often crystallized in literary works and were thus responsible for an important part of theological literature. The Bible, for instance, contains many polemics against paganism. The breach with the *Samaritans resulted in a long, drawn-out struggle, the religious core of which was the question of whether Judaism was based on the Torah alone or on the entire Bible, as well as on the Samaritan claims regarding Mount *Gerizim. In the Second Temple period, the Hellenizers (see HELLENISM), profoundly influenced by Greek thought, engaged in controversy with representatives of traditional Jewish thought. The same period saw intensive controversy among the sects, especially between the *Sadducees and *Pharisees. The Pharisees, with their broader interpretation of the Torah, disagreed with the narrow Sadducean tradition. Sectarian controversies involving the *Essenes and others are probably reflected in the *Dead Sea Scrolls, while controversies with *Jewish Christians are preserved in rabbinic literature. The legal controversies between the schools of Hillel and Shamm'ai (see BEIT HILLEL AND BEIT SHAMMAI) were over matters of interpretation rather than fundamentals of faith. The disputes with the *Karaites, forcefully led by *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, were over the acceptance or nonacceptance of rabbinic law; the Karaites dubbed their opponents Rabbanites. The rationalist and philosophical views of Moses *Maimonides brought about the *Maimonidean Controversy, in which his opponents banned his works. Various kabbalistic manifestations were sharply criticized by the mainstream rabbis. The messianic movement led by *Shabbetai Tsevi evoked bitter controversy, of which the Frankist (see FRANK, YA'AQOV) and the Emden-Eybeschuetz (see EMDEN, YA'AQOV; EYBESCHUETZ, YONATAN) controversies were two offshoots. The rise of *Hasidism in the second half of the eighteenth century led to violent disputes in eastern Europe between the Hasidim and their opponents, the *Mitnaggedim. *Emancipation engendered a religious pluralism that led to bitter controversies between the Orthodox and non-Orthodox. The disputes between Orthodoxy and Reform, which were initially directed against such individuals as Abraham *Geiger, acquired an ideological tone after the first Reform council at Brunswick in 1844; they have continued with varying degrees of intensity ever since. The nineteenth century saw an intense controversy surrounding the *Haskalah. The advent of modern *Zionism led to violent disagreements between advocates of a return to Zion and their opponents, including the Reform movement, assimilationists, and some Orthodox Jews.

In the twentieth century, internal divisions, such as those within Orthodoxy or the Conservative movement, or those between religious and secular Jews, have led to the diversification of controversies, as has the creation of the State of Israel. See also MINIM; POLEMICS. For controversies with non-Jews, see DISPUTATIONS.

CONVERSION, FORCED. The forced conversion of the Idumeans (Edomites) to Judaism by John Hyrcanus (135–105) is the only such recorded case of forced conversions to Judaism. On the other hand, Jews have been the victims of forced conversions throughout their history. Rabbis have issued special enactments to provide for Jews who were unable to observe their religion openly, the first case of which occurred in the period immediately preceding the Maccabean Revolt in 168 BCE. Forced conversions to Christianity as a result of mob violence occurred in the Roman empire from the fourth through the sixth century, and it later became state policy in Visigothic Spain and elsewhere. During the *Crusades, a number of Jewish communities, especially in the Rhineland, were given the alternative of baptism or death; in most cases they chose the latter alternative. When, after the persecutions, those who had adopted the dominant faith to save their lives applied to return to the Jewish fold, all rabbinical authorities, including *Gershom ben Yehudah and *Rashi, insisted that they be treated with the utmost tact and consideration, and any mention of their previous lapse was forbidden. If, after their forced conversion (see APOSTASY), they had made efforts to practice Judaism secretly, they were not to be regarded as apostates. Even Moses *Maimonides, who ruled in his Mishneh Torah that a Jew should accept death rather than abandon a single commandment under compulsion, agreed that apostasy under threat of death was not to be punished. The Almohade persecution in Spain and North Africa in 1148 produced a wave of forced conversions. *Maimon ben Yosef, in his Iggeret ha-Shemad, encouraged the forced converts to “hang on by their fingertips.” Maimonides permitted the outward assumption of Islam to save one’s life, since the Muslims, unlike the Christians, required only a formal declaration of adherence to their faith and did not insist on the abandonment of Jewish practices. Forced conversions under Muslim pressure also produced the Daggatun—a Moroccan Berber tribe, traditionally of Jewish origin; and the *Jedid al-Islam, in nineteenth-century Persia. The most extensive forced conversion in Jewish history occurred in Spain following the widespread anti-Jewish excesses that began in Seville in 1391. These converts were called *Marranos (Heb. anusim [forced ones]). A considerable number of Jews remained loyal to the faith despite strong pressures and peril. It was they who were expelled from Spain in 1492. A number of them proceeded to Portugal where they were forcibly converted in 1496; in subsequent centuries, many Portuguese Marranos maintained, in secret, a number of modified Jewish practices (see CRYPTO-JEWS). Problems in Jewish law arose as to the Jewishness of the descendants of forced converts and Marranos who were unable to return to Judaism; it was decided that such a person, upon returning to Judaism, was not required to undergo the obligatory ceremony for proselytes.

COPPER SCROLL, one of the *Dead Sea Scrolls, the only Qumran text to be inscribed on metal. Strictly speaking, it is not a “scroll” but a copper plaque. It was discovered in Cave 3 in 1952, having become badly oxidized and brittle. In order to unroll it, the Copper Scroll had to be segmented into long strips. Written in Hebrew (with Greek ciphers), it describes in a factual manner some sixty-four hiding places of treasures, scrolls, and a second copy of the Copper Scroll. Controversy has arisen over the interpretation of the document, and unsuccessful treasure hunting has been conducted. Some believe that the sheer size of the treasures described in the Copper Scroll are more imaginary than real; they do not believe the scroll was produced by the Qumran community. Others argue that the dry realism of the Copper Scroll’s language is evidence of its documental nature and consider it part of the Qumran-Essene library. A third group believes that the Copper Scroll describes not the hidden possessions of the Qumran community but the treasures and archive of the Second Temple.

CORDOVERO, MOSHEH BEN YA'AQOV (1522–1570), kabbalist. He studied with R. Yosef *Karo and R. Shelomoh *Alkabez, who was his brother-in-law. R. Yitsḥaq *Luria considered himself a student of Cordovero. Cordovero’s family apparently came from Cordoba and may have lived for a time in Portugal. Cordovero served as the head of the Portuguese yeshivah in Safed.

His first major work was Pardes Rimmonim (Kraków, 1592), which he completed at the age of twenty-six. This treats such central kabbalistic subjects as the nature of the divine, theodicy, the cosmos, the human being, and the worship of God. Many themes are found repeatedly in his works. One is the parable of fire and spheres, which is explicated in his magnum opus, Or Yaqar (Jerusalem, 1962–, 23 vols. to date [Part of Or Yaqar is named Shi'ur Qomah, which is his introduction to his Commentary to the Iddrot and was issued separately in Warsaw in 1883]). Prior to the emanation of the sefirot*, there existed the *Ein Sof, the transcendent aspect of the divine. In order to emanate the sefirot, which are the revealed aspect of the divine, the Ein Sof retracted within itself (tsimtsum*) and made space for their presence. The sefirot were then emanated, each one in the form of a sphere encased within a sphere. The divine essence, symbolized by fire, was then able to penetrate these spheres, which functioned as vessels. This fire was, however, less potent than the fire that surrounded the spheres. Another example of Cordovero's mythic system can be found in his Elimah (Lemberg, 1881), in which he describes the nature of God's pleasure. The beneficence and joy of the Ein Sof is not complete until the sefirot, which emanated from him, return to him. The Jewish people are expected ultimately, by virtue of learning the Torah and fulfilling the commandments, to return with the sefirot to the Ein Sof and participate in the divine joy that marks their reunification.

Cordovero's three major works are Pardes Rimmonim, Or Yaqar, and Elimah. Or Yaqar is a running commentary to the complete Zoharic corpus, the Pentateuch, and the Book of Creation. Cordovero's prayer book, Tefillah le-Mosheh (Przemyśl, 1892), which contains his Perush Tefillot Ro'sh ha-Shanah and his Perush Seder 'Avodat Yom ha-Kippurim, contains his commentary to the prayers. A significant section of Elimah remains in manuscript. This work contains discussions concerning the nature of the divine and the cosmos as well as evil, humankind, and the Torah. Cordovero also composed Tomer Devorah (1589), which serves as an appendix to Elimah and is a practical guide of ethics based on the divine attributes. (There is an English translation of Tomer Devorah by Louis Jacobs [London, 1960]). Cordovero also composed two other works. In Or Ne'erav (Venice, 1587) he expounds the importance of the study of Kabbalah. In Sefer Gerushin (Venice, 1601), he documents his mystical activities, in the year 1548, near the graves of the righteous, not far from Safed.

Cordovero poses philosophical questions, but his ensuing discussions reveal his mythic tendencies. His daily rituals were based on theurgic and magical practices that involved bringing down the divine efflux. Cordovero sought to identify with his spiritual models, who were largely based on Zoharic figures. This intention was infused with strong messianic feeling. He held that it was the mystic's duty to intervene in the cosmic order so that he could hasten the redemption. The imitation of the ways of the Zoharic figures characterizes his works no less than those of Yitsḥaq Luria. Each one contains the themes of the affinity between souls and the central importance of intention in prayer (see INTENT). Cordovero studied all the various kabbalistic systems that preceded him. He was influenced by the theosophical-theurgical Kabbalah, particularly that of the Zohar, and also adopted the ecstatic Kabbalah of Abraham ben Shemu'el *Abulafia. He wrote Torat ha-Qabbalah (edited by Samuel Horodetzky [Berlin, 1924]). Cordovero's thought greatly influenced both later kabbalistic thought and Hasidism.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT. See FLOGGING.

CORPSE, a dead human body. In biblical times all who came into contact with a corpse were rendered ritually unclean, as was the building where the corpse was situated together with all inhabitants and any uncovered vessels inside. Purification was effected by sprinkling all contaminated persons and objects on the third day after defilement with water containing ashes of the *red heifer, with an additional sprinkling on the seventh day, together with the immersion of the person defiled and his clothes (Nm. 19.14–22). These regulations are expanded in the Mishnah tractate Ohalot*. *Burial of a corpse was a religious obligation (Lv. 21); only the high priest and Nazirites were absolutely forbidden to come into contact with a corpse. In rabbinic law the prohibition against contact with a corpse applied to all members of priestly families; hence, kohanim cannot remain under the same roof with a corpse, attend burials, or visit the cemetery. In all cases where contact was permitted, subsequent washing of the hands was made obligatory. Care of the corpse is regarded as a particularly meritorious mitsvah and is organized by the hevrah qaddisha'*. Between death and burial the corpse is not to be left alone. Before the funeral the corpse is washed (see TOHORAH). The Orthodox conception of "reverence for the dead body" requires that burial take place within twenty-four hours of death whenever possible.

COSMOLOGY. The connotations of the words heaven, earth, and created have been a constant subject of inquiry and speculation. Traditional Jewish teaching (the rabbis, Philo, and most medieval philosophers) insisted that creation was made from nothing (ex nihilo), but some thinkers, claiming the support of the biblical account itself, held that the universe was fashioned from preexistent, formless matter and interpreted the biblical passages accordingly. By the time of the early rabbis, no systematic doctrine concerning the act of creation had developed. The subject, known as Ma'aseh Be-Re'shit*, was considered an esoteric discipline restricted to initiates only because of the dangers—in particular of dualist and gnostic heresies—that it harbored for the average mind. Nevertheless, much cosmogonic and cosmological speculation is contained in Talmudic and Midrashic aggadah. It is prominent in such writings as the Pirkei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer*, Midrash Qonen, and other subsequent influences on the *Kabbalah, a system in which man, namely the Jew, is held to occupy a central position in the cosmos. This anthropocentric tendency reached its acme in the teachings of Yitshaq ben Shelomoh Luria regarding the "breaking of the vessels" and the cosmic tiqqun. Whereas kabbalistic cosmogony and cosmology were greatly influenced by the Neoplatonic tradition, most medieval philosophers followed the Aristotelian system. *Maimonides summarized his cosmological views in his code (Hilkhot Yesodei ha-Torah) and thereby codified the Ptolemaic system, according to which the earth, surrounded by concentric, incorporeal, and "intelligent" spheres, was held to be the center of the universe. Throughout ancient and medieval times, cosmogony was closely allied to theology in general and mysticism in particular, especially since religious language always used cosmic terminology: things divine are "heavenly" as contrasted with things material and earthly; the spirit soars to "higher spheres" (hence, the influence of cosmology on mystical experience); and so on. Modern *science rendered a completely literal acceptance of the traditional imagery, and of biblical cosmography in particular, a virtual impossibility. There are still literalists and fundamentalists in Orthodox circles, but the general tendency is to agree that the biblical account of Creation is to be read for its moral and religious message rather than for its scientific meaning. See also CREATION.

COSTUME. Information on clothing customs in biblical times suffers from a paucity of illustrative material as well as uncertainty concerning the meaning of clothing terms. The only biblical injunctions in the matter of dress are the prohibition against the wearing of sha'atnez (cloth woven of wool and linen; Lv. 19.19; see KIL'AYIM), the commandment to place fringes upon the four corners of one's garments (Nm. 15.37-41; see TAL-LIT; TSITSIT), and the prohibition against the "abomination" of wearing the dress or accouterments of the opposite sex (Dt. 22.5), though the commentators largely limit this prohibition to men wearing such dress for lewd purposes. Almost all the clothing terms in the Mishnah, Talmud, and Midrash derive from Greek or Latin. During the Talmudic period, the duty of adopting distinctive Jewish garb was raised to the level of a biblical commandment, based upon an interpretation of Leviticus 18.3, "Neither shall ye walk in their ordinances." According to the Midrash, one of the four factors contributing to the redemption of the children of Israel from Egypt was that "they did not change their [distinctively Jewish] garments [for prevailing Egyptian fashions]" (Lv. Rab. 32.5). The law against Jews wearing the garments of gentiles makes it clear that the prohibition is confined, in the words of Yosef Karo, to "garments peculiarly distinctive of the gentiles," or, as Mosheh *Is-serles puts it, "to such garments that suggest brazenness or have an idolatrous connection." Nonetheless, the custom developed for Jews to wear a unique costume as a demonstration of their Jewish identity.

During the late Middle Ages, Polish Jews adopted the then obsolete dress of the Polish noblemen, the fur-trimmed hat (shtreiml) and the long caftan (kapota or tazliq; a long outer garment reaching to the ankles), to which the Hasidim added, for religious reasons, a girdle (Yi. gartel) around the waist (to distinguish, when praying, the "pure" upper part of the body from the "impure" lower and also to symbolize the commandment to "gird one's loins" in God's service). For mystical reasons, Hasidic garments buttoned from right to left. This garb is still worn by Hasidim and in certain ultra-Orthodox Jewish circles and has been invested with a quasi-sanctity.

Married Jewish women typically wore head coverings, and from a certain period, men did as well (see COVERING OF THE HEAD; WIGS). Change of garments was obligatory, where possible, on Sabbaths and festivals (Shab. 113a), and scholars were also supposed to wear distinctive clothing (Ber. 43b; Shab. 113a).

The Jewish badge ordained by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) in order to prevent social mixing between Jews and Christians inspired later authorities to insist that Jews wear some distinguishing article of apparel (such as a badge or hat). In the Middle Ages, Jewish authorities in western Europe issued a series of sumptuary laws designed to help Jews resist Christian fashions and to avoid the arousal of envy by Christians for Jewish ostentation. COUNCILS AND SYNODS, gatherings of rabbis, sometimes convened by the rulers of countries in which Jews lived, sometimes in conjunction with laymen, for the purpose of safeguarding the Jewish religion, regulating the inner life of the Jewish community and its relationship with the outer world, or framing extralegal communal enactments that would thereafter be binding upon all those represented. Antecedents may be discerned in the Great Assembly (Keneset ha-Gedolah) and in rabbinical meetings after the destruction of the Second Temple, such as that at *Yavneh (c.90 CE), where the biblical canon was determined, or Usha' (c.138; see USHA', SYNOD OF), where halakhic rules were laid out. One provision adopted by the latter (see Ket. 49b-50a) required parents to care for their children as long as they were minors, and if parents deeded their property to their children during their lifetimes, the children were required to maintain the parents out of the estate. Councils and synods as distinctive aspects of Jewish self-government developed in the Jewish communities of the Rhineland and northern France at the beginning of the second millennium CE. The first synod in medieval Jewish history was convened (c.1150) by the brothers *Shemu'el ben Me'ir and *Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam, grandsons of Rashi, and was followed by a second synod in 1160. Two of the resulting enactments were the prohibition against having recourse to gentile courts of law and an amendment to R. Gershom ben Yehudah's prohibition against polygamy, which permitted a man to take a second wife if a hundred rabbis from three different provinces testified that his first wife was insane and, hence, incapable of accepting a divorce. An indication of the spirit of the times was a decision by this synod to forbid the purchase of a crucifix or any Christian ritual object by a Jew, lest Jews be falsely accused later of defiling the objects involved and thereby endanger the community. An important topic at many synods was that of finding ways to ease the lot of the agunah—a woman whose husband was missing or who refused to give his wife a divorce, thus making it impossible for her to remarry. Two important synods were held in Mainz in 1220 and 1223 under the leadership of the most distinguished rabbis of the day, *Eli'azar ben Yehudah of Worms and *Eli'ezer ben Yo'el ha-Levi of Bonn. The enactments passed there became generally accepted by Ashkenazi Jewry. Gradually these synods extended the scope of their activities to include every phase of the religious, economic, social, and family life of the Jews. In Spain the available evidence shows that councils and synods were convened by the rulers to review financial and civil matters within the Jewish community. In 1552, Middle Eastern rabbis convened a synod in Jerusalem to determine the sabbatical year. The most important and long-lived synod in Jewish history was the Polish Council of the Four Lands, which consisted of thirty delegates—both rabbinical and lay—and met twice yearly at the fairs of Lublin and Jarosław. This council embraced every possible aspect of Jewish activity. In the religious sphere, for instance, it safeguarded strict observance of the law and bitterly fought the followers of *Shabbetai Tsevi and the Frankists (see FRANK, YA'AQOV). It lasted for some two centuries beginning in 1550. Synods in Saint Petersburg were convened on several occasions during the nineteenth century by the Russian government, the last in 1879 to satisfy governmental interest in Jewish marriage and divorce laws. One of the most famous of modern synods was the Grand Sanhedrin (see SANHEDRIN, FRENCH) convoked by Napoléon Bonaparte in 1807, at which Jews recognized the authority of civil law and set up a central Jewish communal administration in France. A notable synod took place in Kraków in 1903; all the rabbis present (about 50) took a public oath that the *blood libel was absolutely false and that neither the Talmud nor any other rabbinic book contains any mention of the ritual use of blood, which would be contrary to Jewish law. Except for the synod convened by Napoléon, all the synods until the mid-nineteenth century were intent on strengthening the observance of halakhah. That was not the case with the conferences covered by the modern Reform movement, such as the *rabbinical conferences at Brunswick in 1844, Frankfurt in 1845, and Breslau (Wrocław) in 1846. It was at the Frankfurt conference that Zacharias *Frankel parted company with those of the Reform movement and became one of the founders of the Historical school (later Conservative Judaism). One of the most decisive meetings in the history of Reform took place in 1885 in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and produced the *Pittsburgh platform, which guided the movement for several decades. The Central Conference of Reform Rabbis met in 1937 in Columbus, Ohio, and reversed the opposition to Jewish nationalism expressed in the 1885 platform (see COLUMBUS PLATFORM). Each convention of the *Central Conference of American Rabbis (Reform), the *Rabbinical Assembly (Conservative), and the *Rabbinical Council of America (Orthodox) takes stands on problems in contemporary Jewish life, and the same is true for the periodic conventions of the European Orthodox chief rabbis.

COURTS. See BEIT DIN; SANHEDRIN.

COVENANT (Heb. berit), an agreement by which two contracting parties enter into a special kind of relationship (e.g., of solidarity, friendship, obedience, etc.). The biblical concept of covenant has its roots in ancient Near Eastern models but thoroughly transforms them. A covenant could be made between man and his fellow or between man and God and was usually confirmed by some kind of ritual symbolizing the union of the partners. Such bonds between men are illustrated by the biblical accounts of the covenant between Jacob and Laban (Gen. 31.44) and that between the king and the people during the reign of Zedekiah (Jer. 34). In the former, God is invoked as a witness of the sanctity of the covenant (Gen. 31.53); the latter solemnly provided for the release of all Hebrew slaves, and its subsequent breach by the slave owners was also regarded as a breach of the basic covenant between God and the people of Israel (Jer. 34.14–16). The account in Jeremiah (34.18–19) also describes the ceremonial part of the covenant, which consisted of the two parties passing between the two halves of a calf (cf. the Hebrew idiom karat berit [cutting a covenant]; Gen. 15). The covenant that God made with Abraham and subsequently confirmed to Isaac and Jacob is fundamental to the theological understanding of the development of Judaism. The original covenant with the patriarchs was renewed, this time with the whole people, at Sinai (Ex. 24), where the people accepted the obligations of the law ("the two tablets of the covenant"; cf. Ex. 31.18, 32.15ff.). The covenant was renewed again by Ezra (Neh. 8). God's eternal fidelity to his covenant, in spite of Israel's backsliding, is a major theme in aggadah and liturgy (cf. also Lv. 26.42–45). The new covenant mentioned by the prophets (e.g., Jer. 31.30–33) is understood as spiritual renewal, written on their hearts, and not as a new covenant replacing the old. Outward signs serve to testify to the permanent validity of a covenant, notably *circumcision—berit milah, the covenant par excellence—for the covenant of Abraham and the Sabbath (Ex. 31.16–17). Other, more specific, covenants conferred the priesthood on the house of Aaron (Nm. 25.12–13) and kingship on the house of David (Ps. 132). A covenant involving mankind as a whole, and indeed the entire natural order, was made with Noah (Gn. 9.12–15); according to Jeremiah (33.19–21, 25–26) the specific covenants with Israel and David are everlasting. The traditional idea of a covenant between God and his people is presupposed by the prophets and forms the background of their preaching. The prophetic curses are also to be understood in the light of traditional maledictions attached to treaties, imposed upon whoever breaks the terms of the pact.

COVENANT, BOOK OF THE (Heb. Sefer ha-Berit) as used in the Torah (Ex. 24.7), the written listing of "all the words of the Lord and all the statutes," spoken by God to Moses on Mount Sinai (Ex. 20.19–23, 33; see GIVING OF THE TORAH) and written down by Moses upon his descent from the mountain. Moses read this document aloud to the people, who, in a covenant ceremony featuring the blood of sacrificial offerings, unanimously reaffirmed their solemn promise to abide by all the commandments contained in the "book" (Ex. 24.3–8).

Modern biblical scholars use the term to refer to the law code in Exodus 21–23, incorporated in the Elohist (E) source. Similarly, the term "Minor Book of the Covenant" refers to the shorter law code, also designated by the Torah as a covenant, in Exodus 34.10–26, assigned by scholars to the Yahvist (J) source.

The term has also been used for the document found in the Temple when renovations were undertaken by King *Josiah of Judah in 622 BCE (2 Kgs. 23.2, 21; 2 Chr. 34.30), as a result of which a major cultic reform was conducted. This document is referred to both as a Sefer ha-Berit and as a Sefer ha-Torah (Book of Instruction [or Law]); thus, it is traditionally believed to have been a long lost copy of the entire Torah that had been neglected during the previous reigns. Biblical scholars believe it to have been the book of Deuteronomy*. See also BIBLE.

COVERING OF THE HEAD (Heb. kissui ro'sh). There is little basis in ancient Jewish law for the custom of going about with the head covered, or even for covering the head during prayer and other religious exercises. It is an outstanding example of custom (see MINHAG) assuming the force of law. The most explicit reference to it in the Talmud is the statement of R. Huna' ben Yehoshu'a that he would never walk four cubits bareheaded, since "the Divine Presence is above my head" (Qid. 31a). Thus, covering the head became a sign of reverence and awe and an acknowledgment of the omnipresence of God. The Bible prescribes that the high priest wear a miter (Ex. 28), but otherwise bareheadedness (gillui ro'sh) was the prevailing custom. The Babylonian custom was to cover the head, especially during prayer, as a mark of piety, and with the ascendancy of Babylonian influence (including the Talmud Bavli), the importance of covering the head grew. The growth of Islam subsequently strengthened the concept of keeping the head covered during prayer. Yitsḥaq Alfasi (Qid. [Vienna ed.] 217b) and Maimonides (Yad, Hilkhot De'ot 6, Hilkhot Tefillah 5.5) both followed the Babylonian tradition and prohibited uncovered heads. Yet it took a long time for this custom to gain universal acceptance. As late as the thirteenth century, R. Yitsḥaq ben Moshe of Vienna expressed his disapproval of boys going up to read the Torah bareheaded: "The custom of our rabbis in France of reciting blessings with uncovered head does not meet with my approval" (Or Zaru'a 11.43). Shelomoh Luria (16th cent.) wrote in a responsum (No. 72): "I do not know of any prohibition against pronouncing blessings with uncovered head . . . were it not for the fact that I am not accustomed to differ from the ancient teachers, I would be inclined to be lenient and utter blessings, or even recite the Shema', with uncovered head . . . the prohibition against uncovering the head even when not at prayer astonishes me; I do not know its source." Rabbi Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna (the Vilna Ga'on) agreed with him that the prohibition was based on custom only. However, the seventeenth-century rabbi David ha-Levi of Ostrog found religious prescription in his interpretation of the Talmudic view of Leviticus 18.3, "we shall not walk in their ordinances" (huqqat ha-goyim); that is, Jews should cover their heads at prayer because Christians do not. The wearing of a skullcap (Heb. kippah; Yi. yarmulke), found among Ashkenazim from the early eighteenth century, became a universal custom among Orthodox Jews. The prevalent custom among strictly Orthodox Jews is to keep their heads covered at all times during their waking hours, and all traditionalist Jews cover their heads when praying. When the *Reform movement emerged in nineteenth-century Germany, the covering of the head, even at prayer, was one of the customs it tended to abandon. *Neo-Orthodoxy, seeking to combine tradition with life in a non-Jewish society, gave limited permission for Jews to go bareheaded when among non-Jews, setting a precedent for *Conservative Judaism, which made covering the head obligatory only at prayer and study. In the course of time, different attitudes emerged among the Reform: certain temples in the United States even forbade covering the head, although Hungarian *Neology (Hungarian brand of Reform Judaism) retained the practice at worship. More recently, there has been a growing tendency among Reform Jews to pray with covered heads, and a number of younger Conservative and Orthodox rabbis and laypeople wear head coverings throughout the day. This is, in some measure, the result of the influence of Israeli religious Jews who follow that practice. For married women, the obligation to cover the head goes back to ancient times (see Is. 3.17; B. Q. 8.6) and a wife's public bareheadedness was grounds for divorce (Ket. 7.6). In modern times, Orthodox married women cover their heads with a *wig or head scarf when in public. In Hasidic communities, women cut off all their hair before marriage and thereafter wear a head scarf (Yi. tikhel). In Yemen, unmarried women, too, covered their hair. Traditionally, men covered their heads to show respect for the presence of God; women did so as a sign of feminine modesty. Many feminists, therefore, in all modern movements of Judaism, while refusing to wear a head covering for the sake of modesty, have encouraged the use of a covering, particularly during prayer, as a similar gesture of respect for God. The practice within Conservative congregations regarding head covering for women is now in flux and varies considerably.

COVETOUSNESS, the wrongful desire to possess what belongs by right to another. The tenth commandment (Ex. 20.17), which forbids covetousness, is the only commandment in the Decalogue transgressable by thought rather than action, and rabbinic teaching takes it for granted that man can conquer his sinful desires. The later books of the Bible (especially Prov.) outspokenly condemn covetousness as a major sin undermining society and moral relationships (cf. Mi. 1.1–2). God abhors the covetous man (Ps. 10.3); the rabbis regard the violation of the tenth commandment as a violation of the entire Decalogue (Pes. 107a). They also say that the covetous man will eventually lose whatever is his (Sot. 9a). On the other hand, spiritual covetousness, which takes the form of a desire to emulate others in spiritual matters, is regarded as praiseworthy on the grounds that "the envy of scholars increases wisdom" (B. B. 21a).

CREATION. The question of how the cosmos and its workings (in biblical language, "heaven and earth and all their array," Gn. 2.1) came into existence has preoccupied all cultures and given rise to a large number of "creation myths." The first chapter of the Bible introduces God—who later reveals himself also as ruler of the universe, lawgiver, judge, redeemer, loving father, lord of history, and the source of providence—the Creator. The universe and human beings are not divine but are created. The *Sabbath, observance of which was specifically incumbent on Israel as a sign of God's *covenant with them, is the weekly commemoration of this original act. The account in Genesis does not use philosophical terminology and has lent itself to various interpretations, but it came to be taken as an assertion of creation out of nothing (creatio ex nihilo): "God said . . . and there was . . .," rather than the giving of form to some primordial, eternal, and preexistent matter. The latter view, argued in terms of Greek philosophical tradition in either Platonic or Aristotelian versions, was rejected by most, though not all, medieval theologians, who argued (e.g., Moses *Maimonides) that although the orthodox position was as incapable of proof as its alternative and had to be accepted on the authority of Scripture, it was nevertheless rationally defensible. Some medieval thinkers also suggested a distinction between the biblical verbs bara' (creation out of nothing) and yatsar (creation out of something). Belief in one Creator–God ruled out dualism, pantheism, and emanationism, although the last came to the fore again in connection with the kabbalistic doctrine of emanations (sefirot*). CREED, an authoritative and binding summary of the articles of faith and the fundamental doctrines of a religious community, usually set out in the form of dogmatic statements or questions and answers (*catechism). Whereas the process of the formulation and adoption of such creeds has been a major feature of the history of Christianity, it has played almost no role in the spiritual development of Judaism. The absence of a supreme ecclesiastical body authorized to formulate a catechism is not the sole reason for the virtual absence of creeds in Judaism. It was often felt that the very idea of such formulation ran counter to certain fundamental tendencies in Jewish theology, which is concerned not only with beliefs but very largely with commandments, of which R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' said, "Be as heedful of a light precept as of a grave one for you know not the grant of reward for each precept" (Avot 2.1). In the view of the ancient rabbis, faithful and devout observance of the commandments (with its implicit faith) was more important than faith in the sense of formal and credal assent to theological statements; hence, the Midrash could put into the mouth of God the wish: "Would that they abandoned me, but observed my commandments—since the light thereof will turn them again to me" (Lam. Rab. introd.). Man is judged by his actions and not by the creed he professes. The nearest approach to a creed in Judaism is to be seen in certain rabbinic statements emphasizing religious fundamentals or defining the actions or beliefs by which a person forfeits his share in the olam ha-ba'* or qualifies as an apostate (see APOSTASY). Rabbi Siml'ai (Mak. 23b–24a) declared the eleven injunctions of Psalm 15, the six of Isaiah 33.16, the three of Micah 6.8, and Habakkuk 2.4 ("The righteous shall live by his faith") to be the quintessence of the 613 precepts (see COMMANDMENTS, 613), although R. 'Aqiva' stated that the commandment "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev. 19.18) was the "great principle of the Torah" (Sifra' Qedoshim 4). All these statements, however, cannot be said to constitute a creed. *Philo (1st cent. CE) was the first philosopher to formulate something like a creed, but his five principles (the existence and rulership of God, the unity of God, the creation of the world, the unity of creation, and divine providence) left little mark on the subsequent history of Jewish theology. Of the various attempts made by the medieval philosophers to formulate a creed, the most successful and enduring is Maimonides' statement of the *Thirteen Principles of Faith, but despite its popularity (the well-known hymn *Yigdal is a poetic version) it has never been formally regarded as binding, and several thinkers objected to it on various grounds. The philosopher Hasda'i Crescas reduced the principles to six (divine omniscience and omnipotence, providence, prophecy, human freedom, and the purpose of Torah [spirituality and felicity] and of man [to love God]). Yosef *Albo in his Iqqarim opposes Maimonides and maintains that there are only three basic dogmas: the existence of God, divine revelation, and retribution. No doubt there always was a body of beliefs or even dogmas held by Jews—not necessarily identical at all times and in all groups—but these beliefs were generally implicit in law and practice, expressed in liturgy and prayer (e.g., the confession of the unity of God in the *Shema', or of the resurrection of the dead in the *Amidah), or expounded in moral and homiletical literature, rather than formally defined in credal statements. In the nineteenth century, creeds came to play a greater role in Judaism. The *Reform movement, partly in imitation of the Christian churches, partly in order to clarify and justify its own deviation from traditional rabbinic Judaism, tried to state its beliefs in declarations or "platforms" (cf., e.g., the *Pittsburgh platform) that partook of a credal, but not necessarily dogmatic, nature. Creeds were also embedded in catechisms that were particularly popular in the nineteenth century. See also DOGMA.

CREMATION, disposal of the dead by burning. Interment of the dead in the ground or burial in a cave or mausoleum has been Jewish practice throughout history. Rabbinic ruling, based on Deuteronomy 21.33 and codified by Maimonides (Sefer ha-Mitsvot 231, 53b) and in the Shulhan 'Arukh (Yoreh De'ah 362), regards interment as a positive command.

Various biblical references to burnings at the burial of some kings (Jer. 34.5; 2 Chr. 16.14, 21.19) probably relate to the burning of incense as a mark of respect. The case of the people of Jabesh-gilead who burned the mutilated bodies of King Saul and his sons (1 Sm. 31.9–13; 2 Sm. 2.5) was unique, and cremations are not reported in any other biblical narratives.

Halakhic authorities prohibited cremation. Capital punishment by burning, mentioned in biblical law, was interpreted as the pouring of molten lead down the criminal's throat (San. 7.2; Y., San. 7.24b). One argument against cremation is that it is a rejection of the concept of kevod ha-met (respect due to the deceased); to commit the body to destruction by fire is tantamount to the deliberate burning of something that was once sacred. Cremation was also held to imply a rejection of the belief in physical *resurrection.

In spite of the general prohibition against cremation, the Orthodox United Synagogue in London, as well as some leading rabbis in western Europe, have permitted it as long as the ashes, after a normal funeral service, are buried in a coffin. The Conservative Rabbinical Assembly law committee in the United States permits its rabbis to officiate at a service in a funeral home before a body is taken to a crematorium. The Reform movement permits the practice, though it is discouraged in some communities, and its rabbis may officiate at the service and the burial of ashes in cemeteries.

CRESCAS, HASDAI BEN AVRAHAM (c.1340–1410), Spanish philosopher. He was born and taught in Barcelona, where he was a leader of the community and later *crown rabbi of Aragon. In his later years he lived in Saragossa. His main work, Or Adonai, is a closely reasoned critique of Aristotle and the Aristotelian rationalist tradition in Jewish thought, as represented in particular by Maimonides. Crescas propounded an innate Jewish teaching, based on logic as well as Jewish sources, to replace what he saw as an alien philosophy. Steering a middle course between philosophic rationalism on the one hand, and a growing Spanish tendency toward mysticism on the other, Crescas rejected the traditional proofs for the existence of God and insisted that certainty in this matter rested solely on the authority of the Bible. He criticized Maimonides' formulation of thirteen principles of faith and proposed his own list of basic principles. Fundamental is the existence of God, which implies his unity, incorporeity, and uniqueness. Then come six essential dogmas: God's omniscience; his providence; his omnipotence; prophecy (the prophet being elected for love of God); human freedom; the purpose of the Torah and of human kind (to love God). There are also obligatory beliefs, denial of which constitutes heresy: creation ex nihilo; immortality of the soul; reward and punishment; resurrection of the righteous; eternity of the Torah; superiority of Moses over other prophets; the Urim and Thummim oracle that enabled the high priest to foresee the future; and the coming of the Messiah. According to Crescas, love of God rather than specific beliefs regarding the nature of creation or an intellectual understanding of the divine was the main concern of religion. His criticism of the twenty-five principles of Aristotelian physics as presented by Maimonides at the beginning of the second book of his Guide of the Perplexed implied a conception of the world in which infinity is a reality and the eternity of the world should, therefore, not be a problem for a believer. Crescas also criticized Maimonides for his failure to quote sources, cite the opinions of others, and offer halakhic solutions for new situations in his Mishneh Torah. Maimonides' halakhic work was, in the eyes of Crescas, limited and rigid like the Aristotelian universe. Or Adonai was written in Hebrew and completed in 1410. It was first printed in Ferrara in 1555 and was translated into English in 1929 by Harry A. Wolfson as Crescas' Critique of Aristotle. Crescas, who lost a son in the anti-Jewish riots of 1391, also wrote a critique of the Christian religion to win back Jewish apostates. Written in Catalan, it has survived only in a Hebrew translation by Yosef Shem Tov made in 1451 called Bittul 'Iqqari ha-Notserim (The Refutation of the Christian Principles, translated by Daniel J. Lasker [Albany, 1992]). A Sermon for Passover, with philosophic considerations about God and the human free will, has been published from two manuscripts (Derashat ha-Pesah le-Rabbi Hasdai Kreskas . . ., edited by Aviezer Ravitzky [Jerusalem, 1989]). Crescas's theological work was continued and popularized by his disciple Yosef *Albo, and his writings influenced Spinoza.

CRIMINAL LAW. See PENAL LAW.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE. Jewish criminal law and criminal court procedure are dealt with in Mishnah tractate Sanhedrin* (particularly chaps. 3 and 4), which emphasizes the differences in the treatment of civil and criminal cases. Whereas the former may be tried in a court of three judges, the latter requires a court of at least twenty-three. In criminal cases, the judges must consider first the arguments for acquittal before turning to any charges made against the accused. A majority of one is required for acquittal, but a majority of two is needed for condemnation. There can be no retrial once a defendant has been acquitted of a criminal charge, whereas there can be any number of retrials if there is a guilty verdict. Any witness may be heard for the defense of the accused, but there are serious limitations to accepting witnesses for the prosecution. A guilty verdict cannot be declared on the day of the completion of the trial, but no delay is necessary before a verdict of innocence. Judges in criminal cases must be priests or Levites, of especially pure lineage. Witnesses in criminal cases are given a severe warning to tell nothing but the truth and are cross-examined in a most painstaking manner. A court that perseveres in its cross-examination is considered especially praiseworthy. At least two witnesses are required to secure condemnation and almost any contradiction renders their testimony invalid. Hearsay or circumstantial evidence is not tolerated in the court. Even where guilt was certain, many courts hesitated to pronounce a death sentence and would search for an argument to free the accused; rabbinic law exhibits an aversion to capital punishment. Some rabbis are quoted as saying that a court that pronounced a death sentence even once in seventy years was a "bloody court." In periods of national emergency and the like, men were put to death for such crimes as informing, but this was not usually a court procedure.

Many modern scholars maintain that the medieval decisors of Jewish law developed a system of criminal law and criminal procedure predicated on the system of justice called the king's law (din melek) or on the intrinsic power of a Jewish court to punish violators of Jewish law, and that these procedural rules were used by Jewish courts to punish violations even when a violation could not be proven to the satisfaction of the requirements of Talmudic laws. These scholars maintain that the intent of the rules of Talmudic law was to punish only flagrant, intentional violations of law and that the normative rules of criminal procedure were governed by the king's law or similar concepts.

CROWN OF THE LAW. See KETER.

CROWN RABBI, rabbi appointed by the secular authorities as the official representative of the Jewish community to the government. From 1394 to 1401, for instance, Yosef Orabuena, physician to the king of Navarre, was appointed as rabi mayor de los Judeos del reyna, "chief rabbi of the Jews of the kingdom," and in 1432 Avraham Benveniste convoked a synod in Valladolid in his capacity as rab de la corte* (court rabbi). Such appointments were not necessarily made on the basis of the piety or scholarship of the nominee, and for this and other reasons the appointments were looked at somewhat askance by the Jewish community. This dissociation was most pronounced in czarist Russia, where the crown rabbis (kazyonny ravvin*) were regarded as mere government puppets, whose authority was completely ignored in all but purely official matters, while the real spiritual authority was vested in the dukhovner (Orthodox rabbis) who were the real heads of the community. CRUSADES, the holy wars proclaimed by the papacy and western Christianity in western Europe at the end of the eleventh century with the avowed purpose of wresting the Holy Sepulcher from the hands of the Muslims. The Crusades marked a turning point in the history of the Jews of Christian Europe. From the prime objective of defeating the "infidels" in the Holy Land, Christians turned in an outburst of hate against the Jewish "infidels" in their midst. As early as 1094, Godfrey of Bouillon declared that he would avenge the blood of Jesus on the Jews, leaving none alive. The First Crusade of 1096 brought with it the virtual extermination of such ancient Jewish communities as Speyer, Worms, and Mainz. The tragedy is commemorated to the present day in the Ashkenazi rite in a Sabbath prayer (*Av ha-Rahamim) for "the holy congregations who laid down their lives for the sanctification of the Divine Name" and in the dirge Arzei Levanon found in the liturgy for 9 Av. The concept of *martyrdom became a supreme value in Ashkenazi Jewry, and the choice of death over conversion was compared with the sacrifice of Isaac (see 'AQEDAH). When the Crusaders finally reached Palestine and stormed Jerusalem in 1099, they drove all Jews there into a synagogue and burned them alive. The pattern of anti-Jewish massacres, following resolute refusal on the part of the Jews to accept conversion to Christianity, was repeated throughout Europe during subsequent Crusades, although in the Second Crusade they were protected by Bernard of Clairvaux, who equated killing a Jew with killing Jesus and forbade attacks on Jews. The Crusades increased Jewish-Christian tensions and were the prelude to a period of intensive Christian antisemitism (blood libels, allegations of Host desecration, expulsions, etc.).

CRYPTO-JEWS, Jews who, as a result of coercion—usually the threat of death—outwardly adopt the dominant faith yet clandestinely continue to maintain Jewish practices. Such groups existed after the Christian Visigoths imposed forced conversion in Spain in the seventh century and the Almohads imposed Islam in North Africa and Spain in the twelfth century. From the late thirteenth century to the sixteenth century, baptized Jews, known as neofiti (neophytes), continued to observe Jewish practices in southern Italy, with their center in Trani, and were persecuted by the Catholic church. *Marranos

(and *Chuetas in Majorca) are the best-known examples. The crypto-Judaism of the *Dönme (those who continued to follow *Shabbetai Tsevi even after his adoption of Islam) belongs to a different category. Their outward acceptance of Islam was a voluntary act undertaken to follow the example of their master. In 1838, the Jews of Mashhad (Persia) were the victims of an outburst of mob violence and were faced with the alternatives of death or the adoption of Islam. Those who could not escape outwardly took the Islamic faith but maintained their Jewish practices and religious exercises with extreme devotion, eventually returning to Judaism (see JEDID AL-ISLAM). CULI, YA'AQOV (c.1685–1732), rabbi and author of the first parts of the Judeo-Spanish encyclopedic Bible commentary Me'am Lo'ez. Born in Erets Yisra'el, Culi was the grandson of R. Mosheh ibn Habib of Jerusalem, and in 1714 he moved to Constantinople, where he married the daughter of R. Yehudah Rosanes, head of the city's beit din, and was appointed dayyan. Me'am Lo'ez was intended for the "Sephardi nation," which had reached its height in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries in its western European and Mediterranean communities. Culi published the first volume of Me'am Lo'ez, on Genesis, in 1730 and was working on the next volume, on Exodus, when he died. However, he left manuscripts allowing other scholars to continue his work. The volumes on the Pentateuch were concluded in 1782; volumes on many of the later books of the Bible followed.

The commentary draws its sources from the traditional branches of Jewish learning; Talmudic studies expressed in Bible commentaries, halakhic literature, and responsa; midrash and aggadah; and kabbalistic literature, notably the Zohar. There is also a rich vein of legends, proverbs, and anecdotes. The work is completely free of Shabbatean traits, although the influence of Shabbetai Tsevi was still strong in parts of Turkey. It is possible that Culi's objective was to bring back Jews from heretical influences to the traditional sources by making these available in the language they understood—Judeo-Spanish. Culi carefully distinguishes the various sources before producing his synthesis, and his method was continued by his successors, from Yitsḥaq Magriso to Yitsḥaq Peraḥyah, who completed the commentary. Despite the fact that the work was only concluded at the end of the nineteenth century, it forms a consistent unit, especially the commentary on the Pentateuch. At the same time, some of the later writers made their own mark, such as Rafa'el Ḥiyya' Pontremoli, who wrote the commentary on Esther, in which he noted the Purim customs of the Jews of Izmir and Jerusalem. Me'am Lo'ez is written in a popular style and is regarded as a masterpiece of Judeo-Spanish literature. It has profoundly influenced Ladino-speaking Jews and was reprinted many times.

CYRUS, (Heb. Koresh), Persian King Cyrus II (r. 550–530), founder of the Achaemenian dynasty and the Persian empire. His major contribution to Jewish history was the conquest of Babylon in 539 BCE, setting the stage for the Edict of Cyrus in 538 BCE, which allowed the Judean exiles to return to Jerusalem and rebuild the Second Temple (Ezr. 1.1–4; 6.1–5; 2 Chr. 36.22–23). Cyrus's actions ended the period of the Babylonian exile and ushered in the return to Zion and the beginning of the Second Temple period. Accordingly, Cyrus was the only non-Israelite in the Hebrew Bible to be theologically labeled the mashiah (anointed one) of God, whom God had specifically chosen to carry out his mission on behalf of his people Israel (Isa. 44.24–45.8). In the Cyrus Cylinder (*ANET*³, 315–316), on the other hand, the priests of Marduk wrote that deposed chief god Marduk had specifically chosen Cyrus to conquer Babylon in order to restore him to the head of the Babylonian pantheon.

DAF YOMI (דף יומי; daily page [i.e., of the Talmud]), a program whereby individuals throughout the world study the same single Talmudic folio page (i.e., two sides) each day, thereby ensuring that participants in the program complete the entire Talmud in approximately seven and a half years. The daf yomi was first proposed by R. Me'ir *Shapira' at the 1923 congress of the Agudat Israel movement as a way to enable Jews who studied the Talmud regularly to have a common Talmudic topic to discuss when they met. The daf yomi has become an established part of the Orthodox life, with hundreds of classes being offered daily throughout the world. Those involved in the program who are traveling often attend classes in whichever city they happen to be. In recent years the daf yomi has been distributed in the form of cassette tapes, with each daily tape running approximately an hour. There are also cities where the daf yomi is available by telephone twenty-four hours a day (except for Sabbaths and festivals) from a prerecorded tape.

DAMASCUS DOCUMENT, one of the texts of the *Qumran community. It is also known as the Zadokite Document or Covenant of Damascus, and copies of it were found both in the Qumran caves (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) and the Cairo *Genizah. There are two medieval copies (MSS A and B) from the storeroom of the Ezra Synagogue in Cairo and ten exemplars (5Q12, 6Q15, 4Q266–273) from the Qumran caves. Reconstruction of the document from the original manuscripts and fragments shows that the original may be roughly divided into five sections: an introduction, admonitions, various laws on purity and sacrifices, rules regulating entrance into and life in the community, and a conclusion. The medieval recension of the Damascus Document appears to be shorter than the Qumran version, leaving out the introduction and conclusion as well as various laws and communal rules from the third section. Where the medieval manuscripts and Qumran fragments overlap, however, the differences are minor.

The Damascus Document, at least according to the longer Qumran version, has been characterized as primarily a legal text with an introductory admonition. It shares with the Rule of the Community* and Temple Scroll* manuscripts distinctive legal teachings (e.g., on polygamy, incest, and oaths), although some have been adapted for life in outlying communities. The admonitions section of the Damascus Document is important for the study of the origins of the Qumran community, since it appears to recount the gathering of a faithful remnant under the leadership of a Teacher of Righteousness. The work relates that members of the sect left the land of Judah to sojourn in the land of Damascus, hence, its name, but scholarly opinions differ as to whether the reference to Damascus is to be taken literally.

DAN, the fifth of Jacob's children and the first born to his maidservant Bilhah (Gn. 30.5–6). Originally Dan was assigned a territorial allotment northwest of Judah in the coastal plain. However when this area proved too restrictive due to combined Amorite and Philistine pressure, the tribe relocated to the far north of Israel at the foot of Mount Hermon (Jos. 19.40–48). This transitional period in the history of the tribe is reflected in the Samson stories (Jgs. 13–16) as well as in the account of the tribe's conquest of Laish, which they renamed Dan (Jgs. 18). This site achieved notoriety in biblical tradition as a major cultic center of the northern kingdom of Israel, in which the golden calf, erected by Jeroboam I, was worshiped (1 Kgs. 12.28–30). Excavations at modern Tel Dan have uncovered remains of what may have been Jeroboam's sanctuary as well as extensive fortifications.

DANCE. The Bible illustrates examples of dance among the Israelites: Miriam led the women in dance after crossing the Red Sea (Ex. 15.20–21); the people danced around the golden calf (Ex. 32.19); and David's ecstatic solo in front of the Ark on its arrival in Jerusalem (2 Sm. 6.14–16) epitomized individual joy.

Dance was used on the *Shalosh Regalim, the pilgrim festivals to Jerusalem. It was featured at the *Simḥat Beit ha-Sho'evah (Suk. 53a), and dancing with burning torches is described in Sukkah 5.4. Later, on Simḥat Torah, it became customary to dance with the scrolls of the Torah in the synagogue. In Second Temple times, young girls danced in the vineyards on *Tu be-'Av, when the young men selected their brides. The Talmud refers to dance, and responsa literature contains many examples of dance practice in Diaspora communities.

The Talmud commands all wedding guests to dance to ensure the joy of the bride and groom (Ket. 17a). In medieval Germany, the Tanzhaus or community dance house was built because of the need for the whole community to dance at weddings; the rabbi sometimes functioned as the dance leader. Later the badḥan* or jokester led the mitsvah tanzes, a genre of wedding dances developed especially in the Hasidic communities. Yemenite wedding dances include special dances for the bride at the henna ceremonies. Although both Sephardi and Ashkenazi communities developed different repertoires for men and women—the rabbis forbade mixed dancing—the Sephardim permitted dance during the Sabbath while the Ashkenazim did not. Dance played a major role among males in Hasidic worship, which stressed the aspect of joy.

As Jews reestablished life in Erets Yisra'el in the twentieth century, the halutsim (pioneers), especially on the kibbutzim, re-created ancient agricultural festivals (first fruits, 'omer, etc.) incorporating dance. Immigrants from Muslim lands brought with them the various dance traditions that had developed in their own communities.

DANGER. Two biblical verses—"Only take heed to yourself and keep your soul diligently" and "take good heed to your souls" (Dt. 4.9, 4.15, respectively)—were interpreted by the rabbis as a positive biblical commandment enjoining the duty of personal safety and the consequent avoidance of danger to life. The Talmud prohibits, among a long list of other things, entering a ruined building (Ber. 3a), drinking contaminated water (Pes. 112a), and not taking dietary precautions (Hul. 9b). In addition, the Talmud rules that "a man should never court danger in the hope that he will be miraculously delivered" (Shab. 32a). A corollary to this injunction to preserve one's own life is the doctrine of piquah nefesh, the sacred duty to go to any lengths to save the life of another human being. This duty is a major principle of law, taking precedence over and annulling all other prescriptions of Judaism with the exception of the three cardinal sins of idolatry, sexual immorality, and the shedding of innocent blood (Ket. 19a). In particular, all the laws of the Sabbath or even Yom Kippur can be overridden in the face of this duty (Ber. 61b; Yoma 8.7). When the saving of life is involved, there must be no hesitation or delay, nor may the duty be delegated to another person, but "even the greatest in Israel" must perform it (T., Shab. 16). All illnesses are regarded as endangering life, so that the laws of piquah nefesh also operate in the case of sickness, and the instructions of a physician must be followed. A person who persists in fasting on Yom Kippur in defiance of a doctor's orders is regarded as having profaned that holy day by refusing to eat.

DANIEL (Heb. Daniyye'l), hero of the Book of Daniel, which is found in the third section of the Bible, the Hagiographa, between the Book of Esther and the Book of Ezra. He is portrayed as an exilic prophet and may be modeled on the Daniel famous for his righteousness, along with Noah and Job, who is mentioned in Ezekiel 14.14, 20 and 28.3. The Ugaritic epic of Aqhat mentions a righteous king named Daniel, who supplicates the gods and functions as a judge, championing the cause of widows and orphans.

The Book of Daniel, composed both in Hebrew (chaps. 1–2.4, 8–12) and Aramaic (chaps. 2.5–7.28), is divided into two sections reflecting two different literary genres. The first section, which consists of chapters 1 through 6, is a collection of independent, first-person tales about Daniel and his three companions, given the Babylonian names of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who, after being deported to Babylonia, rose to prominence in the courts of Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and Darius the Mede. Chapters 7 through 12 are a collection of third-person, pseudonymous, apocalyptic tales of symbolic visions interpreted by an angelic figure, which take place in the courts of Belshazzar, Darius the Mede, and Cyrus. According to tradition, the entire book was written by Daniel during the Babylonian exile.

The first section, dated by scholars to the Hellenistic period, approximately the mid-fourth century BCE, commences with the account of Daniel and his three friends training for the king's service, while strictly adhering to the observance of the dietary laws. In chapter 2, Daniel interprets Nebuchadnezzar's dream about a colossal statue as symbolizing the rise of four successive pagan kingdoms—Babylonia, Media, Persia, and Greece—and their ultimate collapse, crushed by a stone representing the deity. Chapter 3 relates the miracle of the blazing furnace into which Daniel's three compatriots are hurled after they refuse to obey Nebuchadnezzar's order to worship a golden idol and from which they emerge unscathed. Nebuchadnezzar's dream of a hewn tree and his being turned into a wild animal is interpreted by Daniel in chapter 4 as foreshadowing the king's temporary punishment of insanity for the sin of hubris and his eventual restoration. Chapter 5 recounts the feast of Belshazzar and Daniel's interpretation of the mystical handwriting on the wall as referring to the ultimate division of the pagan kingdom. Chapter 6 tells the miracle of the lions' den, into which Daniel is tossed when fellow ministers report to Darius the Mede that Daniel had continued his three-times-a-day prayer vigil, even after the king prohibited all prayers except those to himself. Daniel emerges from the den uninjured, while his detractors, who were similarly punished, were devoured instantaneously. All of these stories offer a paradigm for Jews living in the Diaspora, showing that a person can maintain complete fidelity to his religion against the religious demands of pagan rulers.

Section two, chapters 7 through 12, dated to the Macabean period, reflects the persecutions of Antiochus IV Epiphanes from 168 to 164 clothed in symbolic language. Chapter 7, recounting the emergence of four beasts from the sea, is interpreted by an angel to refer to the rise of four successive kingdoms, the fourth that of the Seleucids, whose last king, Antiochus, would institute an oppressive reign of three and a half years, only to be completely annihilated by the rise of a fifth and final kingdom, that of the God of Israel. That deity is depicted here (7.9) anthropomorphically as an old man with white hair called the "Ancient of Days." In chapter 8, a two-horned ram (Media and Persia) is engaged in combat with a he-goat (Greece), who, after breaking the former's horns, has his own horns broken into four, representing the kingdom of Alexander the Great and later Greek kingdoms, eventually leading to the growth of a "small horn" (Antiochus IV). Daniel is informed by the angel Gabriel, in chapter 9, that Jeremiah's prophecy of the seventy years of the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer. 15.11–12, 29.10) is to be understood as seventy weeks of years, that is 490 years, at the end of which Antiochus will defile the Temple by placing within it an "appalling abomination"—the statue of Zeus—that will eventually be destroyed (9.27). Chapters 10 through 12 present a historical panorama from Cyrus to Antiochus IV (539–164), calculating the end of world history and the final resurrection of the wholly righteous (12.2–3). This formed the basis for mystic and apocalyptic calculations of the end of days and the advent of the Messiah. Section two is characterized by ex eventu prophecies (prophecies recounting events that have already occurred); it depicts supernatural forces active in the universe, with each nation having its own angelic champion (Israel is protected by Michael); it relates the concept of predetermination in history; and it contains a message of hope to the Jews during the difficult period of persecution. Several fragments of eight manuscripts of the Book of Daniel have been discovered at Qumran, dating from the late second century BCE to the early first century CE.

DANIEL, ADDITIONS TO BOOK OF, three extended passages found in the Greek translation of the Book of Daniel but not in the text preserved in the Hebrew Bible. These textual units did not belong in the original Book of Daniel, as can be seen from their contents and their intrusion in the flow of the narrative, but it is less clear whether they were translated from Hebrew or Aramaic or originally composed in Greek. Dating the additions is equally difficult, especially since it is possible that they circulated independently before being appended to the Danielic corpus. The first of the three additions, The Song of the Three Children, builds on the events of Daniel 3.8–30, where Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah are thrown into the fiery furnace. The addition includes Azariah's prayer, in which he blesses God, admits the nation's sins, and asks God not to abandon his servants. The Lord's angel subsequently descends into the furnace and protects the three young men from the flames. Seeing this, they sing a hymn of thanksgiving, blessing the Lord and exalting his powers. The second of the three additions, Susanna and the Elders, tells the story of Susanna, a married Jewish woman who is falsely accused of idolatry by two Jewish elders whose sexual advances she had rejected. On the basis of their testimony she is tried and sentenced to death. As she is about to be executed, Daniel appears on the scene, and by cross-examining the two elders demonstrates the falsity of their testimony. Susanna is freed, and the two elders are summarily executed. The third of the three additions, Bel and the Dragon (or Snake), consists of two short stories recounting Daniel's schemes against the Babylonian idols. In one story, Daniel proves that the enormous quantities of food supposedly consumed by the Babylonian god Bel actually are stolen every night by his priests. The priests are put to death and Bel's idol and temple are destroyed. In the other story, Daniel feeds a snake, whom the Babylonians worship, with a mixture of pitch, fat, and hair, causing the creature's death. The angry Babylonians throw Daniel into the lions' den, but the prophet Habakkuk sustains him there until his eventual release. English translations are to be found in standard editions of the Apocrypha.

Dari's parents emigrated from Spain to the city of Dar'a in Morocco, and Mosheh was born in Alexandria, Egypt, and also lived in Damascus and Jerusalem; he was a physician by profession. DARKHEI SHALOM (דַּרְכֵי שָׁלוֹם; ways of peace), the rubric of darkhei shalom is one of the principles underlying the legislative activity of the rabbis. The major goal of legislation based upon this principle is the prevention of disputes and the promotion of public peace and tranquility. Mishnaic examples of such legislative activity that have remained in force despite the fact that no such obligations or rights exist under regular Talmudic law are the enactment that non-Jews must always be greeted and the provision that property rights may be held in relation to the contents of animal traps and fish nets (Git. 5.8–9). The Talmud develops ownership rights in relation to bees, doves, geese, and fowl on the basis of this principle (B. Q. 114b). A similar rubric, mi-shum eivah (to prevent enmity), was also propounded by the rabbis and provides the basis for a number of important laws with respect to legal relations between husband and wife, parents and children, and Jews and non-Jews (Ket. 47a, 58b; 'A. Z. 26a).

DARSHAN (דַּרְשָׁן; expounder), beginning in the Talmudic period, the term for a preacher or homilist. The word comes from the same Hebrew root as *Midrash, and the darshan was seen as the quintessential creator of Midrashic material, particularly of a homiletical or aggadic nature. The darshan preached the derashah (sermon or homily) in the synagogue on Sabbaths and holidays; the derashah was related to the Torah or haftarah readings for those days. The preacher usually was seated, possibly on a special chair or throne. The meturgeman or amora standing alongside sometimes translated the darshan's homily from Hebrew into Aramaic and delivered it with musical intonation. These features of Talmudic preaching emphasized the respected role the darshan played in ancient synagogue life. However, darshanim did not hesitate to engage in active repartee with their audiences, answering questions posed by members of the congregation. Though most of the darshanim whose comments make up much of rabbinic literature were ordained rabbis, some local preachers criticized the official rabbinic establishment (see Gn. Rab. 80.1). Darshanim continue to preach, with some exceptions, in many parts of the Jewish world. See also MAGID.

DAVID (reigned c.1010–970), second king of Israel; youngest son of Jesse of the tribe of Judah. Born in Bethlehem, where he herded his father's sheep, he is described as "skilled in music, a man of valor and a warrior, sensible in speech and handsome in appearance, and the Lord is with him" (1 Sm. 16.18). Having despaired of the reign of *Saul, the prophet *Samuel was sent on a clandestine mission to anoint David as king (1 Sm. 1–13). The biblical account of the early relationship between David and Saul is confused and contradictory. According to 1 Samuel 16, Saul suffered from depression and melancholia, and David, "the sweet singer of Israel" (2 Sm. 23.1), was brought to court in order to raise the king's spirit through his musical abilities. According to 1 Samuel 17, it was David's victory over the Philistine warrior Goliath that drew the king's attention to him. The relationship between the two began to deteriorate with the public acclaim accorded to David's military prowess (1 Sm. 18.6–9ff.). Following an unsuccessful attempt on his life by Saul, whose daughter Michal he had married, David fled to the Judean wilderness, where he gathered around himself an army of four hundred followers and became an ally of the Philistines (1 Sm. 18–30). He subsequently spared Saul's life on two occasions (1 Sm. 24, 26). After Saul's death in the battle of Gilboa, David—at the age of thirty—was crowned king. He won victories over external enemies, including the Philistines, and proceeded to conquer *Jerusalem, which he made the capital of his kingdom. After this success David brought the *Ark of the Covenant to Jerusalem, an act that highlighted the cultic significance of the city. He was subsequently assured by the prophet Nathan of an enduring dynasty (2 Sm. 7). In 1994 a monument written in Aramaic relating the victory of a king of Aram over Israel was discovered at Dan in northern Israel and contains the first extra-biblical reference to the "house [dynasty] of David." David's desire to build the Temple was thwarted by Nathan, who informed David, in God's name, that only David's son would merit this distinction. According to the *Book of Chronicles, which presents a highly positive view of David's life by omitting almost all of the negative episodes, the rationale for David's unsuitability to build the Temple was that he was a man of war who had shed too much blood (1 Chr. 22.8). Nevertheless, according to this account David formulated the plans for the building of the Temple and also organized the priests, Levites, musicians, and gatekeepers connected with it.

David's wars occupy an important place in the biblical account. The united monarchy that he established expanded greatly, encompassing large portions of Transjordan, Greater Syria up to the Euphrates River, and Philistia along the Mediterranean coast, and was unmatched in the history of ancient Israel. Nevertheless David's military successes did not ensure him either a tranquil court life or universal domestic allegiance. The rivalry among his sons and the traditional conflict of interest between Judah and the northern tribes fueled the far-reaching, if ultimately unsuccessful, revolts of his son Absalom and Sheba, son of Bichri. Even David's commission of Solomon as his successor came about in the shadow of intrigues and betrayals. The biblical account of David's life story (1 Sm. 16ff.; 2 Sm.; 1 Kgs. 1– 2; 1 Chr. 10ff.) faithfully portrays his complex character—as statesman, warrior, poet, friend, and lover, in times of good and ill fortune (notably in his adultery with Bath-sheba and the murder of her husband), sinning and repentant. Tradition ascribes to David the composition of many psalms (see PSALMS, BOOK OF). In later generations his exemplary qualities became the ideal of Israelite kingship, and God's covenant with David was considered as firm and eternal as his covenant with Israel (see Jer. 33.19–26 and the many references in the liturgy); hence, it is said that the future king and restorer of Israel's fortunes will be a scion of the house of David (Is. 9.5–6, 11.10; see MESSIAH). The copious aggadic treatment of David is, in the main, highly laudatory; it has also found its way into the Qur'an. Christianity regards David as an ancestor of *Jesus. The degree to which David's personality fired the popular imagination is expressed in the adage, "David king of Israel lives forever" (R. ha-Sh. 25a). The traditional site of his tomb in Jerusalem has become the object of pilgrimages (see DAVID, TOMB OF).

DAVID, CITY OF. See JERUSALEM.

DAVID, DYNASTY OF. In 2 Samuel 7.11–16, in response to his plan to build God a house (i.e., a temple), *David is told that, on the contrary, God will build David a house, that is, a hereditary, dynastic monarchy. David's incredulity (2 Sm. 7.19) and his earnest prayer that this promise be fulfilled (2 Sm. 7.25–29) indicate just how extraordinary this promise—the Davidic covenant (2 Sm. 23.5; Ps. 89.4, 35)—was in biblical thought. Sometimes it is presented as an unconditional grant, in which God resolves that even if some of the Davidic rulers sin against him, he will chasten them but never reject them (2 Sm. 7.14–15; Ps. 89.29–38); elsewhere, it is thought to be contingent upon David's descendants' loyalty to God's commands (1 Kgs. 2.4, 8.25, 9.3–7; Ps. 132.11–12). David's son *Solomon ruled a united Israel after him. After the schism, the southern kingdom of Judah alone continued to be ruled by David's descendants, twenty in number, the last of whom was Zedekiah (see KINGS, BOOK OF). With the destruction of the First Temple, the Davidic monarchy ended. The prophecies of Ezekiel foresaw the restoration of the ancient dynasty, and some of the earliest leaders of the return to Zion (Zerubbabel and perhaps Sheshbazzar) were scions of the Davidic house. When hopes for reinstating the Davidic line failed to materialize, however, the belief in the eternity of the Davidic dynasty led to the messianic hope characteristic of Second Temple times and of later Judaism, according to which a Davidic king will arise at some future time and restore Israel's fortunes as of old (see MESSIAH).

DAVID, SHIELD OF. See MAGEN DAVID.

DAVID, TOMB OF. The Bible relates that David was buried "in the city of David" (1 Kgs. 2.10). There are a number of references to the tombs of the house of David, but these were apparently destroyed or obliterated after the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (c.132–135). The site was probably southeast of present-day Jerusalem (near the village of Silwan). Popular tradition refused to accept the disappearance of David's tomb, and various sites (especially in Bethlehem) came to be venerated. The present localization of the tomb at a site to the south of old Jerusalem on what is (erroneously) called Mount Zion dates back a thousand years. For centuries the Arab custodians forbade Jews access to the tomb, but after the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, it became a center of Jewish pilgrimage, especially since Jews could no longer visit the Western Wall, which remained in the Jordanian section of Jerusalem. After the Six-Day War in 1967, when Israel captured the Old City of Jerusalem, the Tomb of David became a secondary site of pilgrimage. Visits to the Tomb of David are customarily made, particularly by the Sephardim of Jerusalem, on Shavu'ot, the traditional date of King David's death.

DAVID BEN SHELOMOH IBN AVI ZIMRA (1479–1573), rabbinical authority and kabbalist, known by the acronym Ridbaz. Scion of a distinguished family in the Spanish town of Zamora, he was among the refugees of the expulsion of 1492 and at age thirteen arrived in Safed in Erets Yisra'el. He then lived in Jerusalem until moving to Egypt in 1513. After a short stay in Alexandria, he settled in Cairo, where he became head of Egyptian Jewry, giving authority to the new battei din, thereby strengthening the autonomy of dozens of communities. As their religious leader, he issued a number of ordinances (taqqanot). His reputation was widespread, and he wrote responsa to queries from many lands.

David was a spokesman for rabbinical Judaism in disputes with Muslim and with Karaite scholars. He returned to Erets Yisra'el in, or about, 1553, spending the last twenty years of his life in Jerusalem and Safed, where he served as dayyan.

His expertise was in halakhah and Kabbalah. He approached textual study critically, comparing different manuscripts to reach the most accurate reading. His halakhic decisions tended to be stringent, although he chided those who "heap restrictions on restrictions." He wrote about the methodology of the Talmud and laid down rules for Talmudic interpretation in the event of conflict among later authorities. Although a kabbalist, he gave preference to the Talmud where this clashed with mystical thinking.

Over twenty-four hundred of his responsa were published in Teshuvot ha-Ridbaz (7 vols. [Warsaw, 1882]), and others have been discovered. They throw much light on Jewish religious, communal, social, and economic life in his time, particularly in the eastern Mediterranean countries. He wrote many works on halakhah, including Yeqar Tiferet, which is a partial commentary on Maimonides' Mishneh Torah (Smyrna, 1757), and on Kabbalah.

DAVID BEN SHEMU'EL HA-LEVI (1586–1667), Polish halakhist and rabbi; known as Taz, an acronym of the title of his best-known work. A student of his father-in-law, Yo'el ben Shemu'el Sirkes, David established a study house in Kraków before becoming rabbi in Poznań in 1620 and Ostrog in 1641, where he succeeded Sirkes. During the Chmielnicki uprising, David fled Poland, composing two penitentiary prayers commemorating his miraculous escape (published in Yalqut Menahem by Menahem Mendel Biber in 1903). In 1654 he returned to a rabbinic post in Lwów, where he died. An outstanding figure, he took part in the meetings of the Polish-Jewish autonomous body, the Council of the Four Lands. His major work, Turei Zahav, is a commentary on the Shulhan 'Arukh* and the Arba'ah Turim. Although his stated aim was to harmonize the various halakhic rulings that had appeared, the work is not merely a legal code but also a discussion and commentary on the sources of the works. He used pilpul* as a hermeneutic tool and tended to leniency on issues involving social and economic hardship. After the publication of the first volume of Turei Zahav, on Yoreh De'ah (Lublin, 1646), he engaged in a dispute with Shabbetai ben Me'ir ha-Kohen*, whose parallel commentary was issued in the same year. David's other, less authoritative, volumes of Turei Zahav were published posthumously (Hamburg, 1692; Zólkiew, 1754; Berlin, 1766). Despite his somewhat critical approach to the Shulhan 'Arukh, his work became one of the two standard commentaries printed together with it. He also wrote Divrei David (Dyhernfurth, 1689), a supercommentary on Rashi's commentary on the Pentateuch.

DAY AND NIGHT. The Hebrew word yom (day) can refer both to the period of daylight (as opposed to nighttime) and to the entire span of twenty-four hours. The twenty-four hour day is reckoned from evening to evening. In Jewish law, part of a day is often taken as a full day, for example, in counting the days of mourning or in calculating the eighth day after birth for circumcision. Many commandments may be fulfilled only during the daytime. A Talmudic hour constitutes one-twelfth of the period of daylight and therefore varies with the seasons. The period from sunset until the "rising of the morning star" constitutes the night (Heb. laylah). There is, however, some doubt as to the exact incidence of the two outer limits. In discussing the advent of night the rabbis differ as to whether its hour is to be reckoned from sunset or from the appearance of the stars; for this reason the Sabbath and festivals are regarded as beginning with sunset, or "when the sun is at the top of the trees," but they conclude with the appearance of three stars of medium magnitude on the following night. Similarly the end of night is reckoned either when one can distinguish between blue and white or between blue and green (Ber. 1.2). The night is divided into three (Ber. 3a) or four (Ber. 3b) watches. In Jewish law certain activities cannot be undertaken at night, such as the beginning of court sessions, the signing of documents, or the passing of a capital verdict. The obligatory night reading of the Shema' can be carried out at any time before dawn, but the rabbis taught that it should be read before midnight, that is before the middle of the hours of darkness, depending on the season. DAY OF JUDGMENT. See YOM HA-DIN.

DAY OF THE LORD, originally, the day on which the Lord would reveal himself to the nations in all his power and might to destroy the enemies of Israel in punishment for their sins against his people. Some scholars have suggested that the concept grew out of the Day of War, when the Lord manifests himself as a "man of war" (Ex. 15.3) "mighty in battle" (Ps. 24.8). The idea occurs repeatedly in prophetic literature (Isaiah, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Zephaniah, and Malachi). During the period of the Babylonian exile, Day of the Lord prophecies were directed against specific peoples (Babylonia, Is. 13.6–13; Egypt, Is. 46.2–12) and included promises of salvation for Israel (Is. 61.2–3; Ez. 34.12). DAYYAN (דַּיָּן; judge), title given to the judge of a rabbinic court. According to the Talmud, the Sanhedrin* of the Chamber of Hewn Stone (lishkat ha-gazit), which met in the Temple, consisted of seventy-one judges; lower courts of twenty-three judges were to be found on the Temple mount and in every community containing a Jewish population of at least a hundred twenty adult males. In smaller communities, the courts had only three judges. This system did not parallel the modern system of appellate courts; each court was of different jurisdiction. Monetary matters could be heard by courts of three, but capital cases, among others, only by courts of twenty-three. Certain matters were the sole prerogative of the Sanhedrin of seventy-one. Since *ordination could be conferred only in Erets Yisra'el, the jurisdiction of judges in the Diaspora was restricted (e.g., even in civil cases, they could not impose fines). With the lapse of ordination, judges were considered sheliḥim (representatives of properly ordained dayyanim). Over the course of time the function of judge was combined with that of rabbi (see RABBI AND RABBINATE), and in medieval times, in many countries, rabbinic courts enjoyed considerable autonomy. A single judge was deemed competent to try a case if he was recognized as an outstanding scholar (mumḥeh) or if the parties agreed to accept his decision; otherwise cases were heard by more than one judge—usually three. In exceptional cases a judge could reach his decision by exercising his judgment rather than by applying the letter of the law. In addition to scholarship, a judge also had to possess certain moral qualities: a good name, humility, fear of God, detestation of money, love of truth, and love of his fellow man. According to the Talmud, familiarity with languages and secular subjects as well as an impressive physical appearance were also desirable qualities of a judge. Once appointed, a judge was to be held in high esteem, and the Bible (Ex. 22.27) prohibits his disparagement. Those disqualified from acting as witnesses (see WITNESS) were also disqualified from serving as judges. Presently, even in the State of Israel, most cases of law are heard in the general courts, and only cases regarding issues of personal status are heard by rabbinic judges. See also BEIT DIN.

DAYYENU (יָיְנוּ; It Would Suffice Us), thanksgiving litany, recited during the Pesah *Seder service, with the repeated refrain dayyenu. It is of unknown authorship but possibly dates to the ninth century CE (it first appears in the siddur of *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on). It lists the accumulation of divine favors for which Israel is grateful to God.

DEAD SEA SCROLLS, a collection of fragmentary remains of almost 850 ancient Jewish documents. The first seven scrolls were discovered in a cave at the shore of the Dead Sea in 1947. Between 1952 and 1956 an additional ten caves yielded scrolls and scroll fragments.

These documents were painstakingly assembled by 1960, but for a variety of reasons most of the documents remained unpublished for several decades. By the 1990s, scholarly editions and translations of the remaining texts were rapidly being published, and the entire corpus was available for study.

It is generally believed that these scrolls were gathered by a sect (see QUMRAN COMMUNITY) that occupied the ruins known as Khirbat *Qumran from some time after 150 BCE until 68 CE, when this site, adjacent to the caves where the scrolls were found, was destroyed by the Romans during the Great Revolt of the Jews against Rome. The composition of the texts included in the scrolls ranges over a very long period, beginning with the earliest books of the Hebrew Bible. The nonbiblical works were composed between the third century BCE and the turn of the era. The preserved manuscripts date from the third century BCE through the early first century CE, although the vast majority of the scrolls were copied in the first two centuries BCE. This dating, originally arrived at by paleographical and archaeological study of the ruins, has been confirmed by sophisticated carbon-14 dating. This means that most of the works preserved in this ancient library were not composed by the sectarians who inhabited the building complex at Qumran. It also means that the texts are pre-Christian and for this reason have no direct references to Jesus or John the Baptist.

From the earliest stages of Qumran research, it has been determined that the scrolls, the caves, and the ruins were related. This is because the caves preserve a unique pottery assemblage, including a type of jar specific to Qumran in which some of the scrolls were found. The only exception is an exemplar from nearby Jericho, which was the nearest commercial center to Qumran.

The archaeological excavation of the ruins, carried out between 1951 and 1956, determined that the site was occupied during a number of periods. Initially, Qumran served as a border outpost in the period of the divided monarchy, and some remains of an Iron Age cistern and some walls testify to this period. The core of the building complex seems to have been in use by 150 BCE, and shortly afterward the period of sectarian occupation seems to have begun. This period featured a large communal dining hall and a great number of ritual baths and Jewish burials. Some interruption of the occupation may have occurred as a result of the earthquake that hit Judea in 31 BCE, but otherwise the buildings continued to be used until their destruction at the hands of the Romans.

Since the remains at the site indicate appropriate facilities for a Jewish religious group (loosely termed a sect), and since the documents include previously unknown compositions by such a group, it has been concluded that the sect occupied the building complex at Qumran, gathered the scrolls of the Bible as well as works by their own and other authors, and hid them in the caves where they were found two millennia later.

The scrolls can be divided roughly into three separate categories. Approximately one third of the material represents books of the Hebrew Bible. Parts of all of the books of the Hebrew Bible are found except for Esther. While some scholars believe that Esther was not part of the biblical canon at Qumran, others see its absence from among the biblical fragments as mere coincidence. A second group of scrolls is made up of apocryphal or pseudepigraphous texts, that is, Jewish texts from Second Temple times that in some way relate to the Bible and that were part of the general literary heritage of the Jewish people at this time. In certain cases, these books were previously known in Greek, Ethiopic, or other languages, and the Qumran manuscripts preserved the text in the original language. In other instances these are previously unknown works. The third type of texts is that of the sectarian compositions, works composed and transmitted within the group. These texts are the most important for the discussion of the identification of the sect. However, the collection as a whole must be studied to illumine the history of Judaism during this period, later developments in Judaism, and the rise of Christianity.

In 1910 two fragmentary medieval manuscripts of a previously unknown work recovered from the Cairo *Genizah appeared in England. These manuscripts were later determined to be part of the Dead Sea Scrolls, when ten partial copies of the same text were found in the Qumran caves. The publication of this text in effect began the debate over the identity of what would become known as the Dead Sea sect even before the discovery of scrolls in the Judean desert in 1947. Various theories identified members of the sect as Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, Christians, Zealots, and Karaites. Some scholars argued that these were the documents of a previously unknown group.

After the discovery of the Qumran scrolls in 1947, most scholars identified the sect with the *Essenes, a group mentioned by Josephus, Philo, and other ancient writers. This is the prevailing view among scholars, even though the precise meaning of the word Essene is uncertain, and it does not occur in the Dead Sea Scrolls. Recently, some have concluded that the Jewish legal tradition of the sect stems from that of the *Sadducees, which has led to modifications of the Essene theory, namely that the Essenes grew out of a group of Sadducees who split from their brethren in the aftermath of the Maccabean Revolt (166–164). Others have called for a redefinition of the term Essene to designate a type of sectarian group but not necessarily one particular sect.

The scrolls have done much to shed light upon the Hebrew Bible in the first two centuries BCE. They provide early evidence for the concept of a three-part biblical canon—Torah, Prophets, and Writings—as found in the rabbinic tradition. While all the books that are part of the accepted canon were also considered holy by the sectarians (with the possible exception of Esther), it is possible that they also included Jubilees and a version of the Testament of Levi in their Bible.

Within the books there is also evidence of textual variation. Indeed, the sectarians tolerated multiple texts of the same book, in a way that later Jews would have found unacceptable. A few biblical fragments show evidence of the Hebrew text that was translated into Greek as the *Septuagint. Other fragments show evidence of the text that formed the basis for the Samaritan Penta-teuch. The vast majority of texts are either of the Proto-Masoretic variety, pointing toward the fixed texts of the Talmudic period, or of a mixed type that often included the linguistic forms known from the compositions of the Qumran group. Yet by the time of the Masada and Bar Kokhba' texts, from the first centuries CE, the proto-Masoretic text had become standard. No New Testament texts have been found at Qumran.

The scrolls attest to the rich variety of approaches that existed to Jewish law and theology in the second and first centuries BCE. In addition, they have also made clear the extent to which messianic speculation was practically the norm in many Jewish groups at this time. They have indirectly thrown light on the early history of rabbinic tradition, since they preach so extensively against the approach of the *Pharisees, the forerunners of the rabbis. Much of what is known as the rabbinic tradition in the Mishnah was already the norm among the Pharisees in this period, a conclusion that has confirmed the historical value of both Josephus and later rabbinic accounts.

The scrolls also help scholars to understand better the origins of Christianity. Much of what was interpreted as foreign influence is understood to stem from Jewish roots. It is now more clearly understood how Jesus differed from the Jewish groups of his time. Yet no direct links can be shown between Jesus and the scrolls; in fact, many substantial differences exist between his teachings and those of the Qumran sect.

The Dead Sea Scrolls have opened up a new chapter in the study of Judaism. The investigation of these documents is really only at its beginning, and many more important conclusions are still anticipated.

DEAD SEA SECT. See QUMRAN COMMUNITY.

DEAF, RETARDED, AND MINORS, a group of persons deprived of legal rights in Jewish law because they are regarded as lacking understanding and responsibility. "Deaf" refers to the deaf-mute and excludes such categories as a person who is mute but who can hear or a person who once possessed the powers of speech and hearing. According to the Talmud, the deaf, retarded, and minors cannot claim property by virtue of undisturbed possession, their business transactions are invalid, and they are barred as witnesses. They are exempt from punishment if they cause injury to others, but if they themselves are injured, the person responsible is liable. Talmudic law allows the marriage of a deaf-mute, and specifies that the marriage can be contracted by signs.

• Tzvi Marx, Halakha and Handicap: Jewish Law and Ethics on Disability (Jerusalem and Amsterdam, 1992).

DEATH occurs with the cessation of respiration and heartbeat. Brain death is accepted by all Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist decisors but only by some Orthodox decisors. The rabbis stressed the natural aspect of death and tried to minimize the dread with which it is anticipated. Since the human body belongs to God as creator and the time of death is therefore determined by God, death must not be precipitated (see SUICIDE). It is forbidden by Jewish law to do anything to hasten death. Not only is *euthanasia strictly forbidden, but anyone who performs the slightest action that may inadvertently hasten death is regarded as having shed innocent blood. However, the issues are complex and have been a major topic of discussion among rabbis throughout the centuries. New medical technologies have raised questions about the treatment of the dying (see MEDICAL ETHICS).

The Bible contains almost no information about life after death. There is an implicit belief that the spirit survives death, but there is no mention of a doctrine of divine retribution. Under some circumstances, the deceased could be contacted; for example, the deceased prophet Samuel is conjured by the witch of En-dor at the request of King Saul (1 Sm. 28.7ff.). The spirit of a dead person descends to Sheol, where it continues in some kind of shadowy existence. However, the lack of a fully developed belief in life after death did not diminish respect for the body, and a proper *burial was required. Belief in a connection between the living and the dead led to *necromancy, which was prohibited (Dt. 18.10). The Bible emphasizes that the fate of the body is "from dust to dust" (Gn. 3.19; Ps. 104.29ff.). However, the Book of Daniel (12.2) mentions the *resurrection of the righteous.

A more clearly defined doctrine of the nature of the soul and of its relationship with the divine after death emerged in the post-biblical period. By the time of the Talmud, the concept of an *afterlife had become highly developed and had a number of components. Souls continued after death and received either *reward or punishment based on the person's conduct during life (divine retribution). The righteous were assigned to the garden of *Eden to receive their reward, and the wicked were assigned to *Geihinnom to receive their punishment, which was generally not supposed to last more than twelve months. The Pharisees developed the doctrine of bodily *resurrection, which was one of the major doctrinal disputes between the Pharisees and Sadducees. The controversial nature of the concept of resurrection can be seen from the discussions in the Talmud (San. 10). In the Middle Ages, Maimonides included resurrection and divine reward and punishment in his *Thirteen Principles of Faith.

In rabbinic thought, death came to the world through sin, either through the sin of Adam or through one's own personal sin. Though the rabbis list a number of individuals who died without sin (Shab. 55b), a prevalent idea in Judaism is that death constitutes a punishment for sinfulness. This view is supported by the doctrine that "there is not a righteous person on earth who does good and does not sin" (Eccl. 7.20). Thus, "Even Moses and Aaron died through their sin, as it is said, 'Because you believed not in me' . . . Hence had you believed in me, your time would not have come to depart" (Shab. 55a). As a result of this doctrine, the rabbis go to great lengths to explain the death of children. The barrier between life and death is regarded as complete and impenetrable, though the view is expressed that the corpse remains sensate until the grave is covered over or until it disintegrates (Shab. 152a). Death brings with it a purging of sin (Shab. 8b) and acts as a kind of atonement (Sifrei on Nm., "Shelah" 112). A person should not be allowed to die alone, and relatives and friends should remain with the dying person to the end. As soon as a person dies, the eyes are reverently closed; those present say the *Tsidduq ha-Din and formally rend their garments. Common practices (Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 339.5), probably of superstitious origin, include covering mirrors and pouring out standing water in the home of the deceased.

Reform Judaism, in the Pittsburgh platform of 1885, explicitly rejected resurrection and the concept of the garden of Eden and Geihinnom as places of, respectively, reward and punishment. Reform Judaism emphasized, immortality of the soul and naturalistic immortality, that is, the continuation of a person's influence on the world even after death.

DEBORAH (Heb. Devorah; 12th cent. BCE), prophet, judge, poet, and military leader in the period of the Judges. Two stories relate her great achievements: a prose account (Jgs. 4) and a victory poem attributed to her (Jgs. 5). According to the prose narrative, she was a local judge in Ephraim who had an oracle and summoned Barak with a plan to deliver the Israelites from the Canaanite king Jabin of Hazor. Barak agreed to fight only if she went with him; whereupon she predicted that a woman would decide the fate of the battle (Jgs. 4.9).

After the battle by the Kishon River between the soldiers of the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali, and Sisera, the Canaanite, the latter fled, only to be killed by Jael, thus fulfilling Deborah's prediction. The poem differs in details as to the exact place of battle, the participating tribes, and the extent of God's supernatural intervention. It is constructed around female figures: Deborah, "a mother in Israel"; Jael; and Sisera's mother.

DEBTS. The Bible insists that a creditor refrain from embarrassing his debtor or acting in an exacting manner toward him (Ex. 22.24). Debts were dissolved every seventh year (see PEROZBOL; SHEMITTAH). All Israelites who had been sold into slavery to pay off debts were released or redeemed in the jubilee year (see YOVEL). A debtor's goods could not be seized in the event of his failure to meet his obligations, though at a later period this ruling had to be modified. According to post-biblical legislation, a loan (or a sale on credit) is presumed to fall due in thirty days in the absence of any special terms. When a date for payment has been set, neither the creditor nor his executors may demand payment prior to the date originally agreed upon. After repayment, acquittance is to be made by a formally attested receipt (shover). Since the geonic period, a creditor could insist, at or after the time of contract, that the debtor repay the loan only in the presence of witnesses. Upon partial repayment the creditor may insist upon receiving a new bond for the remainder or he may offer a shover for the part paid. For an orally incurred debt (where no bond exists) the debtor is entitled to a shover on payment. Transference of a debt from the creditor to a third party, to whom the creditor is himself indebted, is considered valid if the transference takes place in the presence of all three parties. When a loan is contracted without formal bond, the real estate of the borrower is not subject to seizure by the creditor in the event of failure to repay the loan. Usury is condemned in the Bible; Jewish law is equally condemnatory of charging interest, although historical circumstances necessitated certain modifications in this respect. DEDICATION (Heb. hanukkah), ceremony whereby a building is dedicated to a sacred purpose, or a plot of land is dedicated to be used for a *cemetery. There is explicit reference in the Bible to the formal dedication of the three biblical sanctuaries: the Sanctuary in the wilderness (Nm. 7), the Temple of Solomon (1 Kgs. 8; 2 Chr. 5–6, as well as Ps. 30—the Psalm of Dedication), and the Second Temple (of the altar, Ezr. 3.9–12; and of the Temple, Ezr. 6.16–18). In the post-biblical period, the rededication of the Temple by *Judah the Maccabee three years after its desecration by the Syrians led to the institution of the eight-day festival of *Hanukkah (1 Mc. 4). Ceremonies for the dedication of other sacred buildings are of comparatively late origin. It is possible that homes were dedicated in biblical times (Dt. 20.5), but if so, the custom lapsed. Until recently Ashkenazim merely affixed the *mezuzah and uttered the appropriate blessing, although an order of domestic service for the dedication of a home was evolved among Sephardim. In the nineteenth century, the British chief rabbinate composed a prayer for hanukkat ha-bayit (dedication of the house), which includes Psalms 30 and 15, those verses of Psalm 119 that acrostically spell the word berakhah (blessing), and special words of dedication. The occasion is accompanied by a feast for those attending—when dedicating a house in Erets Yisra'el, the feast is obligatory because a mitsvah is being fulfilled; elsewhere it is optional. There is no standard or statutory service for the consecration of a synagogue, but it usually includes Psalm 30 and seven circuits of the synagogue with scrolls of the Torah. There is also an order of service for the dedication of a cemetery, including the recitation of penitential prayers at the morning service on the day of dedication. Members of the burial society (hevrah qaddisha) fast on the day of the dedication. A medieval custom, sanctioned by R. *Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Hasid but no longer practiced, was to kill a cock (the word gever in Hebrew means both "cock" and "man") and bury it as the first funeral in the newly dedicated cemetery.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF. See HANUKKAH.

DEED, a legal document. In the Bible, the word sefer indicates a legal document (Dt. 24.1–3); in rabbinic literature, shetar. The term get, originally also used by the rabbis for any legal document, came gradually to refer only to a bill of *divorce. In Jewish law, every legal document consists of two parts: the tofes, a general formula standardized for different types of documents; and the toref, an open portion containing the specific terms and nature of the individual contract, the names of the parties, date, time, and so on. While for all normal transactions ready-made documents may be used, in the case of a bill of divorce the document must be specially prepared. A formally attested document enjoys a presumption of validity; however, if this presumption is called into question, a court may rule on the authenticity (qiyum or henpeq) of the document. A document may serve in a dual capacity: it may act as the validating instrument (see ACQUISITION) in the purchase of land; or as proof that ownership was transferred by means of some other acquisition. In the case of a bill of divorce, the actual transfer of the document from husband to wife (in front of witnesses) effects the divorce. The act of betrothal may be performed in like manner. While documents may be entered as valid evidence, witnesses may not testify in writing.

DEGREES, SONG OF (Heb. Shir ha-Ma'alot), the superscription on Psalm 120 through Psalm 134. The title may refer to the custom of reciting the psalms while traveling up to Jerusalem or while ascending the Temple steps. It is customary among Ashkenazim to recite these psalms after the Minḥah service on the Sabbaths between Sukkot and Pesah and on Tu bi-Shevat. One of these psalms (126) is sung before Birkat ha-Mazon on Sabbaths and festivals as a reminder of Zion. This custom, based on passages from the Zohar, is late and first appears in print in the seventeenth century.

DEISM, in contrast to theism, is the view that God exists as the cause of the universe but does not actively influence its operation. The universe created by the God of deistic thought has been compared to a clock that, once constructed and wound, functions independently of its maker. Deism reached its classical form in the eighteenth century. Traditional theism, both biblical and rabbinic, although also using much philosophical terminology, such as God as the "First Cause," is opposed to deism, since theism assumes God's constant *providence and solicitude for his creation (and individual creatures), his power to intervene in the course of nature and history (*miracles, *revelation), and his moral judgment of human actions. Mystical thinkers (e.g., the kabbalists), far from attributing independent existence to the universe, held that it would return to utter nothingness and nonbeing if God's sustaining presence were withdrawn even for a moment. Deism was a major influence on the eighteenth-century Enlightenment and was popular among its thinkers as "Natural Religion," that is, religion without revelation. Deism, therefore, in spite of its plea for tolerance, exhibited contempt for Jewish (meaning biblical) superstitions, such as belief in revelation, miracles, and the like. The Jews were thus, by definition, regarded as an "illiterate, barbarous, and ridiculous people," and deism must therefore be counted among the influences in modern *anti-semitism.

DELLA REINA, YOSEF (15th cent.), kabbalist and hero of a legend about an attempt to end the power of Satan and bring about the messianic redemption by magical means. Della Reina belonged to a school of kabbalists in Spain that developed new concepts concerning the powers of evil and redemption. Rabbi Avraham ben Eli'ezer ha-Levi, a kabbalist who emigrated to Jerusalem at the beginning of the sixteenth century, recorded in his Iggeret Sod ha-Ge'ullah the earliest version of a story describing R. Yosef della Reina's attempt to overcome Samael and Amon of No; he failed when he was seduced into burning incense before them. This story was known in Safed, and both Mosheh ben Ya'aqov *Cordovero and Ḥayyim Vital (see VITAL FAMILY) refer to it. An elaborate novel based on this story was written by Shelomoh Navarro of Jerusalem, who pretended it was based on an ancient manuscript, in the mid-seventeenth century. Navarro converted to Christianity in 1664; however, his version became the standard, copied and printed many times. A Shabbatean version of this story, in Yiddish, was preserved by R. Leib ben 'Ozer of Amsterdam. Dozens of literary adaptations, in prose, poetry, and drama, abound in modern Hebrew literature.

DEL-MEDIGO, ELIYAHU (c.1460–1497), philosopher and physician. Born in Crete, he lived in Padua, where he gave lectures on philosophy; his best-known Christian disciple was Pico della Mirandola. Del-Medigo was greatly influenced by Averroës and translated some of his works via Hebrew into Latin. Besides his translations, Del-Medigo also wrote in Hebrew and Latin about Averroës's commentaries on Aristotle and other philosophical subjects. Del-Medigo's Behinat ha-Dat seeks to reconcile philosophy and religion, holding that each has its own domain and that they do not therefore conflict. Should philosophy and revelation seem to contradict each other, philosophy must defer. In particular, the philosopher must not tamper with the basic doctrines of divine existence, revelation, and retribution. Del-Medigo attacked the kabbalists and denied that the Zohar was written by R. Shim'on bar Yoḥ'ai.

DEL-MEDIGO, YOSEF SHELOMOH (1591–1655), rabbi, philosopher, and scholar; known by the acronym Yashar (Yosef Shelomoh Rofe' [doctor]) of Candia. Born in Crete to a famous scholarly family, he received a Jewish and classical education. He studied astronomy and mathematics under Galileo, as well as medicine and philosophy at the University of Padua and Jewish studies with the help of Leone Modena from Venice. Del-Medigo wandered through Egypt, Turkey, Poland, and Lithuania, where he participated in scientific dialogues with Muslim, Christian, and Karaite scholars. In Vilna he served as private physician of Prince Radziwill. Later, Del-Medigo reached Hamburg, where he served as rabbi and preacher. In 1629 he arrived in Amsterdam, where *Manasseh ben Israel published Del-Medigo's book

Elim, an answer to queries addressed to him by the Karaite scholar Zerah ben Natan of Troki. This close dialogue with a Karaite rabbi caused concern among the leaders of the community, who appointed a rabbinical committee to examine the contents of the book. In the same year Del-Medigo's disciple Shemu'el Ashkenazi published in Basel Del-Medigo's Ta'alumot Hokhmah, followed in 1631 by Novelot Hokhmah. Del-Medigo moved to Frankfurt am Main, where he served for many years as the community's physician. Toward the end of his life he spent several years in Prague, where he died. Del-Medigo was famous for his equivocal attitude toward Kabbalah. Some scholars concluded that his defense of it in Matsref la-Hokhmah (Odessa, 1864) was not genuine.

DEMA'I (דְּמַאי; perhaps), name of a certain kind of agricultural produce and of a Mishnaic tractate.

Agricultural Produce. Dema'i, a term probably derived from the Aramaic word dema', is used to denote doubtfully tithed agricultural produce. The Talmud cites a decree to the effect that any person buying produce from an ignorant person ('am ha-'arets) was required to separate the *tithes specified under biblical law (Sot. 47b-48a). This rule applied only to tithes, not to the priestly dues (terumah). The reasons for this distinction are that the eating of produce from which terumah has not been separated is a capital offense (San. 83a) and the amount of produce that must be taken in order to fulfill the biblical requirement of taking terumah is much smaller than that required for tithes (Hul. 137b). The ignorant would, therefore, separate terumah but could not be relied upon to make a similar effort with respect to tithes.

Tractate. The tractate Dema'i, in Mishnah order Zera'im, consists of seven chapters, with related material in the Tosefta and in the Talmud Yerushalmi. The tractate deals with the laws regarding produce purchased from an 'am ha-'arets, a common person whose commitment to the laws of tithing is suspect. In order to permit the use of such produce, the purchaser is required to separate from it certain tithes and to treat them with the appropriate sanctity.

Individuals who undertook meticulously to observe the laws of tithing were regarded as reliable, and produce purchased from them was not considered dema'i. The laws of dema'i effectively divided Jewish society into groups of suspect 'amei ha-'arets and haverim (initiates), whose piety might prevent them from eating at the table of an 'am ha-'arets. Tractate Dema'i introduced halakhic mechanisms that enable an initiate to be a guest at an 'am ha-'arets's table without relaxing his standards of piety.

An English translation of the tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

DEMOCRACY, form of government in which sovereignty resides in the people. Although many of the values and moral principles underlying democracy are affirmed by (and often derived from) the Bible, the way of life envisaged for the Israelites in the Bible cannot properly be termed a democracy. The Bible greatly influenced the development of democratic ideas in seventeenth-century England and eighteenth-century America, and the organization of the ancient Israelite tribes might also have been a kind of primitive democracy. Nevertheless, a system that provides for both a hereditary monarchy and a hereditary priestly caste cannot be so termed, even though kings often ruled by popular consent (Saul, David, Simon the Hasmonean). Deuteronomy 17.14-20 and other scriptural passages envisage a limited constitutional monarchy, but the basic conception is essentially theocratic (see THEOCRACY).

The rabbis of the Second Temple period further developed the nomocratic principle (rule of the divinely revealed law). They recognized no political or spiritual prerogatives of the priesthood (except in matters of religious precedence) and rejected prophetic authority, since prophecy in this view had come to an end with Malachi. Within the body of sages qualified to interpret the law, decisions were arrived at by the process of counting and deciding (i.e., by majority vote); failure to submit to the majority decision rendered a scholar a rebellious elder (zaqen mamre).

In principle the *synagogue and Jewish *community were highly democratic, but in practice there was a tendency to oligarchy, with power in the hands of the wealthy and the rabbinical hierarchy. It has been suggested that it is not so much the political theory underlying biblical and rabbinic law that has turned Jews into champions of democracy as the social and moral values implicit in traditional Jewish teaching.

DEMONS. Belief in demons or evil spirits has played a relatively unimportant role in doctrinal Judaism, though it was prominent in folk tradition. Jewish theology, as reflected in biblical and rabbinic literature, did not deny the existence of supernatural beings capable of causing harm, but the absolute sovereignty and omnipotence attributed to God (Dt. 4.35) reduced the importance of such demonic forces. Apocalyptic literature exhibits dualistic influences, originating in Persian teaching (Ormizd and Ahriman). The Essenes seem to have cultivated an esoteric lore regarding evil spirits and to have practiced exorcism. Demonology plays a major role in the work of medieval kabbalists. In rabbinic Judaism, demonology belongs primarily to the realm of aggadah and folklore, and rarely impinges on the halakhah. In the Bible, all cosmic agencies, both beneficent and malign, are controlled by God's will. Forces of destruction are his messengers of punishment (e.g., Ex. 12.33), and even *Satan is only his servant (Jb. 1.2). But the survival of earlier animistic beliefs is attested to by the references to se'irim (Lv. 17.7, "satyrs"; Arab. jinn) or shedim (Dt. 32.17, "demons" or "devils") and the like. At times, scripture derisively applies demonic terminology to the pagan deities (Dt. 32.17). In rabbinic times, under Babylonian and Persian influence, demonology—like angelology (see ANGELS)—assumed considerable importance in aggadic thought and general Jewish folklore. Many of the demons became individualized and were given specific names, often of foreign origin. The chief generic names are shedim, mazziqim (injurers), ruhot (spirits), and mal'akhei habbalah (angels of destruction). These demons are invisible and their numbers legion. Like angels, they possess wings, can fly from one end of the world to the other, and know the future; like human beings, they eat and drink, procreate, and die (Hag. 16a). They live in ruins and desolate places and are most active at night. As a rule they are malevolent and the cause of various diseases; in Geihinnom they torture the wicked. But some are friendly and useful to man; these were employed, for example, in the construction of the Tabernacle and Temple. Their king is *Asmodeus (Git. 68a-b), *Samael, or *Azazel. Agrat bat Mahalat is the queen of demons, as is Lilith, who slays newborn infants, but Satan rules over them all. The only true defense against demonic injury is the observance of commandments, though special prayers were also prescribed and *amulets worn. It is said that demons were created at twilight on the eve of the Sabbath (Pes. 54b) or that they are descended from "fallen angels" (cf. Gn. 6.1-4). In pseudoepigraphous literature, the guardian angels of gentile nations, as well as Satan himself, are also depicted as fallen angels. Medieval Jewish philosophers, with the exception of Avraham ibn Ezra and Maimonides, accepted belief in demons. The kabbalists called the demonic realm sitra' aḥra'* (the other side) and also developed the concept of qelippah (shell of evil), which wages an incessant war against the element of "holiness"; they also contributed to the increasing popularization of amulets. Later Jewish folklore referred to letsim (mischievous imps) and also absorbed many non-Jewish superstitions.

DENUNCIATION (Heb. mesirah), the act of informing on Jews or the Jewish community to non-Jewish authorities. The insecurity of the Jews in Talmudic and medieval times, and their urgent need for solidarity in a hostile world, made denunciation the most heinous crime in the Jewish community and the informer (mal- shin or moser; delator) its most despicable character. Every step against him, even taking his life, was permitted in order to safeguard the interests of the community. When the imprecation against "sectarians" in the Amidah* became obsolete (as sectarians were no longer a danger), the wording was changed so as to include all kinds of informers and slanderers (Ber. 28b). The Talmud says that all informers will go down to Geihinnom for eternal punishment (R. ha-Sh. 17a). If their life is in danger, nothing should be done to save them (A. Z.* 26b). In medieval times, many steps were taken against them. In France, R. Tam convened a gathering of scholars to take measures against informers. In Rhineland synagogues, they were cursed every Sabbath. In Spain, R. Asher ben Yehi'el of Toledo referred to the carrying out of death sentences against informers (Resp. VIII 1.8). Maimonides stated that in the Maghreb (west Morocco) it was a "normal occurrence" for informers to be handed over to the non-Jewish authorities for punishment. In his code he laid down that it is lawful to put informers to death (Hilkhot Hovel u-Mazziq). The usual action taken against such offenders was their excommunication (herem), though sometimes they were subjected to mutilation.

DERASH (דָּרַשׁ; exposition), a word derived from the verb d r sh, meaning to search out the sense of or to seek to understand the sacred text (see Dt. 13.15, 17.4, 9). Ezra declared that he has directed his mind to do this (Ezr. 7.10). Elsewhere in the scriptures, the word means occupation with divine commandments and the texts in which they are embedded. In the tannaitic period (1st-2d cent.), the term refers more specifically to the interpretation of individual passages (midrash*). Derash, homiletical exposition, is often contrasted with peshat, the literal meaning (see PARDES). In addition, it refers to the public interpretation of the scriptures (also derashah); the expounder was known as a darshan*.

DEREKH ERETS (דֶּרֶךְ עֵרֶט; "way of the land"), phrase used with varying connotations in rabbinic literature. In Avot 2.2 and 6.6 it means the worldly occupation or trade by which one earns one's livelihood, while in Numbers Rabbah 31.23 it means normal procedure. Most commonly, however, the phrase connotes etiquette or correct conduct, implying proper behavior and politeness. It is the subject of two post-Talmudic treatises, Derekh Erets Rabbah and Derekh Erets Zuta' (see DEREKH ERETS RABBAH AND ZUTA'). The rabbis ascribed such correct behavior to worthy biblical figures, and even to the Almighty himself, and often use the phrase "the Torah thus teaches us derekh erets" (e.g., "The Torah thus teaches us derekh erets that a man should first build his house, then plant his vineyard, and only then take a wife," Sot. 44a; "The Torah teaches us derekh erets that a man should always inquire after the welfare of his host," B. M. 87a; "The Holy One, blessed be he, thus teaches us derekh erets that a man should refrain from using a fruit-bearing tree to build his house," Ex. Rab. 35.2). The laws of derekh erets cover all aspects of human life, including the relationship between spouses, family members, and friends; ways of dressing and eating; modes of address; procedure in visiting superiors; and use of language. Thus, one should not rejoice among people who weep or weep among those who rejoice (Derekh Erets Rabbah 7.7); ask the price of an item when one has no intention of buying it, for this falsely raises the hopes of the seller (Derekh Erets Rabbah 8.6); or, when a guest, offer the host's small children food without first obtaining permission to do so from the parents (Derekh Erets Rabbah 9.3). The rabbinic dictum "Derekh erets precedes Torah" inspired the motto of *Neo-Orthodoxy as expounded by Samson Raphael *Hirsch, "Torah together with derekh erets," in which derekh erets refers to the general culture.

Many of the rules of conduct are illustrated with stories drawn from the lives of the early rabbis. They were edited and translated into English by Michael Higger (1935). DESECRATION (Heb. hillul), a violation of the sacred or hallowed character of an object; a diversion of purpose from the sacred to the profane. Most such transgressions in Jewish law relate to the Temple ritual (e.g., the use of Temple objects for nonsacred purposes) or to the comportment of the priests (e.g., the ban that prohibits a high priest from marrying an unsuitable wife or a deformed priest from participating in the Temple service). Since God commands Israel to be a holy people, any act of desecration is also a desecration of God's holy name (Lv. 21.6; Ez. 22.26). Both idolatry and social immorality were held to be particularly reprehensible. The punishment for desecration is generally excommunication from the people of Israel (karet) or the death penalty (to be administered by divine intervention). DETERMINISM, the view that whatever happens is determined in advance, either by causal necessity or by God's knowledge or decree; the latter category is known as *predestination. Although determinism is accepted in one form or another by many religious philosophies, Judaism has tended to consider *free will and the exercise of free choice as a precondition for the religious and moral life. Moral indeterminacy seems to be assumed both by the Bible, which bids man to choose between *good and evil, and by the rabbis, who hold that the decision for following the good inclination rather than the evil (see YETSER HA-RA' AND YETSER HA-TOV) rests with every individual. Determinism is discussed by most philosophers in connection with the problem of free will. That the doctrine of free will is compatible with the theory of God's foreknowledge is asserted by Maimonides (Mishneh Torah, Hilkhot Teshuvah 5), who also emphatically rejects the doctrine of predestination. Modern Jewish philosophers discuss determinism mainly in the light of scientific concepts of causality; the same problem was discussed under the heading of *astrology by medieval thinkers, whose theories of stellar determination correspond to those of natural causality found in later periods. DEUTERONOMIC SOURCE (D), in the view of critical biblical scholarship, one of the originally separate documents from which the Torah was composed, consisting of most of the *Book of Deuteronomy. The law code found in Deuteronomy 12–26 is regarded by Bible scholars as being distinct from other law codes in the Torah. Scholars also refer to the final redactor of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings (the Former Prophets) as the Deuteronomist, because the editorial framework of these books reflects the historical and theological viewpoint of Deuteronomy. See BIBLE.

DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF (Heb. Devarim [Words]; from the book's first distinctive word), the fifth and last book of the Torah, containing *Moses' farewell address to the children of Israel, his final blessing and "song," and an account of his death. The Jewish rabbis called it Mishneh Torah (repetition of the Torah; hence, its Greek name Deuteronomion, "second," from which the English form derives) based on Deuteronomy 17.18. Moses reminds the people of their frequent disobedience and lack of faith in God, and he exhorts them to fidelity. He stresses the blessings and happiness that result from obedience and the curses that follow transgression; future sins of the people, he prophesies, will be severely punished, but eventually God will usher in an era of happiness and glory. According to Jewish tradition, Moses spoke the contents of Deuteronomy during the thirty-seven days preceding his demise and wept when uttering the last verses, dictated to him by God, describing his death (although the Talmud gives another version in which the last verses were written by Joshua, B. B. 15a). The book recapitulates the main religious principles and legislation, including the *Ten Commandments, contained in the previous books but also adds new laws, most of which have a humanistic dimension. An important feature of the book is its emphasis on the unification of all cultic activity in a central sanctuary. All other worship is absolutely banned. The book insists on the uniqueness of God and his choice of Israel, from which derive the practical obligations owed him by the Israelites, such as the absolute rejection of idolatry. There also appears a more abstract conception of God, who no longer is said to dwell personally in the Temple—only his "Name" resides there (Dt. 12.11). The Ark, moreover, which formerly was conceived to be the footstool of God, is now interpreted to be merely the place where the tablets of the covenant are lodged. Modern scholars, who maintain that the Pentateuch is composed of several documents, regard the Book of Deuteronomy as an independent source (referred to as "D," see BIBLE), the dating of which has been widely disputed, ranging from premonarchic to postexilic. It is generally understood that Deuteronomy is the "book of law" found by the high priest Hilkiah in the Temple in 621 BCE during the reign of King *Josiah of Judah; the priest's discovery provided the impetus for the king's religious reform in Judah (2 Kgs. 22–23). Another feature that ties Deuteronomy to the age of Josiah is the strong linguistic and structural resemblance that the book exhibits with vassal treaties of Neo-Assyrian kings in the seventh century BCE. Phrases such as "to love . . . with all your heart" (Dt. 6.5, 11.13, 30.6) and "to obey the voice of" (Dt. 15.5, 28.1, 30.20), which in the political context of Assyrian treaties signified the relationship of absolute loyalty of the vassal to the king, take on a theological dimension in Deuteronomy by defining the treaty-covenantal relationship as pertaining to God and his people. The entire structure of the book also follows the tripartite pattern of treaties known throughout the ancient Near East: introduction (chaps. 1–11), legal corpus (chaps. 12–26), and blessings and curses (chaps. 27–30). Deuteronomy exerted a profound influence on biblical literature commonly assigned to the seventh century BCE and onward, such as the Former Prophets corpus and the Book of Jeremiah. Most scholars regard these latter works as having been shaped by the Deuteronomistic school.

DEUTERONOMY RABBAH, Midrashic work on the *Book of Deuteronomy incorporated into the medieval anthology *Midrash Rabbah. It is not a commentary on every verse of Deuteronomy, but a collection of homilies, where each section begins with a halakhah. Deuteronomy Rabbah survives in at least two different versions, both of which belong to the *Tanhuma'-Yelammedenu.

Deuteronomy Rabbah, as found in the printed editions of Midrash Rabbah, MS Parma De Rossi 1240 and fragments, circulated primarily in France and Germany; it contains twenty-seven literary homilies on the triennial-cycle weekly lections of Deuteronomy. The version published by Saul Lieberman (Jerusalem, 1974) is found in most manuscripts of Midrash Rabbah and contains alternate or additional Midrashic material (the extent of which varies in different manuscripts) of the Tanhuma'-Yelammedenu type that circulated primarily in Spain and North Africa. An English translation by J. Rabinowitz appeared in the Soncino edition of Midrash Rabbah (London, 1939; repr. 1961).

DEVEQUT (דְּבִיקוּת; cleaving, devotion), term used in the specific sense of loving attachment to God (cf. Dt. 11.22). Commenting on Deuteronomy 13.5, the Talmud (Sot. 14a) asks, "Is it possible to cleave unto God? Is it not said 'The Lord your God is a devouring fire?'" and explains that devequt means imitating God's attributes of mercy and kindness (see IMITATION OF GOD). Halakhic codifiers (e.g., *Mosheh ben Ya'aqov of Coucy and Moses *Maimonides) included devequt among the positive commandments. Medieval philosophers and mystics used the term to mean communion with God, which they considered to be the ultimate goal of religious life and spiritual endeavor. Some scholars, however, maintain that the traditional conception of the transcendence of God precludes the total and complete "mystical union" with God that many other religious systems speak about. Under kabbalistic influence and later under the influence of Hasidism, meditative as well as ecstatic devequt became generally accepted ideals. Devequt involves the practice of devotion (kavvanah; see INTENT), by which man removes the barriers between himself and God and establishes spiritual communion by "divesting himself of his material being" (hitpashtut ha-gashmiyyut).

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE, religious literature not found in sacred texts (the Bible, Talmud, prayer book) and designed primarily to increase piety and devotion, rather than the knowledge of theological or ritual matters. It may be found at the margins of rabbinical literature (Derekh Erets Rabbah, Derekh Erets Zuta, Seder Eliyyahu), in the medieval exempla literature, and at the margins of almost every area of Jewish literary activity (halakhah, philosophy, ethical writings, mysticism, and confession). Devotional literature represented an effort by the learned circles to reach a broader audience; it also represented a response to the ideal of learned Judaism by circles that stressed piety and devotion, such as the medieval Hasidei Ashkenaz. In a wider sense, devotional literature includes such liturgical (see LITURGY) compilations as the ma'amadot (selections of scriptural and Talmudic passages for daily reading) and additional nonliturgical prayers and hymns (such as Adon 'Olam* and baqqashot [see *BAQQASHAH]) to be said in private devotion, many of which have made their way into the more comprehensive prayer books. A special aspect of devotional literature is the use of the vernacular, as in the case of the tehinnot (supplications), biblical and Midrashic stories retold in Yiddish, often specifically for women (see THINNUS; TSE'ENAH U-RE'ENAH), or in Ladino (Me'am Lo'ez) and bilingual editions.

DHIMMI. Jews, Christians, and Zoroastrians living under Islam were known as ahl ad-dhimma (people of the covenant) or dhimmis and were subject to special discriminatory regulations under Islamic law. Since they possessed a book of revelation (ahl el-kitab), they were permitted to remain in Muslim lands, in contrast to pagans who were killed or forcibly converted. Dhimmis were required to pay discriminatory poll taxes (djizya) and land taxes (haradj) and had to wear distinguishing clothing. They were not permitted to ride horses or to build new synagogues and churches, and they were required to show special deference to Muslims. In exchange for their subordination, dhimmis were granted religious autonomy and a wide measure of economic freedom. The legal category of dhimmi was onerous, combining features of humiliation and discrimination with low-level toleration.

DIENA, 'AZRI'EL BEN SHELOMOH (died 1536), Italian rabbinic authority and scion of a French family that had settled in Piedmont. In his youth he taught in Reggio and moved to Pavia no later than 1514. For a few years he resided in Viadana, in the Mantua region. By 1526 he was rabbi of Sabbioneta, where he remained for the rest of his life. He corresponded on halakhic subjects with other leading authorities. His works include approximately three hundred responsa, which have been published in two volumes (1977–1979). They shed valuable light on all aspects of Italian Jewry in his day and also reflect his personality. In a letter to Avraham ha-Kohen of Bologna (1530), Diena condemned David *Re'uveni, an adventurer who aroused messianic hopes in the early sixteenth century and was greatly honored in many Italian communities. However, he wrote favorably of the false messiah Shelomoh *Molkho.

DIETARY LAWS. Jewish dietary laws apply only to animal foods, with the exception of orlah* (forbidden fruit; i.e., the prohibition against eating the fruit of a tree during the first three years after planting [Lv. 19.23]; after the destruction of the Temple, the fruit of the fourth year was also forbidden), hadash* (new corn; i.e., the ban on eating bread made from a fresh crop of corn until the second day of Pesah [Lv. 23.14]), tevel* (untithed produce; i.e., the ban on eating produce until the tithe has been set aside, applicable only in Erets Yisra'el), kil'ayim* (diverse kinds; i.e., the prohibition against sowing diverse kinds of seed together, also applicable only in Erets Yisra'el [Dt. 22.9]); and nesekeh (wine of libation; i.e., the prohibition against wine that had been used, or was suspected of having been prepared, for idolatrous libation, later extended to include any wine prepared or even touched by a non-Jew). Otherwise all fruits and vegetables are permitted.

Quadrupeds permitted for consumption are enumerated in Deuteronomy 14.4–5 (see CLEAN AND UNCLEAR ANIMALS). Leviticus 11.3 specifies that “Whatsoever parts the hoof and is wholly cloven-footed and chews the cud, that may you eat.” Both conditions are necessary (Lv. 4–7). Only fish that have both fins and scales are permitted (Lv. 11. 9–12). Fish that have scales in their natural habitat but shed them before or upon being taken from the water are permitted. A number of birds are forbidden (Lv. 11.13), but no general characteristics are given in the Bible to distinguish between permitted and forbidden fowl (distinguishing signs are mentioned by the Mishnah [Hul. 3] and by the Talmud [Hul. 65b]). Since uncertainty exists as to the exact identification of the fowl listed as forbidden in the Bible, only those birds traditionally known as “clean” are used for food. Eggs of unclean birds are forbidden. Winged animals that creep on the ground may not be eaten. Exceptions are listed in Leviticus 11.20–22. All kinds of worms, mites, snails, and the like are forbidden (Lv. 41).

Flesh may not be torn from a living animal (eivar min ha-hai*; Gn. 9.4; San. 59b), and all animals and birds, but not fish, require *ritual slaughter (shehitah), which alone renders the animal lawfully fit for consumption. A flaw in the performance of or arising from ritual slaughter renders the animal nevelah (carcass) and unfit for food. The term terefah* originally designated the *meat of animals maimed or torn by wild beasts but gradually became the term used to designate all food, especially meat, that is forbidden, for whatever reason, by law. In particular, an animal found to be suffering from one or more of the defects or diseases listed in the Mishnah (Hul. 3) is called terefah. Maimonides lists seventy such cases under eight main headings: derusah, an animal that has been mauled by wild animals or birds; nequvah, an animal with a pierced or perforated membrane or organ; haserah, an animal defective from birth; netulah, an animal missing a limb, organ, or part; qer'ah, a torn animal; nefulah, an animal that has fallen, so that internal injury is suspected; pesuqah, a split animal; and shevurah, a broken animal.

Part of the abdominal fat (helev*) of the ox, sheep, and goat is forbidden (Lv. 7.23), as is the sciatic nerve (gid ha-nasheh*; cf. Gn. 32.33). Permitted fat is called shuman.

The blood of fish is permitted; that of beasts and birds is forbidden (Lv. 17.12–14); hence, all meat must be made kosher or rendered fit for cooking by a process called melihah, which consists of both soaking (for half an hour) and covering with salt (for one hour) and then rinsing the salt off before the dish may be prepared for food.

Blood specks render eggs unfit for consumption. The products of non-kosher cattle, beasts, birds, or fish (e.g., asses' milk, or caviar prepared from sturgeon roe) are also forbidden. Honey is an exception to this rule; the rabbis assumed that the bee merely sucks out and then discharges the nectar of a flower, and that the honey, therefore, does not contain any part of the bee itself.

Any mixture of meat and *milk is strictly forbidden; separate sets of utensils must be provided for both the preparation and serving of meat and milk dishes. Fish is not considered meat in this respect. Dairy foods may not be eaten for some time after the consumption of meat, and the same applies to meat after cheese; custom varies as to the length of time (one hour, three hours, six hours) that should elapse (Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 89 and gloss). Utensils that have been used in the preparation or serving of nonkosher foods or for a mixture of meat and milk foods may not be used subsequently for kosher foods (see KASHER). On the basis of the threefold repetition of the prohibition against seething a kid in its mother's milk (Ex. 23.19, 34.26; Dt. 16.21), it is forbidden to cook, eat, or benefit from a mixture of meat and dairy foods. Food that is parev* may be eaten with either milk or meat.

Medieval thinkers, in an attempt to rationalize the dietary laws, said that while much remains to be discovered, enough is known to warrant the conviction that their observance produces beneficial effects upon the human body (a view expressed by Maimonides, Guide of the Perplexed 3.48). This apologetic attempt to explain the dietary laws has been criticized for missing their basic intent. Thus the Midrash states, “Let not a man say ‘I do not like the flesh of swine’; on the contrary, he should say, ‘I like it, but what can I do, seeing that the Torah has forbidden it to me?’” (Sifra on Lv. 20.26). This suggests that the rabbis regarded divine legislation as a sufficient reason, especially as it called upon the human capacities for discipline, obedience, and mastery of oneself (Gn. Rab. 44.1). In the Bible, observance of the dietary laws is a way of sanctifying God (Lv. 11.44–45), that is, of marking the people Israel off from all other peoples as specially devoted to God. The dietary laws thus serve both to identify the Israelite nation and to symbolize their devotion to God. Some Jewish thinkers (Philo, Maimonides), influenced by Greek thought, interpret the sanctification as resting in the acquisition of self-control and the habit of mastering the appetites—“They accustom us to restrain the growth of desire, the indulgence in seeking that which is pleasant, and the disposition to consider the pleasure of eating and drinking the end of man's existence” (Guide of the Perplexed 3.25). Modern scholarship suggests explanations of the biblical dietary laws in terms of anthropological theory.

The nineteenth-century German Reform leader Abraham *Geiger held that the dietary laws were anachronistic relics and that if they were not to be observed in their entirety should be totally abolished. In 1885 a conference of U.S. Reform rabbis in Pittsburgh affirmed that “all laws regulating diet are apt to obstruct modern spiritual elevation,” and the American Reform leader Isaac Mayer *Wise expressed regret at the emphasis placed on these laws by Orthodox Judaism. Modern Reform theory and practice has changed these attitudes considerably, so that now, according to the last official platform statement of the Reform movement (the 1976 Centennial Perspective), each Reform Jew has a duty to learn about these and other religious practices and to integrate them in daily life, each in his or her own way.

For the Conservative movement, the dietary laws are binding, but they are interpreted and applied somewhat differently from at least some forms of Orthodox practice. Swordfish, for example, is accepted as kosher by Conservative, but not Orthodox, rabbinic rulings, and Conservative Jews are more likely than Orthodox Jews to find it acceptable within the requirements of Jewish law to eat dairy and parev foods in non-kosher restaurants.

DIMI OF NEHARDEA (4th cent.), Babylonian amora'. According to Iggeret Rav Sherira' Ga'on, Dimi headed the Pumbedita academy from 385 until his death in 388. In contrast to Rava', Dimi was known to prefer a careful teacher who covered less ground than a careless teacher who moved rapidly, since a mistake once learned stayed implanted in the mind (B. B. 21a–b). This precision may be reflected in the fact that he sometimes passed on teachings in language that differed from the standard sources (e.g., R. ha-Sh. 20a). His best known aggadic statement is that hospitality is greater than early attendance at the house of study (Shab. 127a).

DIN (דִּין; judgment), a religious law or lawsuit; a legal decision or verdict. Rabbi Shim'on ben Gamli'el declared that din was one of the three elements by which the world is preserved, the others being truth and peace (Avot 1.18), and, in fact the three are identical: if din has been achieved, so have truth and peace (Y., Ta'an. 4). A law court is a home for judgment (beit din*), and a judgment has to be impartial, with no favoritism (Yev. 91a). In theological terminology, din signifies the divine attribute of severe judgment and destructive punishment; it is held in check by divine mercy (hesed) or compassion (rahamim). In Kabbalah, Din is an alternative name for Gevurah as the fifth of the sefirot*.

DINA' DE-MALKHUTA' DINA' (Aram.; דִּינָא דְּמַלְכּוּתָא דְּדִינָא; the law of the government is law), legal principle meaning that the law of the land in which a Jew resides is binding and must be obeyed (Ned. 28a; Git. 10b). The only exceptions to this precept are laws that contradict the fundamentals of Jewish law, such as robbery and violence or issues of personal status. The rule of dina' de-malkhuta' dina' was first articulated by the amora' Shemu'el in regard to the Jews living under Sassanid rule in Babylonia.

• Leo Landman, Jewish Law in the Diaspora: Confrontation and Accommodation (Philadelphia, 1968).

DINEI SHAMAYIM (דִּינֵי שָׁמַיִם; courts of heaven), term used to denote cases in which a Jewish court will not compel payment or authorize punishment for a particular activity, though some payment or punishment is appropriate; the court will, however, decree that until the defendant pays the appropriate amount owed, the Divine will not forgive the wrong done. Indeed, there were some authorities who ruled that nonpayment of the amount owed was a form of theft. Others aver that one who declines to pay is called an evildoer and may not testify in a law court. Modern scholars have used this concept to argue that judges have an obligation to tell defendants not only what their legal obligations are but also what the morally proper conduct is in any given case.

On rare occasion, the term dinei shamayim is used to refer to divine punishment for sin, such as the Flood (Gn. 6) or the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn. 18).

DIN TORAH (דִּין תּוֹרָה), a legal hearing conducted in compliance with halakhic regulations. According to Jewish law, disputes had to be brought for adjudication before a beit din* and not before a secular (non-Jewish) court. In the modern world, however, only the more religiously observant Jews go to rabbinic courts. In Israel all matters of personal status are adjudicated by religious courts.

DISINTERMENT. See BURIAL.

DISPENSATION (Heb. hetter), action by a competent halakhic authority to relax certain laws in order to alleviate hardship. Such power can only be exercised in the case of laws of rabbinic origin, or in connection with matters whose origin is in custom (minhag*), but not in matters affecting biblical law. Thus the dispensation given by the Israeli chief rabbinate to allow land to be worked under certain conditions during the sabbatical year is contingent on the premise that the prohibition regarding the sabbatical year is now based only on rabbinic ordinance. The Ashkenazi dispensation of one hundred rabbis, granted to one who may not ordinarily by law divorce his insane wife in order to remarry, rests on the fact that polygamy is permitted by the Torah, while monogamy is a rabbinic innovation. A hetter hora'ah is a dispensation to serve in a rabbinical position (see ORDINATION). Hetter 'isqa' (business dispensation) was a formula by which it was permitted to take interest. See also LOANS; MONEYLENDING.

DISPUTATIONS, public controversies between representatives of opposing faiths. An early example is the disputation between the Jews and the Samaritans mentioned by Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 13.3.4.74-75); another is that recorded in the Mishnah ('A. Z. 4.7) between philosophers in Rome and Jewish elders. There are several references in the Talmud to discussions between rabbis and Romans (and other pagans), but the circumstances in which they were held are not specified. Early Christian literature reports many disputations with Jews, all of them concluding with the Jewish protagonists' acceptance of Christianity; references to such disputations are to be found in Talmudic literature. Throughout the Middle Ages, Jews on occasion discussed with their Muslim and Christian neighbors the issues that separated their faiths. Although such discussions were viewed as dangerous and generally discouraged by the religious leadership of all three groups, the constant contacts of daily life made such exchanges inescapable.

During the twelfth century, western Christendom became increasingly concerned with convincing others of the truth of the Christian faith. New lines of argumentation were developed, and, with the support of political authorities, missionizing sermons were forced upon Jews and Muslims. An important variant of the forced sermon was the forced disputation. The first was the Disputation of *Paris in 1240, in which the challenger was Nicholas Donin, a Jewish apostate, and his opponent, R. Yehi'el ben Yosef of Paris. As a result of this debate, twenty-four cartloads of copies of the Talmud were consigned to the flames in 1242.

The Disputation of *Barcelona of 1263 signified a major landmark in the history of forced disputations. Conceived by the Dominicans as an opportunity to test the new missionizing strategies of the apostate Friar Paul Christian, the confrontation between the friar and one of the greatest of the medieval rabbis, Moses Nahmanides of Gerona, was conducted publicly in Barcelona, under the patronage of King James I. Friar Paul Christian argued that rabbinic texts revealed the rabbis recognition of the truths of Christianity. In the disputation itself, Nahmanides was limited to rebutting the friar's reading of these rabbinic texts, although in his own report of the proceedings he portrays himself as leading an attack against fundamental elements of Christian belief and behavior.

Over the next few centuries, forced disputations were a recurring and problematic aspect of Jewish existence. The longest was the Disputation of *Tortosa (1413-1415), in which the apostate Hieronymus de Sancta Fide (whose Hebrew name was Yehoshu'a ha-Lorki) faced twenty-two of the most distinguished rabbis of the time. The disputation lasted for over sixty-three sessions and was organized with all the trappings of a public entertainment.

Maimonides banned Jewish-Muslim disputations. More unusual were the disputations of 1757 and 1759—organized at the instigation of Christian ecclesiastical authorities—between rabbinic spokesmen and Frankists (see FRANK, YA'AQOV). See also POLEMICS.

DIVINE PUNISHMENT. The Bible invokes divine punishment for two types of offenses. The first consists of crimes for which eyewitnesses are not usually available, such as sexual offenses (Lv. 20.17-18, 18-29) and the nonobservance of Pesah (Ex. 12.15) and Yom Kippur (Lv. 23.29-30). The second includes offenses of a religious or sacerdotal nature, such as the failure to circumcise (Gn. 17.14) or to bring certain sacrifices (Nm. 9.13). In many instances the term karet* (cutting off) is used to designate divine punishment (Lv. 20. 2-5), and it would appear from the Bible that offenses punishable by karet are of a more serious nature than those merely involving death at the hands of heaven. In the Talmud, karet is understood as premature death before the age of fifty or death without leaving any issue (Mo'ed Q. 28a). The Talmud also reads divine punishment into the fate of every undetected murderer who comes to a grim end (Mak. 10b). It is arguable that the Talmudic doctrine marks a transition from divine penalties per se, to the invocation of heavenly sanctions solely against those who manage to evade the hands of the human court. Indeed, under Talmudic law, divine capital punishment is absolved by the administration of a lashing (Mak. 13a-b). The concept of din shamayim (heavenly judgment) is found in the Talmud as a means of encouraging individuals to pay compensation for damage for which they are responsible, even though they are not under any strict legal obligation to pay such compensation.

DIVINE SERVICE. See PRAYER; PRAYER BOOK.

DIVORCE. The Bible allows for a man to divorce his wife if he has found something "obnoxious" or "unclean" (left undefined) about her, in which case he writes her a bill of divorcement, hands it to her, and sends her away (Dt. 24.1-4). From this, it was concluded that the right of divorce rests solely with the husband and that the act requires a written document (Git. 20a). A man could not divorce his wife if he falsely accused her of not being a virgin at the time of marriage (Dt. 22.19) or if he had previously raped her (Dt. 22.28-29). Divorce is denounced by Malachi (2.14-16).

In the post-biblical period, a marriage is dissolved by a ceremony in which the husband gives his wife a bill of divorce (get) in the presence of a competent rabbinical court. The court does not dissolve the marriage, but merely supervises the complicated procedure, making sure that it is in accord with religious law. An official of the court then makes a record of the divorce and gives a certificate of the record to both parties. A court has jurisdiction, however, to make a declaration on the validity or nullity of a supposed marriage, in which case its decree is final. By the strict letter of the law, divorce is an arbitrary right to be exercised by the husband whenever he might feel so inclined. From very early times, however, the marriage contract (see KETUBBAH) contained stipulations protecting the wife from the husband's capricious misuse of this power. Since the time of R. *Gershom ben Yehudah (11th cent.), divorcing a wife against her will has been absolutely prohibited among Ashkenazi Jews, and in many Sephardi communities as well (Shulhan Arukh, Even ha-'Ezer, 119.6). As it stands now, all that is required for divorce is the mutual consent of husband and wife. The divorce document (nearly all in Aramaic) is written by a scribe according to strict rules. There are specific grounds in Jewish law that entitle one of the parties to compel the other spouse to agree to a divorce. Among the main grounds are refusal of cohabitation, apostasy, loathsome chronic disease rendering marital relations impossible, moral dissoluteness, grossly insulting behavior, ill-treatment, well-founded suspicion of adultery committed by the wife, and impotency of the husband. In such instances the party seeking the divorce may apply to a rabbinical court, which acts as an investigating body, to decide what degree of pressure may be exerted to prevail on the recalcitrant party to "agree" to a divorce. Although a husband's agreement that is obtained by coercion renders the get void, this is not the case when compulsion is ordered by a rabbinical court. Even then, however, a declaration of acquiescence on the part of the husband is essential. Since, in principle, Jewish law permits *polygamy, if a wife obstinately refuses to accept a divorce that her husband is entitled to give, the husband can be granted permission to remarry without the dissolution of his former marriage. However, the remarriage of a Jewish woman without a get entails the most serious consequences for herself: her second marriage is considered an act of *adultery, and the children of that union are regarded as mamzerim (see MAMZER). Rabbis therefore make every effort to secure a get for the woman. Where the divorce was not dictated or justified by circumstances, it is considered to be a virtuous deed for a man to remarry his divorced wife. Remarriage with the first husband is, however, precluded if the wife has meantime married another man or if the husband is a priest. A divorcée (like a widow) may not remarry until ninety-one days have elapsed in order that the paternity of a child with whom she may be pregnant might not be in doubt. The marriage of an adulterous wife and her consort after divorce has been obtained is forbidden. A husband cannot divorce his wife if she is insane. If the wife is deemed to be incurably insane, however, the signatures of one hundred rabbis are required to give the husband permission to marry a second time; this rule is an exception to the 900-year-old Ashkenazi enactment forbidding polygamous marriages. In any case, the sick wife must be provided for. At the time of divorce, the rabbinical court deals with monetary settlements and the custody of children. Maintenance to be paid after divorce (see ALIMONY) is unknown in Jewish law, which sees divorce as "complete severance." In deciding which one of the divorced parties is to vacate the joint dwelling, rabbis are guided by the maxim that the reestablishment of a homestead is more difficult for a man than for a woman. Other considerations, however, may reverse this rule. In countries where a get has no legal effect, rabbis will not arrange for a Jewish divorce before a civil divorce is granted. On the other hand, civil divorce is not recognized by rabbinical law unless it is supplemented by a get. Under certain conditions divorce is obligatory, but where it is optional everything possible is done to discourage its hasty exercise. The Talmud quotes a saying: "The altar sheds tears for him who divorces his first wife" (San. 22a). Indeed, the causeless divorce of a first wife, even if valid, is deemed to be an act contrary to the will of the Almighty. Yet where continued life together is absolutely impossible, it is recognized that no impediment should hinder the release by divorce.

The fact that, in traditional Judaism, only the husband can initiate divorce, creates many problems today. Each branch of Judaism is attempting to redress the issue. The Reform movement dispenses with the need for a get, accepting a civil divorce as sufficient. The Conservative movement has amended the ketubbah with a paragraph accepting the authority of the Conservative beit din to deal with recalcitrant spouses in case of divorce. The Orthodox have not been successful at implementing any widely recognized prenuptial agreement, although there have been attempts. In the State of Israel there is no civil divorce and all divorce is by the religious authorities. In particular cases, obdurate husbands, who have refused to give a get when so instructed by the rabbinic court, have been handed over to the secular authorities and imprisoned until they relent. DOGMA, authoritative formulation of the tenets of a faith. In Judaism, the tendency has been to stress religious practices rather than theological beliefs and articles of faith. Various Jewish thinkers, however, mainly as a reaction to contact with other religions and philosophies, felt the need to formulate the basic principles of Judaism. Influenced by Islam, the Karaites composed articles of faith, and under a similar impetus, Jewish medieval thinkers endeavored to codify Jewish doctrines of faith (see MAIMONIDES, MOSES; THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES OF FAITH). In his work Jerusalem, Moses Mendelssohn reasserted that Judaism (as opposed to Christianity) had no dogma, the acceptance of which is a necessary prerequisite for salvation. Some thinkers have suggested that Judaism does have dogmas, in the form of certain common assumptions of faith, but no doctrinal system. See also CREED.

DOMAIN (Heb. reshut), ownership of and control over the use of land. The rabbis distinguish between public and private domain in three instances. First, regarding Sabbath observance, they list four types of domain: private domain (reshut ha-yahid), where carrying is permitted on the Sabbath; public domain (reshut ha-rabbim), such as streets and squares, where carrying is forbidden; semi-private domain (karmelit), for example, fields, the sea, and booths in a street, where carrying is forbidden; and semi-public domain (meqom petur), for example, a trench. Second, in cases of ritual uncleanness, a private domain is where there are less than three individuals; with three or more, it becomes public. Finally, in cases of claims for damages, a public domain is any place or road to which there is public access; any person who causes injury there is himself liable to pay compensation.

DÖNMEH (Turk.; converts or apostates), crypto-Jewish sect in Turkey, originating with followers of *Shabbetai Tsevi. The Jews called them minim (sectarians), and they called themselves ma'aminim (believers [in Shabbetai Tsevi]). Following Shabbetai's conversion to Islam in 1666, many of his most fervent followers continued to believe in his Messiahship, and some even converted to Islam themselves. While openly Muslim, in secret they maintained many Jewish practices, blending them with Shabbatean additions and much antinomian behavior. They soon split into at least three groups, differing in customs and ideas and rarely intermarrying with Jews, Muslims, or sectarians from rival groups. They adhered to their own version of the Ten Commandments but were noted for their licentious practices. Dönme activism included extensive proselytizing in central Europe and especially in Poland. Their main population centers were in Constantinople, İzmir, and particularly Salonika, where they maintained close relations with Muslim mystics of the Bektāşi order. They also had close relations with leaders of the Young Turk revolution in 1908; the Young Turk finance minister, David Bey, was of Dönme origin. The different Dönme groups of Salonika shared one cemetery. Recent research has revealed that they preserved a substantial core of Judaic practices and maintained contacts with believers in Shabbetai Tsevi who had not converted to Islam. They continued to speak Judeo-Spanish into the latter part of the nineteenth century and retained their Hebrew and Sephardi names with their Turkish names. Most Dönme moved from Salonika to Constantinople in 1924 with the Turkish and Greek population exchanges resulting from the establishment of the Turkish Republic. Although their numbers subsequently dwindled, they are reported to continue to celebrate festivals connected with the life of Shabbetai Tsevi and to possess their own mosque in İstanbul.

DONNOLO, SHABBETAI (913–c.982) Italian physician. Donnolo, who was born in Oria in southern Italy, is the first known Jewish medical author in Europe. In his Sefer Hakhmoni (1880), a commentary on Sefer Yetzirah*, he discusses astrology and seeks to show that human beings are created not in the image of God but as microcosms of the universe. In the preface, Donnolo describes how he was ransomed from the Saracens as a child and later studied medicine. This commentary was quoted by many Jewish thinkers, including Rashi. Donnolo is chiefly remembered for his Sefer ha-Mirqaḥot (Jerusalem, 1950), one of the earliest Hebrew treatises on medical matters. It includes instructions for making over one hundred remedies, all derived from vegetable sources. Although he claimed to have studied Arabian, Indian, and Babylonian medicine, all of his drugs seem to be of Greek or Latin origin. He also wrote Sefer ha-Mazzalot, of which very little survives, and Pizmon, a ritual poem. Parts of his lost commentary on the Baraita de-Shemu'el are quoted by Pseudo-Sa'adyah in his commentary on Sefer Yetzirah. Donnolo's theological ideas influenced the *Ḥasidei Ashkenaz, and he is seen as a forerunner of the School of Salerno, the earliest scientific school in Christian Europe.

DOSA' BEN HARKINAS (1st–2d cent.), Palestinian tanna'. He lived during the days of the Second Temple and into the beginning of the second century (cf. Neg. 1.4). He was the respected senior of R. Yehoshu'a ben Hananyah, R. El'azar ben 'Azaryah, and R. 'Aqiva', in whose presence he once supported his position by invoking a tradition that he traced back to Haggai the prophet (Yev. 16a). His counsel to R. Yehoshu'a to submit to the calendrical judgment of R. Gamli'el, even though Dosa' believed it to be incorrect, is based on his watershed principle that calling into question the decisions of the ruling court (beit din) of the day would necessitate calling into question the rulings of every court dating back to Moses. Each rabbinical court must be regarded as if it were that of Moses himself (R. ha-Sh. 24b–25a, with reference to Ex. 24.9). The best-known dictum of Dosa' is "Morning sleep, midday wine, talking with children, and sitting in the assemblies of the ignorant remove a man from this world" (Avot 3.10). His halakhic rulings, found both in the Mishnah and baraitot (e.g., Suk. 52a–b; 'Eduy. 3.1–6), tended toward leniency and were consistently in harmony with Beit Hillel.

DOST'AI BEN YANN'AI (2d cent.), Palestinian tanna'. A contemporary of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi', he transmitted the traditions of R. Me'ir (his primary teacher), R. Yosei ben Halafta', and R. El'azar ben Shammu'a. He is primarily known for his aggadic teachings. He taught that a person who deliberately forgoes his studies is considered as though he had committed a capital offense (Avot 3.10).

DOUBT (Heb. safek). In instances in Jewish law where either the law is undecided or the facts are uncertain, a state of doubt exists. The halakhah has evolved a detailed code of procedure and criteria by means of which each instance is to be resolved. Cases concerning biblical law are to be decided in conformity with the stricter view of the deciding rabbis, while those involving laws of rabbinic origin are to be resolved according to the more lenient opinion of the rabbis (Hul. 9b). There are two exceptions to this rule. In questionable monetary cases, even those involving biblical law, the more lenient view is acted upon, since one cannot dispossess a property holder without valid proof; cases that may pose a danger to life are to be resolved in whichever manner will best obviate the suspected danger. The more lenient ruling adopted in connection with rabbinic law rests upon the assumption that the sages issued decrees only in cases of certainty. In cases involving remote doubt or improbability, the more lenient view is adopted, even in deciding matters of biblical law.

DOV BER OF MEZHIRECH (c.1704–1772), Hasidic master, known as the Maggid (preacher) of Mezhiberech. In his youth, he studied rabbinic literature with Ya'akov Yehoshu'a Falk. In addition to his Talmudic studies, he became an expert in the kabbalistic teachings of Yitsh'aq Luria. A life of extreme and protracted asceticism left him an invalid. This, according to Hasidic accounts, led him to the founder of Hasidism, Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer Ba'al Shem Tov, who was renowned as a healer. According to tradition, they met only twice, but that was sufficient for the Maggid to become a proponent of Hasidism. Some time after the death of his master, Dov Ber emerged as the most powerful of the Hasidic leaders. By 1766 he had established an influential school to which many of those who would succeed in establishing Hasidism as a popular movement in the Ukraine, Lithuania, Galicia, and Poland were attracted. Despite his weak health and contemplative nature, Dov Ber was an inspired and charismatic figure. An eyewitness account of a Shabbat at the Maggid's court appears in the autobiography of Solomon Maimon, the philosopher. The proselytizing efforts and ecstatic behavior of Dov Ber's students provoked organized opposition, for the most part limited to areas under the influence of the Vilna Ga'on. In 1772 the first of a series of bans against the Hasidim was enacted. Shortly thereafter, possibly weakened by this conflict, Dov Ber died. Among his most prominent disciples were Menaḥem Mendel of Vitebsk, Aharon of Karlin, Levi Yitsh'aq of Berdichev, Elimelekh of Lyzhansk, and Shneur Zalman of Lyady. Utilizing the terminology of the Lurianic Kabbalah, Dov Ber charted a unique course that is both mystical and magical. At root, only God is real, and worship consists primarily of devequt, binding one's consciousness to God. Although he adopted the Lurianic cosmology, Dov Ber developed an interpretation that emphasized ecstatic and psychological elements. He specifically rejected Luria's complex system of kavvanah in favor of a more single-minded immersion in the divine presence. Prayer is a process of contemplative ascent, in the course of which a person must discard all sense of personal existence. At its apex, one reaches the state of 'ayin (i.e., nothingness). Paradoxically, a person only becomes truly human when this union with the divine occurs. Such a person not only achieves a kind of personal salvation but becomes the agency for magically bringing down shefa' (divine abundance) to the material world. This became the basis for the model of the tsaddiq*. Dov Ber's teachings were recorded by Levi Yitsh'aq of Berdichev and published posthumously in Maggid Devarav le-Ya'akov, compiled by his student Shelomoh of Lutsk (edited by Rivka Schatz Uffenheimer [Jerusalem, 1990]).

DOWRY (Heb. nedunyah), property brought by a bride to her husband in the form of either movable or immovable goods. In biblical times, it was the bridegroom who paid a sum of money (mohar [bride's price]) to the bride's father (as is still the custom in the Arab world). 'Adot ha-Mizrah who immigrated to Israel followed this practice, which has now all but disappeared. The bridal dowry is, however, also found in the Bible (e.g., Gn. 24.59–61; Jgs. 1.15; 1 Kgs. 9.16), and by the Talmudic period, the tradition of a dowry had become universal and the mohar unknown. According to Jewish custom, a bride should be dowered by her father (or his estate) in proportion to his means. In cases in which a father is not able to provide a dowry for his daughter, it is the community's obligation to do so. A man has no proprietary rights over his wife's property, acquired either before or after her marriage, but is granted as much of its income as he expends on the upkeep of the household. This grant is explained historically as being in consideration of his obligation to ransom his wife, a not uncommon need in ancient days. The donor of a gift to a wife may deny the husband the benefit of its income. Even a "rebellious" wife (one who does not fulfill her marital obligations) must be returned her dowry in the event of divorce. A wife may deliver to her husband by agreement the control and administration of all or part of her property, which must be fully restored to her, together with an additional amount (usually 50 percent), upon dissolution of the marriage. Such property and its assessed value are recorded in the marriage contract (ketubbah*). By law, the husband is responsible for its deterioration and fall in market value but may claim any rise in its value. A husband may not dispose of his wife's immovable property without her acquiescence. The practice of providing a dowry has largely disappeared among North American Jews, except in the most traditionalistic circles.

DOXOLOGY (from Gr.; expression of praise, or, proclaiming the glory [of God]), a technical term in Christian liturgy that is likewise applicable to certain formulas of praise, and the prescribed responses to them, in the Jewish liturgy. Early doxologies and their responses are found at the conclusion of each of the five books of Psalms* (cf. Ps. 72.19, 106.48). The chief doxologies in the Jewish liturgy, each with its response, are the Barekhu*, the Shema*, the Qedushah*, and the Qaddish*. Common to all these is an emphasis upon the infinitude of God. Also, in a broader sense, the liturgy is arranged in accordance with a principle enunciated by R. Simla'i (3rd cent. CE): "One should always praise the Holy One, blessed be He, and [only] thereafter pray [for personal needs]." On that basis, the Pesuqei de-Zimra* (chiefly from Psalms) precede the Amidah* in the morning service.

DRACHMAN, BERNARD (1861–1945), Orthodox rabbi in the United States. He was born in New York and brought up in Jersey City, New Jersey. While studying in Germany, he identified with Orthodoxy and was ordained at the Breslau Rabbinical Seminary*. Back in the United States, he refused to serve in any congregation that ritually deviated from traditional Judaism. He was rabbi of several New York City synagogues—Beth Israel Bikkur Cholim (1887–1889); Zichron Ephraim of Yorkville, a congregation of central European Jews (1889–1909); and English-speaking rabbi at Harlem's Ohel Zedek (1909–1922), which attracted newly acculturated, traditional eastern European Jews. From its founding in 1887 until 1908, Drachman taught at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America*, where he trained rabbis to protect American Orthodoxy among the religiously disaffected youngsters of New York City's Lower East Side.

From 1900 on, as a Seminary professor and a founder of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America*, he was intimately involved with the Jewish Endeavor Society, downtown New York City's Orthodox youth synagogue movement. In 1916 he began a twenty-year career as a professor of pedagogy at the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, as that school, under Bernard Revel, began emerging as American Orthodoxy's flagship institution. He wrote The Unfailing Light: Memoirs of an American Rabbi (New York, 1948) and translated The Nineteen Letters of Ben Uziel: Being a Spiritual Presentation of the Principles of Judaism by Samson Raphael Hirsch (New York, 1899).

DREAMS, regarded in the Bible, as in many cultures, as one of the channels through which God reveals his will and intentions, and both Jewish and non-Jewish individuals can be recipients of such communications (for example, Joseph in Gn. 37, Daniel in Dn. 2.19, Laban in Gn. 31.29, Pharaoh in Gn. 41, or Balaam in Nm. 22.20). With the exception of Joseph and Daniel (both of whom interpreted dreams in foreign courts), dream interpretation by Jews is absent from the Bible. Numbers 12.6–7 considers prophetic experiences to be dreamlike visions, with the notable exception of the face-to-face encounter between God and Moses. Jeremiah, however, contrasts the "word of God" given to true prophets with the dream revelations claimed by false prophets (Jer. 23).

Dreams came to be regarded as a means by which the divine and supernatural worlds come into contact with human beings. Following certain biblical examples, dreams were later regarded as means of revealing the future. One of the longest sustained passages devoted to a single subject in all the aggadic sections of the Talmud is that dealing with dreams and their interpretations (Ber. 55a–57b). The treatment ranges from profound psychological insight into the nature of dreams to folklore and superstition. For example, the Talmud writes: "Just as there is no chaff without straw so there cannot be a dream without nonsense" (see also Git. 52a); "Part of a dream may be fulfilled but not the whole"; and "A man sees in dreams only what is suggested by his thoughts." According to the Talmud, some dream omens can have more than one possible interpretation. For example, the meaning assigned to dreaming that one is naked depends upon the locale of the dream: if the dream is set in Babylon, it is a sign of freedom from sin; if it is set in Erets Yisra'el, it is a sign of the absence of good deeds. These and many similar statements in Talmudic literature further strengthened popular belief in the significance of dreams, and it became customary to fast after a bad dream (ta'anit halom), even on the Sabbath, although later authorities tried to limit permission to fast on the Sabbath to specific dreams (Shulhan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Ḥayyim, 288). A Talmudic formula (Ber. 55b) for the fulfillment of a good dream or the changing of a bad dream to a good one, to be uttered during the *Birkat ha-Kohanim in the synagogue, is still found in some prayer books. It was to enable the recitation of this prayer that a pause was inserted between each of the three verses in the Birkat ha-Kohanim.

Maimonides says that dreams are a product of the imagination (Guide of the Perplexed 236–238). However, medieval Hebrew literature abounds with references to the significance of dreams. In twelfth- and thirteenth-century Germany, halakhists even referred to legal decisions revealed to them in dreams. Mystics practiced "dream questions," that is, asking a question before going to sleep and interpreting the night's dreams as an answer to that question. Magical manuals include detailed instructions concerning this practice. In the sixteenth-century, R. Shelomoh Almoli of Constantinople wrote Pitron Halomot, which in its Yiddish translation was widely circulated in eastern Europe.

Sefer Ḥasidim* includes many stories of dreams that came true or that involved visitations from the dead. It even tells the story of two men who made a pact with each other that the one who died first would appear to the other in a dream and relate to him secrets from the other world. Rabbi Ḥayyim Vital, in sixteenth-century Safed, related in his diary many dreams that expressed his messianic pretensions; he included both his own dreams and dreams that others had dreamed about him. Other kabbalistic works, from the Zohar to the Sefer ha-Qanah, include examples of this literary genre. Several of the dreams of R. Naḥman of Bratslav are preserved in Ḥayyei Moharan, a work by R. Natan of Nemirov, his disciple. Jewish rationalistic philosophers debated the relationship between dreams and prophecy and admitted the existence of an element of imagination in both.

This phenomenon was addressed by several rabbis, most notably R. Manasseh ben Israel in his Nishmat Ḥayyim.

DRUNKENNESS. The prophets and later biblical books and the Apocrypha contain warnings against intoxication, which is described as the source of many misfortunes (e.g., Is. 28.1; Prv. 23.19–21, 31.4–5). It is indicative of the almost complete absence of drunkenness as a serious social and moral problem among Jews that the Talmud contains few legal references to the subject, such as that a person under the influence of alcohol is legally responsible for his actions unless he has attained the state of oblivion attributed to Lot (cf. Gn. 19.3; Eruv. 65a). Next to Lot, Noah (Gn. 9.22ff.) serves as a biblical example of the objectionableness of intoxication. A drunken person is forbidden to conduct a service (Ber. 31a), and the death of the two sons of Aaron (Lv. 10.1–4) is attributed by the rabbis to the fact that they entered the sanctuary in a state of intoxication (Lv. 9). The lighter side of drunkenness is illustrated by the permission, if not the duty, to become so intoxicated on the holiday of *Purim as to be unable to distinguish between "Blessed be Mordecai" and "Cursed be Haman" (Meg. 21a), but rabbinic authors are at pains to point out that this injunction should not be taken too seriously. DUALISM, the doctrine—metaphysical or moral—that holds that all being can be reduced to or derives from two ultimate and contrasting principles.

The ancient religion of Persia (Zoroastrianism) saw history as a cosmic struggle between the power of light and goodness and that of darkness and evil. A slightly different form of dualism was assumed by *gnosticism, which distinguished between a lower, evil deity, responsible for the creation of this world, and a higher, more transcendent good deity. The source of these doctrines is man's experience of the radical opposition between *good and evil. The prophets, however, insisted that God alone was the source of both light and darkness, good and evil (Is. 45.7), and the Talmudic literature frequently condemns all forms of gnostic dualism (shetei reshuyyot [two powers]) as heresy. Dualistic tendencies manifested themselves more than once in Jewish religious history (e.g., in such apocryphal books as Jubilees* and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs*, in the Dead Sea Scrolls*, and in the medieval kabbalistic doctrine of evil [notably, the sitra' aḥra', "the other side of God"], but they were kept in check by a basic and uncompromising monotheism (see DEMONS; SATAN).

A philosophical dualism, stemming from Greece (Plato) and opposing spirit to matter, exerted considerable influence on Jewish thinking and morals, both in the Hellenistic period (cf. Philo*) and later, particularly in the Middle Ages. The logical consequence of this was contempt of the body, matter, and "this world" and a thoroughgoing asceticism* that, however, was partly inhibited by the rabbinic tradition that considered the physical universe and its enjoyment as essentially good, provided they are hallowed in the service of God. Modern writers tend to emphasize the biblical affirmation of the blessed life on this earth as a more adequate form of spirituality than one that negates matter (see BODY; SEX; SIN).

By positing a radical distinction between the absolute being of God the Creator, and the contingent, created being of all other things, the Bible and subsequent Jewish tradition affirmed another kind of dualism. Although created being derives from its creator, the two still cannot be identified, as is done by the doctrines known as pantheism* or monism.

DUBNOW, SIMON (1860–1941), historian. Born in Belorussia, Dubnow revolted against his family's traditional Judaism and entered a Russian government school after his bar mitsvah. Drawn to the Enlightenment but unable to gain admission to a university, he began writing for the Russian-Jewish press. Under the influence of the work of Heinrich Graetz*, Dubnow came to see the study of Jewish history as his calling and the most suitable form of self-knowledge for secular Jews who could not subscribe to formal religion. In Odessa in the 1890s, he propounded "autonomism," calling for the recognition of Jewish communal autonomy and minority cultural rights in the Diaspora, especially in a multinational Russian state. In Saint Petersburg, after 1905, he developed his sociological interpretation of Jewish history, emphasizing the adaptation of Jewish communal institutions to varied social conditions and formulating a sequence of hegemonies of outstanding Jewish Diaspora centers in different periods of Jewish history. Dubnow trained a generation of young Jewish historians, especially in the history of the Jews of eastern Europe, and laid stress upon the Yiddish language.

Among Dubnow's writings are Letters on Old and New Judaism (1907), the History of the Jews of Russia and Poland (1916–1920), a ten-volume World History of the Jewish People (first published in German translation, 1925–1929; later published in Hebrew, the Russian original, Yiddish, and English), the History of Hasidism (rev., 1930–1932), and a three-volume autobiography, Book of Life (1934–1940).

After leaving the Soviet Union in 1922 because of his opposition to Communism, Dubnow settled in Berlin until 1934. When the Nazis came to power in Germany, he moved to Riga, where he was murdered in the Holocaust.

DUEREN, YITSHAQ BEN ME'IR (died c.1300), German rabbinical authority. Little is known of his life. His best-known work, Sha'arei Dura', also known as Issurve-Hetter (Kraków, 1534), deals with the laws of forbidden foods and especially the laws of salting; its second part is about the laws of menstruation. It is written clearly and succinctly and is based mainly on the ruling of Ashkenazi authorities. It was frequently used by Yosef Karo and Moshe Isserles. Leading authorities wrote commentaries on the work that were frequently reprinted.

DUNASH IBN TAMIM (c.890–960), also known as Adonim and Abu Sahl; North African physician, philosopher, and scholar. Dunash was a student of Yitshaq Israeli*, and he served as a court physician in Kairouan. He was the author of an astronomical work, at least one medical text, and a commentary on Genesis 1, all of which are now lost. He is also mentioned by Moshe ibn Ezra* as the author of a book comparing the Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic languages, especially in their word origins.

In his commentary on the Sefer Yetsirah* (edited by M. Grossberg [1902]), composed in the years 955 and 956 and influenced by the Neoplatonic teaching of Yitshaq Israeli, Dunash writes that he intended at a future date to show that Arabic was derived from Hebrew. It is for this commentary that he is chiefly remembered; it was written in Arabic, but for centuries it only survived in Hebrew translation, and fragments of the original have been found in the Cairo Geniza. The commentary posited a regulated hierarchical universe formed by a transcendent, spiritual Creator. It was in circulation until the fifteenth century but by then had ceased to be influential. Dunash was also quoted by Muslim writers, but the possibility suggested by them that he converted to Islam is now discounted.

DURAN, PROFAT (c.1345–1414), also known as Efad (Hebrew acronym of "I, Profat Duran"); Spanish grammarian, philosopher, and apologist. Duran was born in Perpignan but later lived in Catalonia. After the persecutions of 1391, he seems to have been forcibly converted to Christianity and for a number of years, under the name of Honoratus de Bonafide, served as astrologer to King Juan I of Aragon. He is chiefly remembered for his two polemical works against Christianity. In his Iggeret 'al Tehi ka-'Avotekha (Constantinople, 1570) he showed in a witty style the inconsistencies between Christian doctrines and the findings of Aristotelian philosophy. The work takes the form of a letter to David Bont Bonjorn, who was a convinced Jewish convert to Christianity. Initially, it was misunderstood by its Christian readers, who called it Alteca Boteca and thought it was meant literally, not ironically. Subsequently, when its real import was grasped, it was publicly condemned and burned. Later, Yosef ibn Shem Tov wrote a commentary on it. Duran's other polemical work, composed with the encouragement of Hasda'i ben Avraham *Crescas, was Sefer Kelimat ha-Goyyim. In this he analyzed such Christian doctrines as the divinity of Jesus, the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Virgin Birth, and original sin, with the object of showing how they were incompatible with the teachings of the New Testament. He also pointed out errors in the Vulgate and argued that they were the result of St. Jerome having been helped by a less than knowledgeable Jew, resulting in misquotation of the Hebrew Bible by Jerome and other church fathers. Duran also wrote a commentary on Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed, notes on Averroes's commentary on the Almagest, a commentary on parts of Avraham *ibn Ezra's commentary on the Pentateuch, various astronomical treatises, a criticism of Yosef ibn Naḥmias's Or 'Olam, a letter of condolence to R. Avraham ben Yitshaq ha-Levi that contains many of his philosophical ideas, and a history of the persecution of the Jews from the time of the Second Temple, which is now lost. In addition, he produced a grammatical work, the Ma'aseh Efad, which describes how Hebrew was pronounced by the Spanish community in the fourteenth century. In the introduction, he affirmed his belief in the perfection of the Torah and argued that the preservation of Torah was the reason for Jewish existence. At the same time he maintained that neither philosophical nor kabbalistic speculation were incompatible with the study of Torah. Duran's works were used by later Jewish apologists such as Yosef ibn Shem Tov and Shem Tov ibn Shaprut. Iggeret 'al Tehi ka-'Avotekha and Sefer Kelimat ha-Goyyim were published by J. D. Eisenstein in his Otsar Vikkuḥim (1928).

DURAN FAMILY, a family of rabbis and scholars.

Shim'on ben Tsemah Duran (1361–1444), rabbinic authority and religious philosopher known by the acronym Rashbats. He studied in his native Majorca and in Aragon. In addition to his religious education, he studied medicine and practiced in Majorca. After losing all of his belongings in the 1391 anti-Jewish outbreak, he moved to Algiers, where he served as a member of the beit din of *Yitshaq ben Sheshet Perfet (whom he succeeded as chief rabbi of Algiers in 1408). Because this was a full-time occupation, he had to break precedent and accept a salary, and he wrote responsa permitting sages to receive payment from community funds. His ordinances (taqqanot) on matrimonial matters retained their validity among North African Jewry for centuries. As a halakhist, he opposed stringency that had no Talmudic backing and stressed the use of logic in reaching legal decisions.

He was strongly influenced by Maimonides but did not accept certain of his philosophical views. He rejected Maimonides' opinion that the divine attributes were all negative and asserted that they were positive and identical with the essence of God. He held that humans receive a special soul from God (neshamah), which is responsible for their rationality, and this soul has the potentiality of immortality, depending upon the bearer's righteousness. He followed Maimonides' theory of prophecy but laid greater stress on the component of God's grace. He reduced the number of fundamental principles to three: the existence of God, the divine origin of the Torah through revelation, and the doctrine of reward and punishment (a formulation adopted by Yosef *Albo).

Duran was an enthusiastic follower of the Kabbalah, which he often quoted in his writings. He was also an outstanding polemicist. In his writings against the *Karaïtes, he stressed the oral law as the key to understanding the written law. He was familiar with Christian writings, holding that they had to be studied in order to be refuted. In his anti-Christian polemics, he argued that Jesus and his disciples observed the commandments and that his crucifixion was not the result of neglect of the Torah but because of messianic claims. In disputes with Muslims, he sought to prove the human origin of the Qur'an.

Duran's major work, Magen Avot (Leghorn, 1785; Vienna, 1864), covers subjects other than philosophy and relates to many areas of science. His writings include over nine hundred collected responsa (Teshuvot Shim'on ben Tsemah, usually known by the acronym Tashbetz [Amsterdam, 1738–1741; Lwów, 1891]) and branch out beyond legal matters to such fields as mathematics, astronomy, and Hebrew grammar. Duran also wrote piyyutim, in addition to commentaries on earlier poems.

Shelomoh ben Shim'on Duran (c.1400–1467), known by the acronym Rashbash; rabbi in Algiers and son of Shim'on ben Tsemah Duran. He studied with his father; his education extended beyond Jewish subjects to medicine, the natural sciences, and philosophy. A member of his father's beit din, he succeeded him after his death as rabbi of Algiers. Like his father, he was for many generations regarded as an outstanding authority by the Jews of North Africa. His main works are his responsa, published in Teshuvot ha-Rashbash (Leghorn, 1742), which deal not only with halakhic issues but also with matters of faith and philosophy, and Tiqqun Soferim (Leghorn, 1744) on contract law. Duran also wrote the polemical Milhemet Mitsvah (in J. D. Eisenstein, Otsar Vikkuḥim [1928], pp. 134ff.) to refute the attacks of the apostate Yehoshu'a Lorki on the Talmud.

Tsemaḥ ben Shelomoh Duran (15th cent.), rabbinical scholar in Algiers; second son of Shelomoh ben Shim'on Duran. He was dayyan in Algiers, together with his two brothers Aharon and Shim'on, and was well-versed in medicine, philosophy, and Kabbalah, toward which his attitude was positive. He laid down important rulings concerning Marranos, whom he regarded as halakhically Jewish. Some of his responsa are quoted by Yosef Karo, while one hundred fifty of his responsa were printed together with those of his brother Shim'on in Yakhin u-Vo'az (Leghorn, 1782).

DURESS (Heb. ones), forcing a person to speak or perform an act, or to abstain from acting or speaking, against the person's will. According to the Talmud, individuals are responsible for their actions only if they are initiated and performed of their own free will (B. Q. 28b). This principle is derived from Deuteronomy 22.25–28, according to which a betrothed virgin who has been raped is freed from all penalty, since she acted under compulsion (Ned. 27a). While various types of duress are recognized by halakhah, compulsion as grounds for extenuating circumstances refers only to physical violence or a threat to the life of the person concerned (following the phrase in Lv. 18.5, "he shall live by them [the commandments]," that is, not die by them [Ket. 33b]). Compulsion to commit one of the three cardinal sins—idolatry, murder, or an adulterous or incestuous act (San. 74a)—is to be resisted even at the cost of one's life. However, a person who violates one of these three precepts under duress remains unpunished by human courts (Yitshaq ben Sheshet Perfet, Resp. 4, 11, 387). A divorce granted under duress is invalid, and a woman who is forced to agree to wedlock is considered unmarried by law. Oaths or vows taken under duress are also invalid and carry neither obligation nor penalty. Similarly, a gift bestowed under duress may be rescinded (Shemu'el ben Me'ir on B. B. 47b), but a sale or purchase concluded under similar circumstances remains valid (Shulḥan 'Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 205.1). Saving one's life by means of another's property is permitted, but compensation must be made to the owner of the property; likewise, an injury caused under duress to one's fellow must still be compensated (B. Q. 27a).

DUSTAN (Dositheans), *Samaritan sect. Details are obscure; however, there are accounts of such a sect from the fourth century BCE and from the fourth century CE. The sect is mentioned in Samaritan sources, as well as by the church fathers and Muslim writers. Descriptions of the earlier sect mention various ways in which it diverged from the main Samaritan group, including differences in calendar, liturgy, and ritual law. The later Dustan sect had variations in the biblical text and in the calendar, and they observed all festivals on Sabbaths. The original sect may have continued to exist for a considerable time, and further sects may have derived from it.

DUTY (Heb. ḥovah), an obligation or due, payable by man to God or to his fellow man. The rabbinic idiom for fulfilling one's duty, "yots'ei yedei ḥovato," literally means emerging from the hold of one's obligation. Ḥovah is distinct from mitsvah*, which can also signify a commendable, but not necessarily obligatory, action (reshut); for example, each of the three daily prayer services is a mitsvah*, but whereas the morning and afternoon services are obligatory, the evening service is reshut. The rabbis insist that the commandments are to be observed as a duty and not in order to be rewarded (Avot 1.3). The Ḥovot ha-Levavot by *Baḥya ben Yosef ibn Paquda' distinguishes between the duties of the spiritual life and the ceremonial and practical obligations, the "duties of the limbs." The rabbis considered the performance of positively commanded actions, which expressed the desire to obey God's will, morally superior to voluntary good deeds.

Medieval philosophers maintained that duties of a moral nature, as distinct from ritual commandments, were independent of divine revelation since human reason and conscience would have formulated them. The philosopher Immanuel Kant asserted that true ethics must be "autonomous." A system of duties imposed by an "outside," that is heteronomous, source (e.g., God as in the case of Judaism) was of necessity inferior. This issue played an important role in the thinking of Hermann *Cohen and Franz *Rosenzweig, among others (see COMMANDMENTS, REASONS FOR).

DYBBUK, the disembodied spirit of a dead person that finds no rest on account of sins committed during life. A dybbuk seeks a haven in the body of a living person, talking through the mouth of the host and acting as an evil influence. Possession by a dybbuk is often taken as a sign of hidden sin on the part of the person possessed. The dybbuk can be exorcised by a religious rite.

The use of the term dybbuk is not attested before the seventeenth century, when belief in dybbuks became widespread, especially in eastern Europe and in Hasidic folklore, and found expression in popular legends and literature. The growing popularity of the belief is connected with that of gilgul (the *transmigration of souls), or, to be more precise, of 'ibbur (the "impregnation" of a living person or soul by another spirit), and is largely due to the doctrines developed by the disciples of Yitsḥaq Luria.

EBIONITES, designation applied to members of a Judeo-Christian movement within the early church. Their name probably derives from the Hebrew evyon (poor), a word that gradually assumed a theological connotation and was used by the eschatological groups to describe themselves: though they appeared poor, oppressed, and lowly (evyonim), they thought themselves destined to "inherit the kingdom of God" (see Mt. 5.3 and numerous references to evyonim in the *Dead Sea Scrolls). Knowledge of the Ebionites is derived solely from the polemical tracts of their orthodox Christian opponents, whose accounts are far from objective. From these narratives, it seems that the Ebionites were strict in their adherence to Jewish law and insisted that all devout Christians were bound by it. They observed the Sabbath and held their agapes (love feasts) on Sundays. While some of them accepted the divinity of Jesus, they refused to ascribe to him any kind of transcendental nature. Other Ebionites completely rejected Jesus' divinity but held that he was the *Messiah, chosen by God at the time of his baptism. The Ebionites were firm in their rejection of Paul and his teachings, which they regarded as heretical.

ECCLESIASTES, BOOK OF, one of the Five Scrolls (see HAMESH MEGILLOT) in the Hagiographa. It belongs to the genre of *wisdom literature and deals with universal philosophical questions rather than with Israel's covenant and history. The speaker, called Qohelet (which is the Hebrew name of the book and has been erroneously translated as Preacher), presents himself as having amassed great wisdom and wealth, in order to determine what, of anything, is of lasting value and how, if at all, God interacts with human beings. The book consists of his ruminations and findings: that all is controlled by God through a predetermined, unchangeable plan ("nothing new under the sun," Eccl. 1.9; "to every thing there is a season," Eccl. 3.1); that God torments humans by planting in their hearts the desire to comprehend this plan but preventing them from ever doing so; that human misery is caused by this, along with the refusal to remember the past; that the only true happiness is the enjoyment of one's earthly wealth; that this is indeed God's gift, but it is dispensed arbitrarily and is not necessarily a reward for virtue, thus, the moral governance of the world is crooked and cannot be rectified; and that the same final end—death—awaits all: righteous and wicked, the wise and the fool, human and animal. Acknowledging the impenetrable boundary between human beings and a totally omnipotent and unknowable God leads Qohelet to conclude that, since no other form of satisfaction exists, one ought to make the best of this earthly life, enjoying whatever blessings God has seen fit to grant. The end of the book enjoins humans to fear God and keep his commands, this submissive, subservient obedience to God without expectation of reward being the "whole of man" (Eccl. 12.13), the entire purpose of his existence. Since the speaker styles himself as "son of David, king in Jerusalem" (1.1, 12, 16, 2.9) and as the wisest man ever to live, it is most likely that the author wished to identify him with King *Solomon (1 Kgs. 3.5–28, 5.9–14, 10.1–13). Rabbinic tradition, while accepting this view (suggesting that Solomon arrived at his cynical views in his old age), attributes the actual writing of the book to King Hezekiah and his associates (B. B. 15a). Biblical scholars detect late elements in the book, including Greek influences, and tend to date it to the Hellenistic period. In Midrashic exegesis, Qohelet's apparent hedonism and his absolute denial of divine justice and of the afterlife were somewhat attenuated, bringing the book more into line with normative Jewish ideas. Still, some sages did not count it among the sacred scriptures (see BIBLE); others accepted its sanctity but advocated removing it from circulation, in light of its questionable theology (Eduy. 5.3; Yad. 3.5; Lv. Rab. 28). Qohelet's closing call for obedience to the commands of God (Eccl. 12.13) saved the book from oblivion: heterodox ideas are not shunned in Judaism as long as loyalty to the commandments is not affected. Ecclesiastes is read in Ashkenazi synagogues on the Sabbath of Sukkot (if there is no intermediate Sabbath, it is read on Shemini 'Atseret).

ECCLESIASTES RABBAH, midrash written in Erets Yisra'el on the *Book of Ecclesiastes. Midrash or Haggadat Qohelet, as it was called in the Middle Ages, and more rarely Midrash Hazita (see SONG OF SONGS RABBAH), covers almost every verse of Ecclesiastes. It is divided, in the manuscripts, into three uneven sections (which correspond today to chapters 1–6, 7–9.6, 9.7–12.14). The work draws heavily on earlier aggadic compositions, such as Genesis Rabbah and Leviticus Rabbah, and Julius Theodor reckoned that about one-fifth of Ecclesiastes Rabbah is made up of proems from these earlier works. This highlights the anthological nature of the composition, which is a very rich compendium of Erets Yisra'el aggadic traditions arranged under the headings of verses of Ecclesiastes. It contains the most extensive collection, for its period, of stories on Christian–Jewish relations (Eccl. Rab. 1.8). Louis Ginzberg showed that Jerome, in the late fourth century, made use of Hebrew traditions appearing in this midrash, but in its present form, it was redacted probably around the beginning of the seventh century CE. Though written in Rabbinic Hebrew and Galilean Aramaic, many scholars see traces of influence of the Talmud Bavli on Ecclesiastes Rabbah. This midrash circulated in the Middle Ages in an abbreviated version, later called Ecclesiastes Zuta (edited by Solomon Buber). It was first published in Pesaro in 1519. An English translation by Avraham Cohen appeared in the Soncino Midrash (1939).

EDELS, SHEMU'EL ELI'EZER (1555–1631), Polish Talmudist; known by the acronym Maharsha' (from Morenu ha-Rav Shemu'el Adels). He studied in and headed a yeshivah in Posen (Poznań) for several decades, supported by his wealthy mother-in-law, Edel, by whose name he came to be known, and later served as head of the yeshivot of Lublin and Ostróg.

An innovator in the area of Talmudic study, Edels developed a style of learning centered on novellae (hiddushim*), the discovery of which was often inspired by Edels's analyses of perplexing discussions found in the writings of the tosafists. Ironically, Edels's terse writing style occasionally left his readers uncertain of his own "solutions" and prompted them to develop their own novellae.

Edels likewise subjected aggadic portions of the Talmud to rigorous rational investigation and permitted himself periodically to draw upon his knowledge of philosophy for their explication. He exhibited critical textual analysis skills, pointing out on occasion erroneous interpolations in the texts of Rashi and the tosafists.

Edels was revered by his contemporaries and ensuing generations, and the study of his Hiddushei Halakhot (found in standard editions of the Talmud), became a requirement for Talmudic students.

EDEN, GARDEN OF. The expression "garden of Eden" is occasionally replaced by the parallel phrases "the garden of YHVH" (Gn. 13.10; Is. 51.3) and "the garden of Elohim" (Ez. 28.13, 31.8–9). According to the biblical tale, God planted a garden in Eden (Gn. 2.8–3.24) and charged *Adam with tending it. It was watered by a river that parted into four streams: Pishon, Gihon, Tigris, and Euphrates. Here *Eve induced Adam to eat with her the fruit of the *tree of knowledge of good and evil, though this was forbidden by God. Thus they gained a new insight into life but at the same time forfeited God's trust. Humans were ejected from the garden lest they also partake of the *tree of life and thereby secure immortality. The way to the garden was henceforth barred by the flaming sword of the angelic guardians. Another version of the story is found in Ezekiel 28.13–20. Several theories have been advanced as to the supposed site of the garden, though none is conclusive. The meaning of Eden is also debated. In the past, the favored derivation was from the Assyrian edinnu, derived from Sumerian, meaning "plain" or "steppe." Today, however, its etymology has been clarified in the light of a ninth-century BCE Akkadian–Aramaic bilingual inscription discovered in 1979 at Tel Fekheriyeh (near the Syrian–Turkish border). In this source, the root appears in the Aramaic version meaning "to be fruitful, plentiful," or "to be well-watered" (see also Gn. 18.2; Ps. 36.9). This etymology corresponds to the depiction of the garden of Eden as a luxuriously watered and fruitful place (Gn. 2.8–10), which became a major symbol in the Hebrew Bible of fertile and well-irrigated land (Gn. 13.10; Jl. 2.3; Ez. 36.35). This is also ultimately the connection between the Greek usage of the term paradise* to translate (gan) Eden in the Septuagint (e.g., Gn. 2.8) and the parallel usage of the Biblical Hebrew term pardes (well-watered grove, orchard; Eccl. 2.5–6). The parallel to the garden of Eden in the Sumerian creation myth is Dilmun, where sickness and death were unknown and which became the abode of the immortals. In the Sumerian and Babylonian myths, however, the story is governed by the contest of rival forces, whereas the biblical account is wholly subservient to a moral design. The Christian doctrines of the fall and original sin are based on interpretations of the biblical Eden story that are unknown in ancient Jewish exegesis, and it was only in medieval kabbalistic literature that doctrines like those of original sin and a primal fall were developed. Rabbinic texts distinguish between two gardens of Eden: an earthly garden and a heavenly one, the latter being the abode of bliss (paradise), reserved for the souls of the righteous. EDUCATION. The duty to instruct the people in God's commandments (cf. "you shall teach them diligently to your children," Dt. 6.7) is often emphasized in the Bible. At first, education was a matter of parental precept and example, supported by tradition and oral teachings. Literacy seems to have been widespread in ancient Israel (cf. Jgs. 8.14), and toward the end of the First Temple period, there is evidence of formal religious instruction by the Levites (cf. 2 Chr. 7.7ff.). The institution by Ezra of regular public readings of the Torah on Mondays and Thursdays—the days when farmers came to market—as well as the emergence of a nonpriestly class of scribes and scholars gave new impetus to education. The liturgical reading of the Torah was accompanied by exposition and instruction. *Shim'on ben Shetaḥ (1st cent. BCE) decreed that all youths aged sixteen or seventeen years were to receive a formal education, but teachers were only appointed in Jerusalem (Y., Ket. 50b). In the next century, the high priest, Yehoshu'a ben Gamla' (died c.69 CE), instituted elementary education for boys from the age of six and the appointment of teachers everywhere (B. B. 21a). The Mishnah (Avot 5.23) specifies the ages for the beginning of instruction: at age five a child is to begin studying the Torah, at age ten the Mishnah, and at age fifteen the gemara'. The Talmudic period saw the formulation of educational standards that remained in place until the onset of the modern period. Mild corporal punishment was permitted. According to the Talmud, the ideal number of pupils in a class was twenty-five; a teacher with between forty and forty-nine students was entitled to have an assistant, whose salary, like his, had to be paid by the local community. Should the number of students exceed fifty, a second teacher would have to be engaged (B. B. 21a). Talmud Torah* (study of Torah) was considered the most laudable of activities, and scholarship was a religious ideal. Higher rabbinic education was given in the beit midrash*, which was usually nearby the synagogue. In Babylonia, non-professional scholars would leave their farms or trade for the semiannual study month (kallah*). These retreats were geared to laymen rather than to scholars of the Talmudic *academies. Elementary education took place in a beit sefer (school)—known later as a heder* (room; in many cases such education was offered in a room of the teacher's home)—which was often maintained by the community. A father is required to teach his son Torah as well as a trade. Talmud Torah was restricted to boys, and the rabbis were critical of formal education for girls. Women were expected to learn only those laws relevant to them, and this within the confines of the home. Nevertheless, there were women, both in the Talmudic and in the medieval periods, whose scholarship was acknowledged by the rabbis. The tendency to restrict the curriculum to Jewish learning, and more particularly to Talmudic studies, became even more marked in the medieval and post-Reformation ghetto. During the Middle Ages, rabbis in many towns established their own yeshivah* or school for religious, especially Talmudic, studies. Sixteenth- and seventeenth-century yeshivot in eastern Europe were outstanding. In the nineteenth century, proposals by *Haskalah writers and others to reform the educational system—with the establishment of the heder metuqqan (improved or modernized heder)—aroused violent Orthodox opposition. On the other hand, *Neo-Orthodoxy in central Europe promoted a combination of secular and Torah studies. With the entry of Jews into modern society and the spread of universal education, the place of the Jewish school was taken, in Western countries, almost entirely by the general school, and Jewish education was limited to afternoon or Sunday "Hebrew school" classes organized by local synagogues. In recent decades, a tendency toward a more markedly Jewish education has asserted itself, partly through religious, partly through Zionist inspiration. In Israel there are three school systems—a general system, a general religious system, and the Ḥinnukh 'Atsm'ai system run by the *Ḥaredim. Nowadays, many a religious day school in the Diaspora calls itself a talmud Torah or yeshivah, and alongside the old-style yeshivot, institutions have developed combining the traditional Talmudic curriculum with a standard elementary and/or secondary education. Modern social and cultural trends have affected not only the methods, contents, and aims of these schools but also their underlying philosophies of education. One of the greatest changes in this regard is in the Jewish education now offered to girls and women in all frameworks including the Orthodox (although among the Orthodox, coeducation is not the general rule). A major change among more Orthodox males is that many now remain in special yeshivot (see KOLEL) for years after marriage. There has been a significant growth in the yeshivah student population throughout the world, especially in Israel and in the United States. Since World War II, there has been a great growth in the percentage of students attending Jewish day schools, and schools now exist among all the religious streams—Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform. Also on the rise, especially in the United States, are Jewish-studies faculties in universities.

'EDUYOT (עֲדוּיֹת; Testimonies), tractate in Mishnah order Neziqin, consisting of eight chapters, with related material in Tosefta'. It is one of the earliest tractates in the Mishnah, compiled in Yavneh not long after the destruction of the Second Temple, and reflects the profound changes within halakhic institutions that followed that event. Unlike other tractates in the Mishnah, 'Eduyyot has no unifying subject matter. It consists largely of testimonies of Yavnean sages regarding earlier halakhic traditions. Much of 'Eduyyot is preoccupied with the issue of halakhic controversy, primarily the highly divisive controversies between Beit Hillel and Beit Shamm'ai. 'Eduyyot establishes important principles of determining halakhic authority, balancing the idea of majority rule against the Mishnaic practice of preserving minority opinions as legitimate halakhic options that may be followed under certain circumstances.

An English translation of the Mishnah tractate is in Herbert Danby's The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

EFRAYIM SHELOMOH BEN AHARON OF LUNTSHITS (died 1619), known as 'Olelot Efrayim

from his work of that name; Polish preacher and rabbi. Born in Łęczysca, he studied under Shelomoh Luria in Lublin. Efrayim Shelomoh's outspoken preaching led to his flight to Jarosław, where he lived in penury. His homiletic skill was recognized by the Jewish autonomous body, the Council of the Four Lands, before which he preached, and was rewarded by its financial support. He became head of a yeshivah in Lemberg (Lwów) and in 1604 rabbi of Prague, where he died. He published six works: 'Ir Gibborim (Basle, 1580), 'Olelot Efrayim (Lublin, 1590), Orah le-Hayyim (Lublin, 1595), Keli Ya'ar (Lublin, 1602), Sifte Da'at (Prague, 1610–1611), and 'Amudei Shesh (Prague, 1618). His writing is characterized by colorful use of language, extensive knowledge of Jewish texts, and incisive social criticism. He saw himself as interpreting the moral message of the sources he used, and he was strongly opposed to the use of pilpul as a hermeneutic tool, appreciating the mystical sense of Torah and halakhah. He approved the study of mathematics and astronomy as aids to understanding classical Jewish texts. He criticized the rabbinate, particularly for allowing the purchase of positions and appointments based on family connections (yihus). He also bitterly attacked wealth, which he saw as a corrupting influence, and the wealthy—arguing that the choice of leaders should be based on moral criteria, not on possessions or mental ability alone.

EGER, 'AQIVA' (1761–1837), German rabbinic authority. Born in Eisenstadt, Eger, at age twelve, went to Breslau to study under his uncle, R. Binyamin Wolf Eger. 'Aqiva' was married at sixteen to the daughter of Yits'haq Margolis of Lissa, where he studied for ten more years. Although averse to the rabbinate as a profession, financial difficulties in 1791 forced 'Aqiva' to accept a position in the Brandenburg region. He remained there until 1815, when, after a protracted struggle between traditionalist and modernizing forces regarding his appointment, he became rabbi of the city of Poznań, the prominent community with which his name was thereafter associated.

Eger's tenure in Poznań was marked by constant battles with reformist elements on the communal board. Nonetheless, he spoke out openly in favor of political emancipation and enjoyed the respect of the highest government officials. His decrees during the 1831 cholera epidemic helped to limit its spread and merited him a royal letter from Frederick William III.

Eger's modesty and humanity were the subjects of popular legends, and his hundreds of responsa (1834; pt. 2, 1839) attest to his revered position among the leading contemporary Torah authorities. Among his most noted works are: Gilyon ha-Shas (1830–1834), notes on the Talmud Bavli printed next to the text of the Vilna edition; Haggahot (1859), glosses printed on the pages of the standard Shulhan 'Arukh; and Hiddushim (1858), Talmudic novellae.

'EGLAH 'ARUFAH (עֵגְלָה עֲרוּפָה; decapitated calf), a heifer whose neck was broken as a ritual atonement for an unsolved murder. According to Deuteronomy 21.1–9, if a corpse was discovered in a field and the identity of the murderer could not be ascertained, the elders of the town closest to the body were commanded to take a heifer "that has never been worked, that has never pulled in a yoke" and break its neck "in an overflowing valley that is not plowed or sown." They then had to recite a formula proclaiming their innocence, while the priests added a prayer for the forgiveness of the people. The 'eglah 'arufah ritual was performed in order to atone for the community, which shared indirect responsibility for the shedding of innocent blood. Some commentators view the use of an unworked heifer as symbolic of a life that has been snuffed out prematurely. The laws of the 'eglah 'arufah are developed in the Mishnah (Sot. 9.1–9) and Talmud Bavli (Sot. 44b–47b). According to the Mishnah (Sot. 9.9), the custom was discontinued early in the first century CE, after the occurrence of murders grew in frequency.

EḤAD MI YODE'A (אֶחָד מִי יוֹדֵעַ; Who Knows One?), a song of medieval origin and unknown authorship sung in Ashkenazi rites at the end of the Pesah *Seder service. It is made up of thirteen riddles (possibly because the numerical value of the Hebrew word eḥad [one] is thirteen) and was inserted especially to maintain the interest of children participating in the service. It was originally composed as a song for festivals in general; from the fourteenth century it was reserved for the Seder.

EINHORN, DAVID (1809–1879), Reform rabbi. Born in Germany, Einhorn held rabbinical positions in Germany and then in Budapest, until the authorities closed his synagogue under pressure from the Orthodox after he had served there only two months. He moved to the United States in 1855 and officiated in Baltimore (1855–1861, leaving because of his opposition to slavery), Philadelphia (1861–1866), and New York (1866–1879). Einhorn was the spokesman of radical Reform in the United States, denying the continued authority of the Talmud and introducing Sunday services at which worship was conducted with uncovered head to the accompaniment of organ music. A brilliant preacher (in German—his last sermon was a plea for the retention of German in Reform congregations) and a considerable rabbinical scholar, he taught that the ceremonial laws of Moses were only symbolic, that biblical miracles were allegories, and that Judaism should maintain only that which is rational. The ritual elements of Judaism hindered the rational comprehension of revelation. In the messianic age, Einhorn argued, Israel's unique insight would be universalized, and Jews would no longer have—or require—a separate identity.

His prayer book, 'Olat Tamid (1856), was composed mostly in German (the text reads from left to right), with a small number of prayers in Hebrew. It omitted prayers for the revival of sacrifice, the return to Zion, and the resurrection of the dead. The English version (prepared by his son-in-law Emil Hirsch) formed the basis of the Union Prayer Book.

Einhorn engaged in fierce disputes with Isaac Mayer *Wise, whom he regarded as too moderate and too willing to compromise for the sake of unity. In 1869 he (and Samuel Adler) challenged Wise by calling a conference in Philadelphia. Delegates at this conference passed resolutions advocating radical Reform in theology, liturgy, and practice (one resolution called for the bride to be an equal partner in the marriage ceremony).

Einhorn's collected sermons, edited by his son-in-law Kauffman Kohler, appeared in the David Einhorn Memorial Volume (New York, 1911).

EIN KE'LOHEINU (אֵין כְּלוֹהֵינוּ; There Is None Like Our God), hymn of praise, recited in the Sephardi rite at the end of the Shahrar service, extolling the uniqueness of God; among Ashkenazim it is said only on Sabbaths and festivals at the conclusion of the Musaf service. It is of early origin and is found in the prayer book of R. *Amram bar Sheshna' and the Mahazor Vitry (see SIMḤAH BEN SHEMU'EL OF VITRY). In old sources, the order of the first lines was reversed, but it was changed to form the acrostic "Amen, blessed be you." The conclusion in the Ashkenazi version constitutes an introduction to the following *Pittum ha-Qetoret reading.

EIN SOF (אֵין סוֹף; No End), kabbalistic term indicating the supreme divinity, the Godhead, the source of all divine and earthly existence. It may have originated with Hebrew descriptions of the Aristotelian concept of the primal cause. Several kabbalistic systems, including the Zohar, equate it with the first and highest sefirah (divine emanation), the keter (supreme crown), while others opposed this identification and insisted that the Ein Sof was beyond the sefirot. Some kabbalistic texts described the Ein Sof as the ultimate source of divine will or divine thought. According to most kabbalistic systems, the Ein Sof is beyond the reach even of mystical contemplation, but some kabbalists, including R. Yitshaq ben Shemu'el of Acre at the beginning of the fourteenth century, described the possibility of spiritual union with it.

One of his students was R. Yonatan *Eybeschuetz, who lived in Eisenstadt's home following the death of his parents. Eisenstadt's literary fame rests largely upon his Panim Me'ivot (Amsterdam, 1715), a collection of halakhic responsa and novellae on the Talmudic tractates Beitsah, Gittin, Qiddushin, Bava' Qamma', and Zevahim.

EIVAR MIN HA-HAI (אֵיבָר מִן הָחַי; a limb from the living), the prohibition, derived from Deuteronomy 12.23, against eating a limb or organ torn from a living animal, beast, or bird. This prohibition is one of the seven *Noahic laws (San. 56a), derived from the verse "only flesh with the life thereof . . . shall you not eat" (Gen. 9.4) enjoined upon Noah. The rabbis ruled that although one may derive benefit from a limb taken from a living animal, such as by feeding it to another animal, it is forbidden to sell the limb or even give it to a non-Jew, since the Noahic laws are binding upon gentiles as well as upon Jews. The rule does not apply to fish, which do not require ritual slaughter.

EL'AZAR BEN 'ARAKH (1st cent.), Palestinian tanna'. He was the favorite student of R. Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai, who said "If all the sages of Israel, including R. Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos, were on one side of the scale, and R. El'azar ben 'Arakh was on the other side, he would outweigh them all" (because of his originality and creativity, like "a surging spring"; Avot 2.8). According to another tradition, reflecting his interest in mystical studies, when El'azar began to expound on ma'aseh merkavah*, fire fell from heaven, the trees burst into song, an angel cried out from the fire, and R. Yoḥanan praised God and extolled his student: "... for you expound well and carry out precepts well. Happy are you, Abraham our father, that El'azar ben 'Arakh descended from you" (Ḥag. 14b). Upon R. Yoḥanan's death, rather than join his teacher's other disciples in Yavneh, he followed his wife's advice and remained in luxurious Emmaus, after which his influence was diminished (according to some traditions, he forgot all his learning, then had it restored; Shab. 147b; Eccl. Rab. 7.7, sec. 2). He taught: "Be constant in Torah study, know what to reply to an apiqoros*, and know before whom you labor, for your employer is faithful and will pay you your wages for your work" (Avot 2.14).

EL'AZAR BEN 'AZARYAH (1st–2d cent.), tanna'. He came from a wealthy aristocratic family. While still in his teens, he succeeded R. Gamli'el, when the latter was temporarily deposed from the presidency of the *Yavneh academy. After Gamli'el's reinstatement, El'azar continued to play a central role in the communal and religious life of his time and traveled to Rome with Gamli'el for meetings with the Roman authorities and the Jewish community. El'azar was an outstanding preacher and aggadist and is credited with some of the basic maxims of the Talmud, for example, "Saving a life takes precedence over the Sabbath" (Shab. 132a); "The Day of Atonement does not atone for sins against one's fellow man until the person sinned against has been appeased" (Yoma', end); "Without Torah there can be no virtuous behavior, without virtuous behavior there can be no Torah" (i.e., the one is worthless without the other, Avot 3.21); and "The Bible is written in human language" (Qid. 17b, in defense of the literal interpretation of scripture). He was also responsible for the hermeneutical principle (see HERMENEUTICS) according to which a biblical verse can be interpreted in the light of the preceding or following verse.

EL'AZAR BEN PEDAT (4th cent.), Babylonian and Palestinian amora'; usually referred to simply as El'azar. Of priestly lineage, he was born in Babylonia and received instruction from Shemu'el and Rav before settling in Erets Yisra'el, where he was ordained. He was taught by R. Hosha'yah Rabbah in Caesarea and by R. Ḥanina' bar Ḥama' in Sepphoris (see Y., Ter. 8.5, 45c; in Meg. 15a, R. El'azar transmits the famous dictum of R. Ḥanina' that he who states a saying in the name of its originator brings redemption to the world). He also studied with R. Yoḥanan bar Nappaha', succeeding him as head of the Tiberias academy in 279 but dying that same year (according to Iggeret Rav Sherira' Ga'on). In the Talmud Yerushalmi, he often passes on traditions in the name of Ḥiyya' ben Abba', with whom he worked harmoniously (Y., B. M. 10.4, 12c). It was said that his absorption in Torah study was such that he would become oblivious to material matters ("he sat in the lower market of Sepphoris, while his garment lay in the upper market of Sepphoris," Eruv. 54b). His reputation as a Torah scholar was equally acclaimed: according to R. Yoḥanan (Yev. 72b) he once seemed "like Moses expounding from the mouth of the Almighty," and in his old age he was known as "the Master of the Land of Yisra'el" (Yoma' 9b).

He is mentioned thousands of times in the Talmud and midrashim, and the Talmudic phrase "they sent from there" (San. 17b) is used with specific reference to his teachings being brought to Babylonia. Through his brilliant and encyclopedic scholarship, he was one of the formative sages in the development of the oral law. He also laid down principles for resolving halakhic disputes in the tannaitic sources (as passed on, in particular, by R. Yehudah ha-Nasi'; cf. Yev. 42b). Some of his teachings and aggadic comments have taken on almost proverbial significance in Judaism: the practice of charity is greater than all sacrifices, but acts of kindness are greater than charity (Suk. 49b); a man without a wife is not a man (Yev. 63a; cf. Git. 90b, where it is stated that the altar weeps over the man who divorces his first wife); and, a person should continue to hold out hope for mercy, even when a sharp sword lays on his neck (Ber. 10a).

Both his poverty and generosity were fabled (Ta'an. 25a; Y., B. M. 2.3, 8c). At times he could barely afford to eat (in spite of earning his living by testing coins; B. Q. 100a), which led to weakness and health problems (Ber. 16b). But he refused to accept gifts from the nasi', citing Proverbs 15.27, "he who hates gifts shall live" (see Meg. 28a), and stressed to all the members of his household the necessity of practicing hospitality without earthly reward (Y., Pe'ah 8.6, 21a).

EL'AZAR BEN SHAMMU'A (2d cent.), Palestinian tanna'. Tradition relates that after the twelve thousand pairs of disciples of R. 'Aqiva' had died (purportedly because of their lack of respect for one another), 'Aqiva' elevated five last disciples, of whom R. El'azar, a priest (Sot. 39a) born in Alexandria, was the most prominent (Yev. 62b; Gn. Rab. 61.3), comparable in learning to his teacher (cf. Eruv. 53a). After the Bar Kokhba' Revolt, he and the other disciples were ordained by R. Yehudah ben Bava', in violation of the Roman ban (San. 14a). El'azar fled for safety until the Hadrianic persecutions waned, then returned to Galilee to establish his academy (Y., Hag. 3.1, 78d). He was one of the teachers of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' (Men. 18a), who reported that the students in R. El'azar's academy had to sit cramped six to one cubit (Eruv. 53a). Later, R. Yehudah included some of his rulings in the Mishnah (e.g., Git. 9.4; however, there is constant confusion in the sources between R. El'azar and R. Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos). Called the happiest of the sages by Rav (Ket. 40a), he lived (according to a later tradition) to be 105, the result of scrupulous piety toward God and man (Meg. 27b), dying as one of the fabled *Ten Martyrs, commended by a divine voice for his lifelong purity (San. 14a; Midrash Elleh Ezkerah).

Once El'azar and R. Yoḥanan ha-Sandalar decided to go to Nisibis, Babylonia, to study with R. Yehudah ben Batyra', but when they reached Sidon, they tearfully recalled Erets Yisra'el and returned home exclaiming "Dwelling in Erets Yisra'el is equivalent to keeping all the commandments of the Torah" (Sifrei on Dt. 80).

El'azar taught that only he who studied Midrash, halakhot, and aggadot was a fully rounded scholar. He emphasized the importance of teachers and students treating one another with respect and honor (Avot 4.12, in clear contrast to the poor behavior of the previous disciples of R. 'Aqiva').

EL'AZAR BEN SHIM'ON (2d cent.), Palestinian tanna'. Together with his father, R. *Shim'on bar Yoḥ'ai (Suk. 45b), he is the subject of extensive aggadic material, including their fabled thirteen years of hiding from the Romans in a cave (cf. Shab. 33b; B. M. 85a) and their alleged authorship of the *Zohar. El'azar was pressured into working for the Roman government, helping to apprehend Jewish thieves, in spite of the disapproval of his colleagues (B. M. 83b). However, his stature was such that upon his death his widow refused to marry R. Yehuda ha-Nasi' (with whom El'azar had frequent halakhic disputes), claiming that Yehudah was not her late husband's equal (B. M. 84b). El'azar is cited directly in the Mishnah only three times (e.g., Beits. 4.5, although several anonymous mishnayot were later attributed to him; cf. Hul. 30a) but is mentioned often in baraitot in the Tosefta' and Talmuds. The comment in his eulogy that he was a liturgical poet (Lv. Rab. 30.1) led some to identify him incorrectly with R. El'azar Kallir.

EL'AZAR BEN TSADOQ (1st–2d cent.), Palestinian tanna'. Of priestly lineage, he was the son of R. Tsadoq, a noted tanna' of the late Second Temple period (cf. Git. 55b–57a). He transmitted traditions and personal recollections (e.g., Hul. 90b; Suk. 41b) related to Second Temple services and customs, also recounting some of the horrible sufferings that took place at the time of the Temple's destruction (Lam. Rab. 1.47; T., Ket. 5.10). He was among the sages who subsequently convened at Yavneh, dealing especially with calendrical matters and working closely with R. Gamli'el (e.g., Pes. 37a). He eventually disseminated the Yavneh traditions among the sages who convened at Usha'. For his teaching on suffering, reward and punishment, and the afterlife, see Qiddushin 40b to Job 8.7 and Proverbs 14.12; for his adage on good deeds, see Nedarim 62a. His grandson, also El'azar ben Tsadoq, was a tanna' of the late second century.

EL'AZAR BEN YEHUDAH OF WORMS (c.1165–1230), the most well-known writer of esoteric theology and ethics of the Kalonimos school of Ashkenazi Hasidism (see HASIDEI ASHKENAZ), which flourished in the Rhineland in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. His teacher was R. *Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Ḥasid, the leader of that school. El'azar's best-known work is the halakhic code Roqeah (Fano, 1505), a word that is numerically identical to El'azar. To this work he added an extensive ethical introduction, which deals with the norms of piety (hasidut) and repentance. He wrote an extensive commentary on the prayers, which survived in three manuscript editions, each probably representing an original version of this work that was reedited by the author. This work is based in part on Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Ḥasid's commentary, which is lost; El'azar's is the first commentary on the prayers that has survived. When Yehudah died in 1217, El'azar began to commit to writing the esoteric traditions of the Kalonimos school in a series of books. Five of these are collected in his Sodei Razayya' (edited by I. Kamelhar [1936]): Sod Ma'aseh be-Re'shit, Sod ha-Merkavah, Sefer ha-Shem, Hokhmat ha-Nefesh (Lwów, 1876) and the commentary on Sefer Yetsirah* (Przemysł, 1883). The basis of his thought is the utter spirituality and transcendent uniqueness of God, from whose concealed essence there emanates the visible glory that links the infinite divine with finite creation. He also wrote commentaries on biblical books and on piyyutim. In his Sefer ha-Hokhmah, written in 1217, he presented his methodological concepts, the system of seventy-three gates of wisdom according to which divine truth is organized. Repentance plays a major role in his teaching. His wife and daughters were massacred by Crusaders before his eyes, and he dedicated a poem to their memory. His disciples included *Yitshaq ben Mosheh of Vienna and *Avraham ben 'Azriel.

EL'AZAR BEN YOSEI (2d cent.), Palestinian tanna', to be distinguished from El'azar ben Yosei, the fourth-century Palestinian amora'. Often quoted with praise by his father, Yosei ben Halafta' (e.g., Pes. 117a), he is cited directly in the Tosefta', though not in the Mishnah; however, many anonymous mishnayot are to be attributed to him (e.g., Kel. 11.3). The Talmud counts him among the Yavneh sages and relates that he journeyed to Rome with R. Shim'on ben Yoḥai to appeal to Caesar to rescind his decree forbidding circumcision and Sabbath observance (Shab. 33b). He emphasized the efficacious power of Israel's charity and kindness (B. B. 10a).

EL'AZAR HA-QAPPAR (2d cent.), Palestinian tanna', probably to be distinguished from Bar Qappara', apparently his son. He is quoted in the Mishnah, baraitot, and Talmuds and was a member of the academy of R. Yehudah ha-Nasi' (T., Ohal. 18.18). He taught that envy, lust, and ambition take a man out of the world (Avot 4.21) and described in detail the fearful reality of the final judgment (Avot 4.22). Other preserved teachings concern the sin of denying oneself the pleasures of life (Ta'an. 11a, to Nm. 6.11), Second Temple customs relating to Yom Kippur (Yoma' 67a), poverty (Shab. 151b), and the importance of national unity and the greatness of peace (Sifrei on Nm. 42). The epithet Ha-Qappar may be derived from the town of Qefira' in the Golan, where an inscription was discovered in 1969 bearing his name (or that of his son); the Syriac qufra' (asphalt dealer); or the Hebrew qapparis (caper blossom), indicating that he may have worked with spices or drugs related to the plant.

ELBOGEN, ISMAR (1874–1943), scholar and teacher. Born in Poznań, Elbogen was one of the most important intellectual and institutional forces in early twentieth-century Jewish scholarship in Germany. He studied in Breslau, both at the local university and at the Breslau Rabbinical Seminary. He was appointed Dozent at the liberal Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums in 1902, where he remained for over thirty-five years. Elbogen's most significant research lay in the area of Jewish liturgy, in which he produced a major study entitled Der jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung (1913), which surveyed the history of Jewish synagogal prayer. Elbogen also published widely in the field of Jewish history, including a volume on Jewish history in Germany and a supplementary volume to Heinrich *Graetz's history of the Jews (A Century of Jewish Life [1944]). Elbogen immigrated to the United States in 1938, where he served as editor for a large and diverse array of journals and encyclopedias in German, English, and Hebrew.

ELDAD AND MEDAD, two Israelites who were among the seventy elders who started prophesying in the wilderness when the spirit of God rested upon them. Joshua insisted on silencing them, but Moses reacted with the words, "Would that all the Lord's people were prophets" (Nm. 11.29).

ELDAD HA-DANI (9th cent.), traveler of uncertain origin who claimed to come from the lost tribe of Dan. He announced the existence of an independent Jewish kingdom in Ethiopia comprised of remnants of the tribes of Naphtali, Gad, Asher, and Dan. His warring kingdom lived across the *Sambatyon from the "sons of Moses." This mythical river was believed to be a mighty torrent of stones all week that rested on the Sabbath. Eldad gave vivid descriptions of the customs of his community to the Jews of Kairouan. His announcement of Jewish sovereignty stirred the imagination of Mediterranean Jewry who eagerly hoped to learn of the lost ten tribes and their traditions regarding the advent of the Messiah. His divergent rituals regarding shehitah puzzled his North African Jewish audience, who wrote to Tsemah Ga'on, the leading scholar in Baghdad, regarding his identity and that of the Jews he represented. The ga'on reassured his interlocutors in Kairouan that, although Eldad's customs were indeed at variance with the norm, they need not be considered heretical. Diversity of practice was commonplace in the Diaspora. Eldad also presented his audiences with a number of unknown Hebrew designations of a zoological and botanical nature.

Eldad's account was extremely popular among medieval Jews and was first printed in Mantua in 1480. Some medieval authorities such as Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg and Avraham ibn Ezra regarded him as an impostor. Some scholars assert that Eldad's account influenced Christian legends of Prester John. Some modern scholars, however, postulate on linguistic grounds and internal evidence that Eldad originated among the Jews of Ethiopia.

ELDERS (Heb. zeqenim), in ancient times, the authoritative body ruling the people or state. The first such group to be appointed was during the time of Moses (Nm. 11.16–17), but similar bodies are reported to have existed earlier, both among the Jews in Egypt (Ex. 3.16, 12.21) and at Sinai, where seventy elders were privileged to accompany Moses up the mountain (Ex. 24.1). On several subsequent occasions (e.g., 1 Kgs. 21.8–14, the narrative of Naboth's vineyard) the elders are mentioned as a representative and an advisory, though never a legislative, body. The Mishnah (Avot 1.1) reports that the elders constituted a link in the chain of tradition between Joshua and the prophets. Reference to the elders is found in the Book of Ezra (10.8), and it is possible that they were the basis for the *Keneset ha-Gedolah. Many scholars maintain that the elders participated in administering affairs of state until the Hasmonean period and that their functions were eventually incorporated into those of the Sanhedrin. The elders doubtless included men noted for their sagacity and learning, not necessarily for their great age. See also GEROUSIA.

ELI, high priest at Shiloh and judge in Israel before and during the days of *Samuel's youth (1 Sm. 1–4). When Eli was a priest at the sanctuary in Shiloh, he did not recognize Hannah's praying and rebuked her for assumed drunkenness (1 Sm. 1.9–18). Similarly, when the young Samuel heard God calling to him in the sanctuary, Eli did not recognize the divine communication until the third call (1 Sm. 3). His sons Hophni and Phinehas are portrayed as wicked priests who had no regard for God, abused "the offering of the Lord" (cf. 1 Sm. 2.29), and "lay with the women who served at the entrance of the tent of meeting" (1 Sm. 2.22). For these reasons, the house of Eli was condemned by an unnamed "man of God" (1 Sm. 2.27), who stated that God would choose a "faithful priest" whose descendants would replace the line of Eli (1 Sm. 2.29–35). Eli died upon hearing that the Philistines had killed his sons and captured the Ark of the Covenant, which his sons had carried into battle as a talisman to ensure Israel's victory (1 Sm. 4).

ELI'EZER BEN HURQANOS (1st–2d cent.), *tanna', pupil of *Yohanan ben Zakk'ai (whom he helped to smuggle out of Jerusalem during the Roman siege), and teacher of R. *Aqiva' ben Yosef; he was also known as Eli'ezer the Great. After the destruction of the Temple, Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos headed the academy of Lydda and was a leading member of the Sanhedrin. He was one of the central figures in the critical transitional period following the destruction of the Second Temple. As depicted in the sources, he possessed a phenomenal memory and accumulated and retained ancient traditions of the Second Temple period that were in opposition to the new tendencies of the *Yavneh academy. His many halakhic opinions tended to be stringent, based as they were on the teachings of the school of Shamm'ai (see BEIT HILLEL AND BEIT SHAMM'AI). His protracted struggle with the nasi' (patriarch) and other members of the Sanhedrin and his refusal to accept the majority ruling culminated in his excommunication and ostracism from the academy (B. ELI'EZER BEN NATAN OF MAINZ (c.1090–1170), rabbinic scholar, tosafist, and legal authority; known by the acronym Raban. He studied in Mainz in the period just after the First Crusade (on which he wrote a booklet). In 1150, together with R. Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam and R. Shemu'el ben Me'ir, he promulgated the so-called Troyes ordinances, tagqanot in various fields of Jewish law.

Rabbi Eli'ezer's major work, called Sefer Raban or Even ha-'Ezer (Prague, 1610), contains halakhic rulings and responsa following the order of the Talmudic tractates. It includes much information about the scholars and practices of France, Germany, and Babylonia. Another work attributed to Raban, Tsafnat Pa'neah, has not survived, although it appears to have been related to Sefer Raban. Rabbi Eli'ezer commented extensively on piyyutim and other aspects of the liturgy. Subsequent Ashkenazi commentators on the prayers often added their remarks to the commentary of Raban. Sefer Raban was published with a commentary by Solomon Z. Ehrenreich in 1926).

ELI'EZER BEN YO'EL HA-LEVI OF BONN (c.1140–1225), rabbinic scholar, tosafist, and legal authority; known by the acronym Rabbiah or Ravyah. He was the grandson of R. *Eli'ezer ben Natan of Mainz, the leading halakhist of twelfth-century Germany. His father, R. Yo'el ha-Levi of Bonn, was venerated by tosafists in both Germany and northern France. Eli'ezer traveled throughout Germany, studying with such masters as Rabbi Eli'ezer of Metz, R. Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Ḥasid, and R. Yehudah ben Kalonimos of Speyer. He established his academy in Bonn and moved to Cologne toward the end of his life.

The bulk of his major work of Jewish law, known as Sefer Rabiyyah (vols. 1–3 [1933–1935]) or Avi ha-Ezri, was published by Victor Aptowitzer in three volumes, along with an introductory volume containing biographical descriptions of Eli'ezer and his family, teachers, and students (vol. 4 was edited by M. H. Fischel [1965]; additional volumes have been published by David Dablit-sky [1976–1989]). This work is a collection of legal decisions, responsa, tosafot, and other extracts arranged according to the order of the tractates of the Talmud. Eli'ezer also wrote a separate work on the orders of Nashim and Neziqin entitled Avi'asaf, which was cited in Ashkenazi rabbinic works of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries but is no longer extant. The beginning of Eli'ezer's treatise, entitled *Seder Bayit Shen*i, has survived.

He refused compensation for teaching Torah and turned down formal rabbinic office. He was a leading proponent of the Ashkenazi practice of adhering to the view of the majority in matters of communal government, defending this position against challenges from rabbinic scholars of northern France.

ELI'EZER BEN YOSEI HA-GALILI (2d cent.), tanna; pupil of R. *Aqiva ben Yosef, he was one of those who established the academy at *Yavneh (Ber. 63b) and then in Usha'. A noted aggadist, he is credited with having laid down thirty-two hermeneutical rules for the interpretation of the *aggadah (see HERMENEUTICS). These were preserved in a special baraiyta', which is printed in some Talmud editions after the tractate Berakhot. It was also discovered in a manuscript entitled The Mishnah of Rabbi Eli'ezer, to which was appended another longer midrash attributed to him, but probably of a much later date, also known as Midrash Aggur. He is only mentioned once in the Mishnah (Sot. 5.3) but frequently in baraiyot. His halakhic dicta are few, and most of his extant statements are of an aggadic nature.

ELI'EZER OF BEAUGENCY (12th cent.), biblical exegete. Eli'ezer was part of the northern French school of biblical exegesis. These scholars, beginning with *Rashi, focused their efforts on explaining the Bible according to the plain meaning of the text (see PESHAT). Three commentaries by Eli'ezer of Beaugency have been preserved: Isaiah (published by Nutt [1879]), Ezekiel, and the Twelve Minor Prophets (published by Poznanski [1907–1913]). From citations in these commentaries, scholars believe that Eli'ezer probably also wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, Jeremiah, Psalms, Ecclesiastes, and Daniel. Eli'ezer's commentaries are distinguished by clarity of style. He placed particular emphasis on the historical allusions in the prophetic books, and although he admired the work of his predecessors, he did not hesitate to disagree with them. Eli'ezer's commentaries provide a window into the broader cultural life of northern French Jews. He frequently provided glosses, in Old French, on Hebrew words (see LA'AZ). He also knew Latin, and he cites the Vulgate in his commentaries in order to refute Christological interpretations of the prophetic literature. His commentaries focus on the themes of martyrdom and exile, in an effort to provide spiritual sustenance to Jews of his generation, who had endured the Crusades and other, less-violent, forms of Christian evangelization.

ELI'EZER OF TOUQUES (died c.1290), rabbinic scholar and tosafist. He studied with R. Yitshaq ben Mosheh of Vienna and was the teacher of R. Hayyim Palti'el. He was considered by his contemporaries to be on a par with R. Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg, the leading German scholar of the late thirteenth century.

Rabbi Eli'ezer was one of the last editors of tosafot*. His tosafot were based primarily on earlier ones by R. Shimshon ben Avraham of Sens and R. Yehudah ben Yitshaq. The disciples of R. Me'ir of Rothenburg used R. Eli'ezer's tosafot extensively, which hastened their acceptance. The printed tosafot to the tractates of Shabbat, Pesaḥim, Ketubbot, Gittin, Bava' Qamma, Bava' Metsi'a, Bava' Batra, Shevu'ot, and Hullin were edited by R. Eli'ezer, making him the most important editor of the standard tosafot texts. It is unclear whether R. Eli'ezer hailed from the village of Touques (in Normandy) or whether he arrived there from Germany, where several members of his family lived.

ELIJAH (Heb. Eliyahu; 9th cent. BCE), prophet in the northern kingdom of Israel who appears in the narratives of 1 Kings (18–19; 21) and 2 Kings (1–2) during the reigns of kings Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram. It is generally believed that Elijah came from Gilead in Transjordan, based on his identification as the "Tishbite" in biblical tradition. The Hebrew text in 1 Kings 17.1 refers to him as a "sojourner in Gilead," but it does not identify Tishbe as a place name. The Septuagint, on the other hand, refers to "Tishbe in Gilead" in 1 Kings 17.1. Elijah is portrayed as a miracle worker who feeds the widow of Zarephath and restores life to her dead son as a means to legitimate his prophetic calling. His Transjordanian origins could account for his opposition to the religious and political policies of the Omride monarch Ahab and his Tyrian-born wife Jezebel, who promoted the worship of the god Melqart. Elijah fought the Arameans' efforts to bring the country into a closer relationship with the Phoenicians. Elijah called for the exclusive worship of God. Together with his successor, *Elisha, he helped to bring about the overthrow of the Omride dynasty. Elijah is best known for his contest on Mount Carmel against the four hundred fifty prophets of Baal (see BAAL WORSHIP) and the four hundred prophets of *Asherah (1 Kings 18). Both Elijah and the pagan prophets prepared altars and called upon their respective deities to light the sacrificial fires in order to demonstrate their divine powers. Although the prophets of Baal spent half a day in pleading, frenzied dancing, and self-immolation, they received no response. After pouring water over his altar, Elijah called upon God, who sent a fire that consumed the entire altar. When Jezebel sought to kill Elijah for executing the prophets of Baal, Elijah fled to Mount Horeb (Mount *Sinai) where he lodged in a cave (1 Kgs. 19). Like Moses in Exodus 33, Elijah experienced a divine revelation, which included wind, earthquake, and fire. God did not appear to Elijah in any of these phenomena but only in the form of a "still small voice" (1 Kgs. 19.12); he commanded him to anoint Hazael as king of Aram and Jehu as the new king of Israel (tasks eventually fulfilled by Elisha), and to appoint Elisha as his prophetic successor, in order to prepare for the overthrow of the Omride dynasty. Elijah is also known for his condemnation of Ahab for his role in the murder of Naboth the Jezreelite (1 Kgs. 21). When Ahab was frustrated in his attempts to buy Naboth's vineyard, Jezebel had Naboth executed on trumped-up charges of treason so that Ahab could then take possession of the vineyard without cost. Like Moses, Elijah's death was not witnessed by human beings. Instead, he was carried off by a chariot and horses of fire to heaven in a whirlwind before the eyes of his successor Elisha (2 Kgs. 2). Some thought Jesus to be Elijah (e.g., Mt. 16.14; Mk. 6.15), but Jesus denied this and attributed the role to John the Baptist (e.g., Mt. 11.14; Mk. 9.17ff.).

The prophecy in Malachi 3.23, in which Elijah appears as the precursor of the *Messiah who will "turn the hearts of the fathers to the children and the hearts of the children unto their fathers," combined with the fact that he did not die, succeeded in producing the image of the ever present prophet, wandering incognito over the earth, sometimes in the garb of a nomad, to aid in moments of distress and danger, appearing to scholars and mystics to teach them hidden truths, and acting as a celestial messenger. In folklore Elijah also appears in synagogues as a tenth man to make up the prayer quorum (minyan). The word teiqu in the Talmud is considered (popularly, but doubtfully) an acronym for the sentence meaning that the answer will eventually be given by Elijah. From the belief that he taught Talmudic sages emerged the *Seder Eliyyahu, supposedly communicated to R. 'Anan, the basis of the Midrashic compilation known as Tanna' de-Vei Eliyyahu. Identified with the "angel of the covenant" in Malachi 3.1, where the word for covenant, berit, suggested the berit milah, the "circumcision, Elijah came especially to be associated with the circumcision ceremony and was thought to be present at every such occasion as guardian and witness (see ELIJAH, CHAIR OF). He is also associated with the Pesah *Seder: the custom of a fifth cup of wine, known as the "cup of Elijah," has given rise to the popular belief in his invisible presence. (In fact, there was a dispute in the Talmud about whether to drink four or five cups at the Seder, and the fifth cup is placed there teiqu—to await Elijah's decision.) In hopes of his arrival, the front door is opened in the course of the evening to welcome him. The prominence of Elijah in the *Havdalah liturgy ushering out the Sabbath (including the popular hymn Eliyyahu ha-Navi') is also connected with his traditional role as harbinger of the Messiah.

ELIJAH, BOOKS OF. Two different works are known as the Apocalypse of Elijah. In spite of their many differences, the two works share some traits and may both have been based on an earlier Jewish text(s). Moreover, there are other Elijah traditions in Jewish and in Christian literature, some of which may ultimately have derived from the same postulated text(s).

The Coptic Apocalypse of Elijah is a Christian work, originally written in Greek but extant only in a Coptic translation. It was composed in Egypt in the second half of the third century CE. It is a composite work, which includes an exhortation to prayer and fasting, a brief overview of historical events, and a description of the last days, the coming of the Antichrist, and the cosmic upheavals that will precede the final judgment.

The Hebrew Apocalypse of Elijah is a Jewish work, written in Hebrew and generally dated in the geonic period (6th–10th cent.). It purports to record the revelations made to Elijah on Mount Carmel by the archangel Michael and contains descriptions of Elijah's heavenly journey and of future events, such as the advent of the Antichrist, the eschatological upheavals, and the salvation of the righteous.

ELIJAH, CHAIR OF (Heb. kise' shel Eliyyahu), a special chair placed for *Elijah the prophet at every *circumcision ceremony. When the baby boy is brought into the room for the circumcision, he is, in some customs, first placed on Elijah's chair as the mohel says "This is the chair of Elijah the prophet, of blessed memory"; in other customs (such as the Moroccan) the sandaq sits in the chair during the ceremony. One reason given for the symbolic presence of Elijah at the circumcision ceremony (Zohar on Gn. 93a) is that Elijah, the personification of uncompromising zeal, complained to God that the children of Israel had "forsaken your covenant" (1 Kgs. 19.10). God therefore decreed that he should be present at every circumcision in order to testify that the people are in fact faithful to the covenant (Zohar on Gn. 17.10; Pirkei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer, end of 29; Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 265.11). Based on Malachi 3.1, Elijah is mentioned in rabbinic sources as "the angel of the covenant" (and circumcision is the sign of the covenant). In Sephardi communities, Elijah's chair is a permanent item of the synagogue furniture. This may derive from the time when all circumcisions were held in the synagogue.

ELIMELEKH OF LYZHANSK (1717–1787), Hasidic master and author. A disciple of Dov Ber of Mezhibezh, he became the most influential Hasidic leader in Galicia after his teacher's death in 1772. He was one of the first to develop a Hasidic court. As the tsaddiq*, he was supported primarily by contributions that accompanied requests for his prayers. By nature, he was extremely ascetic. In his youth, he wandered around the pale of settlement with his brother Zusya* of Hanipoli, symbolically identifying with the exile of the shekhinah. His many disciples were instrumental in spreading and establishing Hasidism in Poland. Among them were Ya'aqov Yitsḥaq, ha-Ḥozeh mi-Lublin; Menahem Mendel ben Yosef of Rymanów; and Avraham Yehoshu'a Heschel. In his work No'am Elimelekh (edited by Gedaliah Nigal [Jerusalem, 1978]), he was one of the first to grapple with the paradoxes involved in the theory of the tsaddiq. The tsaddiq must be a figure who can combine the spiritual aspiration of being entirely immersed in God with a compassionate concern for the material well-being of his followers. Essential to the tsaddiq's path were periodic falls. By deliberately descending, even through the commission of light transgressions, the tsaddiq could achieve even greater heights and uplift his community with him.

ELISHA (9th cent. BCE), prophet in the northern kingdom of Israel; son of Shaphat from Abel-meholah, Gilead. Elisha prophesied during the reigns of Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, and Jehoash. Elisha was designated as the prophetic successor to Elijah*, who threw his mantle upon Elisha (1 Kgs. 19.19–21) while he was plowing his fields. The primary narratives concerning Elisha's career appear in 2 Kings 2–13. Much more than is the case with Elijah, Elisha's prophetic status is legitimated by a series of legendary stories that portray him as a miracle worker and powerful "man of God." He parted the waters of the Jordan (2 Kgs. 2.14); called on a bear to kill the boys who taunted him for his baldness (2.19–25); filled a widow's jar with oil to save her from debt (4.1–7); brought the Shunammite woman's dead son back to life (4.8–37); cured the leprosy of Naaman, the general of the Aramean forces (5.1–19); brought leprosy upon Gehazi for his dishonesty (5.20–27); caused an iron ax head to float (6.1–7); and blinded an Aramean raiding party (6.8–23). Apparently, these stories were originally preserved among the "sons of the prophets," that is, the prophetic guild of which Elisha was the leader. His most important role was initiating the revolt of Jehu against the royal house of Omri, in which Jezebel*, the Phoenician-born wife of Ahab, was executed. Following the instructions of his late master, Elijah, Elisha anointed Hazael to take control of the Aramean throne and anointed Jehu as the next king of Israel, thereby paving the way for the overthrow of the Omride dynasty and the purge of Baal worship (2 Kgs. 8.7–15, 9.1–37).

ELISHA' BEN AVUYAH (2d. cent.), tanna'; teacher of R. Me'ir*. His doctrines stress the virtue of ethical behavior, without which mere legal observance is valueless. Deeply affected by the failure of the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (which he might have opposed) and influenced by mysticism, he came to reject rabbinic Judaism (especially the theory of reward and punishment and the resurrection of the dead) and apparently accepted one of the then widespread branches of heretical gnostic thought. The Talmud (which, in view of his defection, never calls him by name, but refers to him as Aher [another]) mentions his absorption in sectarian literature and Hellenistic song (Ḥag. 15b); it also relates that he endeavored to influence students to abandon their Talmudic studies. The rabbis found it difficult to understand how such a great sage could have left the fold and suggested a variety of explanations, some of which serve to mitigate his personal responsibility for his actions (e.g., Qid. 39b). Rabbi Me'ir was the only one of his disciples who continued a personal relationship with him, begging him to repent even in his final hour. Me'ir continued to learn from him, and this was later explained in the following manner: R. Me'ir found a pomegranate; he ate its flesh, and threw away its peel (Ḥag. 15b).

ELI TSIYYON (עִלִּי צִיּוֹן; Lament, O Zion), alphabetical hymn of medieval origin describing the misery accompanying the destruction of the Second Temple. It is sung in Ashkenazi rites on Tish'ah be-'Av after the reading of qinot (dirges); the congregation stands for what is the climax of the service. The traditional melody, the origin of which is debated by musicologists, has influenced the chanting of other prayers recited during the three weeks of mourning (see BEIN HA-METSARIM) culminating in Tish'ah be-Av.

• Adele Berlin, ed. and trans., Biblical Poetry Through Medieval Jewish Eyes (Bloomington, Ind., 1991).

ELIYYAHU BEN SHELOMOH ZALMAN OF VILNA (1720–1797), Lithuanian Talmudist, halakhist, kabbalist, and biblical commentator, popularly known as the Vilna Ga'on or Ha-Gra', an acronym for Ha-Ga'on Rabbenu Eliyyahu, whose erudition established him as one of Judaism's greatest post-medieval scholars. A precocious child and virtually self-taught, he reputedly knew the Torah at age three and a half, had delivered a learned discourse in the Vilna synagogue at six and a half, and had mastered Talmudic literature by age nine.

The Vilna Ga'on contributed to every aspect of traditional Jewish scholarship in over seventy works, including commentaries to scripture and the Mishnah, commentaries and glosses to the Talmuds Bavli and Yerushalmi as well as the Shulhan 'Arukh, commentaries on tannaitic Midrashic works, as well as over thirty commentaries on kabbalistic texts. He was also the author of a Hebrew grammar book and composed treatises on astronomy, geometry, and geography, encouraging his disciples to master the sciences. However, he fiercely opposed the study of philosophy.

He applied sophisticated philological expertise in analyzing texts, subjecting them to both internal and external criticism, proposing emendations to establish correct readings, and determining proper understanding of the text unclouded by fanciful pilpulistic expositions. His commentary on the Shulhan 'Arukh sought to clarify the nature of halakhic disputes and trace all legislation to its primary source, the Talmud. He advocated a disciplined progression in studies, recommending that students possess a thorough knowledge of the rules of grammar and familiarity with all of scripture before commencing the study of the oral law.

The Vilna Ga'on's ascetic lifestyle and passionate devotion to scholarship caused him to shun socializing. He slept only two hours out of each twenty-four-hour period. He occupied no public position and had no community responsibilities other than to study and teach a small circle of disciples.

The emergence of the Hasidic movement prompted him to enter the public sphere. He leveled several bans of excommunication against Hasidim between 1772 and 1796 for alleged halakhic and theological infractions. Perceiving Shabbatean influences in the new movement and disturbed by monistic and quasi-pantheistic elements in the writings of his Hasidic adversary, "Shneur Zalman of Lyady, the Vilna Ga'on apparently feared that Hasidism could dethrone Torah study from its preeminent position by extolling moralistic literature over Talmudic texts and religious ecstasy over sober study, and by revering the Hasidic 'tsaddiq for his charismatic powers rather than his Torah scholarship.

Although the Vilna Ga'on stood as the preeminent kabbalistic scholar of his era and, according to his disciples, received nightly revelations from heaven, his attitude toward such visions was characterized by reticence. He did not welcome "intrusions from heaven" but preferred the mental exertion of study and rational analysis in order to arrive at the truth.

He was a fiercely independent scholar who did not hesitate to dispute the authorities of earlier generations if he deemed their interpretations to be in error. His disciple Hayyim ben Yits'haq *Volozhiner testified, "I was warned by the Ga'on not to submit, even to the decisions of our rabbis, the authors of the Shulhan 'Arukh, when it came to matters of halakhah" (Hut ha-Meshullash no. 9).

The Vilna Ga'on's major published works are Commentary to the Pentateuch (Dubrovno, 1804), Commentary to Shulhan 'Arukh (1803–1885, found in standard editions of the Shulhan 'Arukh), Commentary to Mekhilta (1844), Commentary to Sifra (1911), Commentary to Sifrei (1866), Commentary to Sifra de-Tseni'uta (Vilna, 1820), Commentary to Zohar (Vilna, 1820), Commentary to Proverbs (Petaḥ Tikvah, 1985), and Glosses to the Talmud (found in standard editions of the Talmud).

ELLEH EZKERAH (אֵלֶּה עֲזֵכְרָה; "These things I remember"), opening words of an elegy written as an alphabetic acrostic for the *Ten Martyrs that, in the Ashkenazi rite, is read during the repetition of the Musaf service on *Yom Kippur and, in the Sephardi and *Adot ha-Mizraḥ rites, on the fast of *Tish'ah be-Av. Ostensibly a poetic version of the Midrash Elleh Ezkerah, describing Hadrian's campaign against the Jews in the second century CE, this dirge reflects the contemporary massacre of innocents during the First Crusade (1096–1099) and the poet's own attempt to justify bewildering calamities: "Hatred pursues us; through all the years / Ignorance like a monster has devoured our martyrs. . . ."

ELLU DEVARIM SHE'EIN LAHEM SHI'UR (אֵלֶּה דְּבָרִים שֶׁאֵין לָהֶם שִׁעוּר; "These are the things without measure"), the opening words of a composite paragraph in the Morning Benedictions (Birkhot ha-Shaḥar) with which the daily liturgy begins; the passages cited are Mishnah Pe'ah 1.1 and Shabbat 127a. "Things without measure" refers to activities prescribed by the law. A minimum level of compliance with these things is sometimes fixed, but the maximum is to be determined by the generosity of the individual. Among these are the portion of the harvest left behind for the poor (pe'ah), according to Leviticus 23.22; the practice of benevolence, including personal service as well as charity for the needy; and the study of the Torah, which may be pursued both day and night, according to Joshua 1.8. Next are enumerated various activities that both promote the welfare of society and provide a reward in the future world for the one who does them. These include providing a dowry for a bride, visiting the sick, and burying the dead. A thoughtful reading of this passage is considered a partial fulfillment of the duty to study the law. Ellu Devarim she-'Ein Lahem Shi'ur is found in all traditional and modern prayer books.

EL MALE' RAHAMIM (אֱלֹהִים מְלֵא רַחֲמִים; God, Full of Compassion), prayer for the repose of the souls of the dead (hazkarat neshamot). This prayer is recited when a person observing a yortsayt* is called to the reading of the Torah to pray for the soul of the deceased relative. In many Orthodox synagogues, the mourner makes a donation to charity, and this is mentioned in the prayer. Its current form is late, probably dating from the time of the Chmielnicki pogroms (1648–1649), though the custom of praying for the repose of the dead dates back to earlier times. In many Ashkenazi communities, the prayer is also recited after a burial, on the thirtieth day after a death, at tombstone consecrations, and after the recitation of the Yizkor* prayer on the Shalosh Regalim and on Yom Kippur. It corresponds to the Sephardi Ashkavah* prayer. The text is shortened in Reform services. A special version has been composed for victims of the Holocaust. El Male' Rahamim is usually chanted to a solemn melody.

EL MELEKH NE'EMAN (אֱלֹהִים מֶלֶךְ נֶאֱמָן; "God, faithful king"), a phrase interposed in the Babylonian and Ashkenazi rites (but not the Sephardi and Habad) between the Ahavah Rabbah* benediction and the recitation of the Shema'; its initial letters form the word amen. The phrase may have been introduced in order to preface the Shema' with the basic idea of divine kingship, which does not occur in the Shema' itself. Some authors explain that the words El melekh ne'eman are added to the Shema' based on the Midrashic view that there must be 248 words in it (Tanhumah' [Buber] Leviticus 37b–38a with note 25), to correspond to the 248 parts that, according to the rabbis, made up the human body. It is recited only when the Shema' is said in private prayer. (In public prayer, the first three words of the third paragraph of the Shema' are repeated to bring the number of words up to 248.) The old Palestinian rite, instead of El melekh ne'eman, has benedictions proclaiming God's kingship and unity that are recited before performing a ritual commandment.

EL NORA' 'ALILAH (אֵל נֹרָא 'אִלִּיָּה; God, Whose Deeds Are Awesome), a selihah (see SELIHOT) in the Ne'ilah* service for Yom Kippur, by Mosheh ibn Ezra. Each of the seven stanzas concludes with a reference to the "closing of the gates," an allusion to the practice of closing the portals of the Jerusalem Temple at nightfall. The poet prays that by that moment, which marks the end of Yom Kippur, the community's repentance may be complete and acceptable to God. This selihah, originally recited only in the Sephardi rite, has been incorporated into a number of Ashkenazi prayer books, and likewise into the Conservative, Reconstructionist, and Reform liturgies.

ELUL (אֱלוּל), sixth month in the religious calendar; twelfth and last in the civil. It has twenty-nine days and its zodiac sign is Virgo. The name is Babylonian in origin and first occurs in Nehemiah 6.15. During Temple times, messengers would travel from Jerusalem to the Diaspora to announce the date of the new moon of Elul so that the following new moon, Ro'sh ha-Shanah* (the month of Tishrei), could be accurately determined. Elul is a month of repentance and preparation for Yom Kippur. In the Ashkenazi rite the shofar* is sounded throughout the month of Elul after the Shaharit service (except on Sabbaths and the eve of the New Year) in order to inspire a mood of penitence. Sephardi Jews call Elul the month of mercy and recite selihot* nightly throughout the month; Ashkenazim start their recitation of selihot on the Saturday evening preceding the New Year (unless the New Year falls on Monday or Tuesday, in which case the recitation of selihot is commenced a week earlier).

EMANATION, the process by which entities (personal or impersonal) proceed directly from a higher to a lower entity. Unlike the act of creation*, which is defined as an act of will of a personal Creator, emanation is often conceived as an impersonal and almost natural process, like the emanation of rays from the sun. Doctrines of emanation generally suppose a higher degree of affinity, or even a substantial identity, between the various forms of being—they may be higher or lower, spiritual or material, but ultimately all derive from a single source—whereas the doctrine of creation implies an essential discontinuity between the Creator and all other beings. Doctrines of emanation are prominent in *gnosticism, Neoplatonism, and various mystical systems. Since medieval philosophy was heavily influenced by both Neoplatonic and Aristotelian doctrines, different theories were held by different thinkers regarding the emanation of lower levels of being (e.g., the sublunar universe) from higher ones (e.g., the celestial spheres). These views, however, referred to the created universe, contradicting Greek philosophical, especially Neoplatonic, traditions. Religious Orthodoxy insisted that the universe as such was “created out of nothing” (see also COSMOLOGY). The chief works of Jewish mysticism, namely kabbalistic literature, combined gnostic and Neoplatonic elements, developing an esoteric doctrine of emanation (atsilut) as an inner-divine process describing the complex structure of the one deity—reminiscent in some ways of the Christian Trinity. The kabbalistic doctrine of emanation is concerned with the procession of the “divine worlds” rather than with the origin of the cosmos as a whole, and it describes the fullness of the manifest Godhead (sefirot*) as it emerges from the hidden depths of *Ein Sof. The symbolic and speculative elucidation of the nature and character of this process is one of the main themes of theoretical kabbalistic literature (e.g., in the *Zohar and in the works of Mosheh ben Ya’aqov *Cordovero). Whether emanation is restricted to the sphere of the divine or whether it also extends to the lower worlds is a matter of controversy among kabbalistic schools.

EMANCIPATION. From late antiquity and throughout the Middle Ages until the American and French Revolutions at the end of the eighteenth century, Jews lived everywhere under special laws. To be sure, in medieval Europe the legal and political system identified everyone as a member of a specific group, caste, or profession, with laws applicable to each. Nonetheless, the Jews were different, because the very existence of their religion betokened their denial of the dominant religion, Christianity. They were limited by laws that forbade them the right to employment in most trades or the right to own land, and they could live only where they could buy or wangle special permission. Therefore, in the eighteenth century, when the demand for equality for all began to move toward the center of politics, Jews had a special, intense need to be released from their legal ghetto.

The source of the willingness at the beginning of the modern era by some in western Europe to grant the Jews equality was twofold. Some statesmen had begun to welcome Jews in the seventeenth century in the name of mercantilism; that is, because they wanted rich Jews who would bring advantage to the state. In the eighteenth century, the Enlightenment taught that man could be reformed through improved social conditions. It followed that Jews could be taken from the ghetto and refashioned to fit into the larger society through equality and education. These notions combined to create the first document in which Jews were given full equality, the Constitution of the United States, which was adopted in 1789. In the English colonies in North America, every hand and every artisan on the frontier was necessary, regardless of his religion. The authors of the Constitution were also, for the most part, men of the Enlightenment who believed in human perfectibility. Emancipation happened in the United States as a matter of course. In France, the “Jewish question” had been debated in books and pamphlets for several decades before the French Revolution because the Jewish community was so large, numbering some forty thousand members. The ten thousand, somewhat assimilated Sephardim (Jews who had crossed the Pyrenees to escape the Inquisition) were quickly granted equality by special decree in January 1790, but the debate about the thirty thousand, Yiddish-speaking, and totally unassimilated Jews who lived in eastern France continued to the very last day of the National Assembly. The new state simply could not refuse to grant Jews equality after it had already made hangmen, actors, and vagabonds into equal citizens. The persistent motif was that individual Jews would be given equality provided they were assimilated. Twenty years later, Napoléon even tried to get the Jews to agree that every third marriage would be to a non-Jew and that the central Jewish organization would be responsible for military recruitment and for the “good conduct” of the community (see ASSEMBLY OF JEWISH NOTABLES; CONSISTOIRE; SANHEDRIN, FRENCH). He failed to prevail, but the shadow of this pressure remained.

For the Jews themselves, Emancipation raised fundamental questions about how they were to conceive and organize their inner life. In Holland, where the revolutionary armies of France made possible the creation of the Batavian Republic in the 1790s, there was an open debate. Jewish conservatives preferred to forgo all the rights of citizenship because they wanted only broader economic rights and the preservation of their own self-governing Jewish community. The liberals, who wanted to become Batavian citizens of the Jewish faith, won the internal battle. In less overt terms, this battle was repeated in much of Europe. The old believers everywhere preferred a gentler version of their existing life, but the Jewish bourgeoisie and the increasingly Westernized intelligentsia invariably prevailed. The internal battle was, however, secondary to the rising tide of opinion in western and central Europe that discrimination was against the law of progress and that the modern state could not function if it continued to impose medieval laws of exclusion on the Jewish minority. Until the end of the Napoleonic empire, Jews were equal in law in every territory that his armies had conquered. When the French empire came to an end at the battle of Waterloo in 1815, Emancipation was reversed everywhere except in France itself.

However, during the nineteenth century, Emancipation was finally achieved throughout central and western Europe. Eastern Europe had to await the fall of the tsar in 1917 before Jews in Russia and the Russian empire (including Poland) were emancipated and received civil rights. In the Muslim world, European colonial powers spread Emancipation to some countries, but in more distant parts, such as Yemen, the Jews were only emancipated when they moved to the State of Israel, which itself represented a new achievement: the appearance of a Jewish nation among the nations of the world.

The struggle for Emancipation had been closely connected to the struggle for religious freedom and the separation between church and state. As long as Christianity was regarded as the state religion or the state as a Christian state, it followed that those who did not profess the faith were denied the privileges of full citizenship and civil rights. Thus, for example, the struggle for the admission of a Jew to the British Parliament centered on the abolition of the oath that every member had to take "on the true faith of a Christian." In many European countries, Judaism was recognized as an official faith to the extent that the government levied taxes on all professing Jews for the upkeep of Jewish religious and communal institutions. Already under Napoleon Emancipation involved relinquishment by the Jews of internal legal jurisdiction over their members; the role of the rabbi was restricted to religious matters.

Emancipation led to far-reaching changes in Jewish social and religious life. The Jews now had to face the challenge of living in two worlds. With the disappearance of external forces that had unified the community, secularization and *assimilation set in and many Jews converted to Christianity, more of them out of the desire to join the majority society than out of religious conviction. Reform Judaism was founded on the one hand to provide an alternative for those Jews who found traditional Judaism incompatible with modernity and on the other in the conviction that Emancipation and liberalism heralded a messianic age. The Talmudic rule dina de-malkhuta dina was comprehensively reinterpreted by the reformers, and laws maintaining Jewish exclusiveness were jettisoned. Even Orthodoxy was influenced by the Emancipation, and *Neo-Orthodoxy was based on the principle that strict Orthodoxy was compatible with complete social participation in the cultural and civic spheres of national life. With Emancipation and consequent acculturation the nature of *Jewish identity changed radically, and the comparatively monolithic Jewish historical identity now gave way to a variety of forms of identification. EMDEN, YA'AQOV (1697–1776), rabbinic scholar and authority; known as Yavets, an acronym of Ya'aqov ben Tsevi. Born in Altona, where he lived most of his life, Emden was greatly influenced by the Torah studies and anti-Shabbatean polemical activities of his father Tsevi Hirsch *Ashkenazi. Emden was a preeminent scholar who produced an extensive literary oeuvre covering virtually all aspects of Jewish intellectual creativity including commentaries on the Bible (lost), the Mishnah (including a separate volume on Avot), the Talmud (in manuscript), the siddur, and the Shulhan 'Arukh; almost four hundred responsa; a major ethical tract; a book on grammar; several sermons; and an autobiography called Megillat Sefer (1896). He played a major role in the eighteenth-century battle against Shabbateanism. In the last two and a half decades of his life, he became obsessed with exposing any vestiges of that generally subterranean movement, motivated perhaps in part by the presence of Shabbateanism within his own immediate family. In 1751 he accused R. Yonatan *Eybeschutz, recently elected chief rabbi of the neighboring communities of Hamburg, Altona, and Wandsbek and one of the leading rabbinic figures of his generation, of being a clandestine follower of *Shabbetai Tsevi. This extremely serious charge, effectively one of heresy, gave rise to an intense, bitter, and repercussive controversy. Local secular authorities and the Danish monarch were drawn by both sides into the conflict, as were leading rabbis from across the Jewish world. Emden lived long enough to witness the emergence of the *Haskalah. Unlike some of his more traditional colleagues, he shared some of the openness to secular culture found in that movement headed by his acquaintance Moses *Mendelssohn. At the same time, Emden rejected its fundamental assumptions and vehemently opposed its effect on his contemporaries.

EMET VE-'EMUNAH AND EMET VE-YATSIV (אֱמֶת וְאֵמוּנָה; אֱמֶת וְיָצִיב; True and Trustworthy; True and Firm), openings of the *Ge'ullah blessing to be said after reciting the three paragraphs of the *Shema' in the evening and morning service respectively. The Talmud Bavli states that whoever does not recite Emet ve-Yatsiv in the morning and Emet ve-'Emunah in the evening has not fulfilled his obligations (Ber. 12a). These prayers were already recited in the Temple service (Tam. 5.1; Ber. 2.2). No interruption may be made between the end of the preceding third paragraph of the Shema' and the first words of these prayers (Ber. 2.2, 9b, 14a–b). The evening formulation differs from the morning one in accord with the biblical phrase "to proclaim . . . your faithfulness each night" (Ps. 92.2). The prayer professes the eternal truth of divine revelation and faith in the unity of God.

ENOCH (Heb. Hanokh), the name of two biblical figures. The earlier Enoch (for whom the first city was named; Gn. 4.17–18) was the eldest son of Cain and father of Irad.

The next known Enoch was the son of Jared and father of Methuselah. Enoch lived "three hundred sixty and five years, and . . . he walked with God and he was not, for God took him" (Gn. 5.21–24). This enigmatic statement describing his death was interpreted in later literature as symbolizing his miraculous ascension alive to heaven, where he enjoyed a close relationship with God (Gn. 5.18–19, 21–24). See also ENOCH, BOOKS OF.

ENOCH, BOOKS OF, literary works supposed to have been written by, or at the time of, *Enoch, Son of Jared, who—though of minor significance in the Bible—seems to have captured the imagination of the Bible's early readers. Enoch is reported to have "walked with God" and to have been "taken" by God (Gn. 5.24). The latter phrase was the starting point of many Second Temple period traditions concerning Enoch's heavenly journey.

The First Book of Enoch is preserved in its entirety only in Ethiopic, but Greek and Latin fragments are also extant, and numerous fragments of the original Aramaic text(s) were found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls. It is a composite work made up of several different sections, whose dates of composition range from the third century BCE to the first century CE. Parts of 1 Enoch recount events in Enoch's life, including his involvement in the account of the fallen angels who were expelled from heaven, a story based in part on Genesis 6.1–4. Other sections of 1 Enoch contain apocalyptic revelations, in some of which Enoch is taken on heavenly and earthly journeys and is taught the secrets of the universe, and in others of which he sees symbolic scenarios depicting the history of the world, and especially of the Jewish people, from the Creation to the final judgment. One of these historically minded apocalypses, the so-called "Animal Apocalypse," clearly was written in the wake of the Hasmonean revolt (see HASMONEANS) and is therefore contemporaneous with the *Book of Daniel. Several sections of 1 Enoch have exerted a considerable influence not only on some of its (chronologically) later sections, but also on such works as the *Book of Jubilees and on some of the texts found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls. The popularity of this Enochic corpus is also attested by its mention in the *New Testament (Letter of Jude 14).

The Second Book of Enoch is a composite work, preserved only in two different Slavonic versions, clearly derived from a Greek version, which may in turn have been a translation from a Hebrew or Aramaic original. The date and place of composition are difficult to determine, and while an Egyptian Jew living in the first century BCE or CE would be a likely author, a later Christian author cannot be ruled out. In the first part of the book, Enoch describes the heavenly tour on which he was taken, and during which he learned the secrets of the universe, and exhorts his children to behave righteously and to observe various moral and halakhic precepts. This section ends with Enoch's translation to heaven. The second part of the work describes events following Enoch's death, including Methuselah's service as a priest, the miraculous birth of Melchizedek, and the Flood.

The Third Book of Enoch is a composite Hebrew work extant in several different recensions and probably compiled in the sixth or seventh century CE in Erets Yisra'el or in Babylonia. It describes the ascent of R. *Yishma'e'l ben Elisha' to heaven and his encounter with the archangel Metatron, who recounts how he was originally called Enoch and was taken into heaven where he was transformed into an angel. Enoch–Metatron takes R. Yishma'e'l around heaven and reveals to him the secrets of the universe and of the angelic world. In its style and subject matter, 3 Enoch clearly belongs with the so-called *Heikhalot literature, with its many descriptions of God's heavenly court and the hierarchies of the angelic world and their daily liturgies and with its pseudonymous ascription of such traditions to important tannaitic figures such as R. Yishma'e'l.

EPHOD, in the Torah, one of the ceremonial *priestly vestments, namely, the elaborate, apronlike outer garment described in Exodus 28.6–12 and 39.2–7 to be worn by Aaron, the high priest. Its two shoulder straps bore two lapis lazuli stones encased in golden frames; upon each stone were engraved the names of six of the tribes of Israel. Thus, the high priest symbolically represented the entire Israelite people when ministering "before the Lord" (Ex. 28.12). Two more golden frames, each with a golden chain descending from it, were attached to the shoulder straps; on these, the breastpiece containing the Urim and Thummim (see ORACLES) was suspended. The high priest's robe, worn together with the ephod, is also referred to as "the robe of the ephod" (Ex. 28.31, 29.5).

In the remaining books of the Bible, the term ephod refers to some unspecified religious article. Sometimes it appears to be a garment, such as the linen ephod worn by Samuel (1 Sm. 2.18) and by David (2 Sm. 6.14), which was not like the costly and intricate ephod of the high priest. Elsewhere, it is certainly not a vestment at all but an object of worship (Jgs. 8.27, 17.5, 18.14, 18.17) or an article for divination (1 Sm. 23.9, 30.7; Hos. 3.4). Although the exact meaning of the word ephod is unknown, it has Akkadian, Ugaritic, and Syrian cognates.

EPHRAIM (Heb. Efrayim), Joseph's second son, born in Egypt; his mother was Asenath, daughter of Potiphar, priest of On (Gn. 41.50–52, 46.20). Before his death, *Jacob counted his grandsons Ephraim and Manasseh as his own heirs, which later led to their status as independent tribes, and blessed them both with fertility. He also placed his right hand on the head of the younger son, Ephraim, thereby granting him priority over his older brother, Manasseh (Gn. 48). Moses, too, in his blessings to the tribes before his death, blessed both Ephraim and Manasseh with fertility and recognized Ephraim's priority over Manasseh (Dt. 33.13–17). Ephraim's dominance over Manasseh in these blessings probably reflects the historical reality of early Manassehite numerical, political, or cultic superiority, which was later superseded by the Ephraimite tribe.

After the conquest of Canaan, the tribe of Ephraim received territory in the hills of Samaria. It was the tribe of *Joshua and the site of Shiloh, the sanctuary where the Ark of the Covenant was kept. It also took the lead in splitting the kingdom after the death of Solomon. Jeroboam of the tribe of Ephraim was the first king of the northern kingdom, which was sometimes known as Ephraim (cf. Is. 7.17).

EPSTEIN, JACOB NAHUM (1878–1952), scholar of Talmud and rabbinics. Born in Brest Litovsk, Poland, he received traditional religious training in eastern Europe before moving on to university study in Vienna and Bern. After earning his doctorate in Bern in 1912, Epstein published extensively in German over the next decade in the fields of geonic and Talmudic philology. In 1915 Epstein also began work on a monumental project: the production of a critical edition of the Mishnah. In 1923 Epstein began to teach at the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums in Berlin. Two years later he was appointed to a professorship in Talmudic philology at the fledgling Institute of Jewish Studies of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. In his opening lecture in Jerusalem, Epstein reiterated the need for a critical edition of the Mishnah. Though he never completed this task, he did publish a major two-volume work, Mavo le-Nusah ha-Mishnah (Jerusalem, 1948), which identified and cataloged discrete strands of the Mishnah. Two other preparatory works of his on the Mishnah were published posthumously, Mevo'ot le-Sifrut ha-Tanna'im (1957) and Mevo'ot le-Sifrut ha-Amora'im (1962).

EPSTEIN, YEHI'EL MIKHAI (1829–1908), rabbi and halakhic authority. He was born in Bobruisk, Belorussia, and studied in Volozhin under R. Yitsḥaq of Volozhin. In 1874 he was appointed rabbi of Novogrudok, Belorussia, where he remained until his death. Epstein's fame rests with his 'Arukh ha-Shulḥan (1884–1907), a comprehensive code of Jewish law that utilizes the framework of the Shulḥan 'Arukh*. In his introduction, Epstein wrote that many difficult legal issues had arisen in the three hundred years since the publication of the Shulḥan 'Arukh, and, therefore, "anxiety and confusion have reappeared, particularly in this lowly generation in which there are few students of Torah." Epstein, therefore, undertook to compose a work that would summarize and amplify the opinions of the Shulḥan 'Arukh and present and decide among the various opinions advanced since its publication. Epstein also codified material relating to the Temple period and Erets Yisra'el in his 'Arukh ha-Shulḥan he-'Atid (published posthumously from 1938 to 1969).

EQUITY, the principle that governs the application of law to specific cases and ensures that fair results are reached. Its primary application is in civil rather than ritual law. Among the most significant principles used by Jewish law to encourage fairness is the concept of lifnim mi-shurat ha-din, "beyond the letter of the law," which allows a beit din to encourage, and in some cases compel, activity that is not normally considered legally obligatory in the name of equity. Other principles used to advance fairness include the taqqanah*, herem beit din*, minhag*, and dinei shamayim*.

ERETS YISRA'EL, (אֶרֶץ יִשְׂרָאֵל; Land of Israel), traditional name, since rabbinic times, of the land promised by God to Abraham and his descendants (hence, it was also called the Promised Land) and referred to as such in Ezekiel 40.2 and 47.18. The land was never occupied to the full extent of the frontiers indicated in the patriarchal covenant (Gn. 15.18–21). Other boundaries are described in Numbers 34.12 and in various biblical and Talmudic sources. The land was to be dedicated to the worship of God as its ultimate owner (Lv. 25.23) and was considered a divine gift, an expression of God's love for his people to be held by them as a sacred trust. It would cast them out if they followed the idolatrous and immoral practices of the peoples who had previously occupied it (Lv. 18.24–29). Israel's acknowledgment of this relationship was expressed through such rites as the bringing of the *first fruits (Dt. 26.1–11), the institutions of the shemittah* and yovel*, and classified in Talmudic literature as "commandments dependent on the Land" (Qid. 1.9), to be observed only in Erets Yisra'el, as opposed to the "commandments of the person" (Sifrei on Dt. 12.1), such as the Sabbath, dietary laws, and ethical precepts, which were applicable everywhere. Talmudic law, probably to maintain the economic viability of Jewish agriculture in the face of ruinous taxation imposed by the Roman authorities, restricted the application of the *agrarian laws to those areas that had been settled by the exiles who returned to Zion during the Second Temple period. The rabbis (Hag. 3b; Yev. 82b) reasoned that the "first sanctity" deriving from the biblical conquest had automatically lapsed with the destruction of the Temple and the exile. The "second sanctity," however, was viewed as permanent, since it stemmed not from conquest but from legal possession exercised under the mandate granted by Cyrus (2 Chr. 36.22–23). It excluded such areas as Beth-shean in the Jordan Valley and the Gaza region. The agrarian laws have only rabbinic authority since their biblical validity depended on the majority of the Jewish people residing in the land (Ket. 25a). These rabbinic rulings enabled Jewish farmers to work their fields during the sabbatical year, a precedent followed in modern Israel by those who strictly observe the agrarian laws. In contrast, Erets Yisra'el within its biblical boundaries possessed an intrinsic sanctity (Jl. 4.2; cf. Kel. 1.2) that made it a preferred place of residence for the living and of burial for the dead and the exclusive locale for prophesy. The religious supremacy of Erets Yisra'el scholars and congregations, irrespective of their erudition or numbers, was to be recognized by Jews everywhere (Hor. 51a). The insistence of the Talmud on the sanctity of the land was prompted by a desire to promote settlement and discourage emigration. A title deed to land purchased in Erets Yisra'el may, therefore, be written even on the Sabbath (by a non-Jew, B. Q. 80b), and spouses may be compelled to follow their partners to reside in Erets Yisra'el. Refusal to do so was a reason for divorce and forfeiture of the marriage settlement (Ket. 110a). The enforced *exile from Erets Yisra'el after 70 CE was regarded as the greatest calamity to befall the people, and numerous expressions of mourning were introduced into the liturgy and religious practice to express longing for the land. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, persecution and growing insecurity in western Europe prompted a wave of immigration to Erets Yisra'el led by prominent rabbis. However, other authorities maintained that in view of the dangers of travel and the difficulties involved in fulfilling the agrarian commandments the religious duty to reside in Erets Yisra'el no longer applied. Nevertheless, religious authorities have generally adopted a highly positive attitude toward resettling Erets Yisra'el or, failing that, toward visiting it on *pilgrimage. Nahmanides regarded the duty to dwell in Erets Yisra'el as a positive biblical commandment applicable for all time. Those buried in the Diaspora would try to have a bag of soil from Erets Yisra'el put in their grave. Classical *Reform Judaism, which regarded Judaism purely as a monotheistic, ethical religion with no national or territorial ingredient, accepted Diaspora existence as normative and deleted from its prayer books all references to a return to Erets Yisra'el. Contemporary Reform has reintroduced these formulas. The traditional and Conservative prayer books have always been centered around Erets Yisra'el, for example, the prayers for rain and dew (see TEFILLAT GESHEM; TEFILLAT TAL) are said in conjunction with the appropriate season in Erets Yisra'el. What may be regarded as a theology of the Holy Land was developed in the medieval period by *Yehudah ha-Levi, as well as by kabbalists and mystics, and in recent times, particularly, by R. Avraham Yits'haq ha-Kohen Kook (see KOOK FAMILY), whose disciples inspired Religious Zionism, which has promoted the resettlement of Erets Yisra'el within its biblical boundaries. 'EREV (עֶרֶב; eve), in popular usage, the day preceding the commencement of a holy day (so that erev Shabbat is a Friday and erev yom tov* is the day before a festival). It is the eve inasmuch as the day in the Jewish *calendar commences with sunset. The period of holiness is inaugurated some time before sunset, and in Temple times (as in the State of Israel today) the shofar was sounded as a signal to cease work. The rabbis also advised people to eat abstemiously on the eves of Sabbaths and festivals so as to derive the maximum enjoyment from the evening meal. The Tahhanun prayer is omitted from the afternoon service on the eves of Sabbaths and festivals. On the eve of Ro'sh ha-Shanah, selihot are recited (including a special one for this occasion—Zekhor Berit*). The eve of Yom Kippur is a time for eating and also for asking forgiveness from others who may have been offended during the past year. The eve of Pesah is Ta'anit*

Bekhorim; the eve of Ro'sh Hodesh is observed by some as a fast called *Yom Kippur Qatan.

ERUSIN. See BETROTHAL; MARRIAGE.

'ERUV (עֶרֶב; blending), the general term for three types of rabbinic enactments intended to promote the sanctity of the Sabbath. The first type is known as 'eruv tehūmim ('eruv of boundaries), a legal device intended to ease certain Sabbath restrictions of rabbinic (but never of biblical) origin. According to the rabbinic interpretation of Exodus 16.29–30, which commands "each man to sit in his place" on the Sabbath, there is no biblical prohibition on walking outside the limits of one's place of residence on the Sabbath unless this distance exceeds twelve miles. Rabbinic law, however, places the limit at two thousand cubits (about two-thirds of a mile) from the point where the more heavily populated area of a locality ends. The rabbis made it possible for a person to go another two thousand cubits provided he had, before the Sabbath, placed food for two meals at the end of the permitted two thousand cubits. The location of the food would then, in theory, be considered his place of residence for the Sabbath, thus permitting him to go another two thousand cubits from that point. Hence it became possible to walk from one town to another whenever the distance between the two was less than four thousand cubits. An extension of this, 'eruv reshuyyot ('eruv of domains), permits the stringing of a wire (attached to posts) round a whole area or town, which is then considered a single domain within which carrying is permitted. Every city in Israel is surrounded with such an 'eruv, and others have been put up in certain places in the Diaspora.

The second type of 'eruv is called 'eruv ḥatserot ('eruv of courtyards). According to biblical law, one may carry things on the Sabbath from a house into a courtyard even if many other houses open onto it: as long as the courtyard is enclosed, it is considered a private domain. To promote the sanctity of the Sabbath, however, the rabbis prohibit such carrying unless the inhabitants of the courtyard symbolically make all their houses a single dwelling by each contributing some food to be placed in one of the houses belonging to the courtyard. Since there is now a "common" eating place, it is permissible to carry objects in the whole courtyard. The same procedure may be followed to make it possible to carry objects from all the courtyard into a common alleyway enclosed on at least three sides (and symbolically on a fourth), except that the food is placed not in the alleyway but in one of the courtyards. The name of this type of 'eruv is shitufei mova'ot (partnership of alleyways).

The third type of 'eruv is called 'eruv tavshilin ('eruv of cooking) and is intended to safeguard the eminence of the Sabbath when preceded by a festival day. Ordinarily one may cook on a festival day only for that day. However, when such a day precedes the Sabbath, one is permitted to cook on that day for the Sabbath, provided one has symbolically begun the Sabbath preparation on the day preceding the festival by setting aside something cooked and something baked for the Sabbath and making an appropriate benediction. The laws are discussed in tractate 'Eruvin*.

ESAU (Heb. 'Esav), elder son of *Isaac and *Rebekah and twin brother of *Jacob. The personalities of Jacob and Esau in the Book of Genesis symbolize the biblical view of the character and origin of the two nations of Israel and Edom, which derived from a similar background but developed an enmity toward each other (Jacob is identified with Israel in Gn. 32.25–29 and Esau with Edom in Gn. 36.1). Esau is depicted as a hunter (Gn. 25.27) who sells his birthright to Jacob (Gn. 25.28–34). His anger at Jacob for having obtained their father Isaac's blessing through cunning results in Jacob's flight to Haran (Gn. 27); but on Jacob's return twenty years later, Esau shows only friendliness (Gn. 32). At the age of forty, Esau married two Hittite women and later the daughter of Ishmael (Gn. 26.34, 28.9). The rabbis depict Esau as the epitome of wildness and lust for power; the name Esau (or Edom) is used as an eponym for Rome and in medieval Hebrew literature for any anti-Jewish regime, Christianity in particular.

ESCHATOLOGY, doctrines concerning the fate of human beings after death (individual eschatology; see AFTERLIFE) or beliefs about the end of history (collective or cosmic eschatology). The word is derived from the Greek eschaton (end).

The united kingdom under David and Solomon (1000–922) could be seen as the fulfillment of God's covenant with Israel: Israel lived in peace and prosperity in the land promised to its fathers. But with the division of the kingdom, ongoing wars with neighbors and enemy incursions, as well as social and moral corruption, life for the Israelites looked much less golden. Amos, the first of the classical prophets (mid-eighth cent. BCE), provides the earliest biblical evidence for the expectation of a coming Day of Judgment (see YOM HA-DIN), a "Day of the Lord" (Am. 5.18–20). The prophet rejects what was apparently the popular view of that day as the moment when the Lord would take vengeance on Israel's enemies and grant his people the peace and prosperity they lacked. Rather he insists that the Day of the Lord is a day of judgment for the people of Israel as well.

Later prophets follow Amos in claiming that God's judgment would not spare the people of Israel, but they emphasized the subsequent restoration. Isaiah of Jerusalem, a younger contemporary active in Judah, the southern kingdom, from the middle of the eighth through the beginning of the seventh century BCE, suggests that a righteous remnant of the people of Israel will survive the judgment and enjoy the new age. Other prophets also pictured a future reconciliation between God and the whole people or a pious and holy remnant.

The sack of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 586 BCE overturned the basic assumptions of the southern kingdom: the divine inviolability of the house of David, of the house of the Lord, the Temple, and the City of the Lord, which was also the City of David. The prophet known as Deutero-Isaiah interpreted the conquest of Babylonia by the Persian king Cyrus in 538 BCE as an event fraught with eschatological significance. His prophetic interpretation seemed confirmed when Cyrus issued his decree permitting the exiles to return to their land and rebuild the Temple. But reality failed to measure up to the prophet's high hopes. The new Temple was a sad sight for those who remembered the first, and it stood in the midst of a divided community ruled by a Persian governor rather than a descendant of David.

The hope for the restoration of national sovereignty made eschatology a central concern of the Second Temple period as Hellenistic and Roman rulers followed the Persians, with only a century of independence under the Hasmoneans. Other subjects of the Hellenistic empire, particularly the Egyptians, produced prophecies about a new era in which a native king would be restored to the throne and proper order again established. Nevertheless, the content of Jewish eschatology was unique, because it was embedded in biblical traditions and prophetic utterance.

According to the eschatology of the Second Temple period, the course of history represented the unfolding of a plan determined by God. The Book of Daniel, for example, says that Israel had to be subjugated to four foreign kingdoms in succession before the establishment of "the kingdom of the holy ones of the Most High." Antiochus IV Epiphanes, the enemy at the time of the book's composition, is the last of the kings of the last kingdom. In the Fourth Book of Ezra, written several centuries later, after the destruction of the Second Temple by the Romans in 70 CE, a vision identifies the Roman empire as the last of the four kingdoms.

Responses to the belief in the imminent end of history were varied. The *Qumran community practiced an intensified version of the purity rules of the Bible. The earliest Christians introduced new practices in keeping with their belief that the Messiah had already appeared and inaugurated the end time. For others, the knowledge that the end was near inspired political and military action. According to Josephus, a number of messianic pretenders who led small groups of followers against the Romans toward the end of the Second Temple period and the Jewish revolt against the Romans from 66 to 70, which led to the destruction of the Second Temple, had eschatological components. The timing of the Bar Kokhba' Revolt between 132 and 135 seems also to reflect eschatological expectation: since the Second Temple was rebuilt roughly seventy years after the First Temple was destroyed, some Jews believed that the time was ripe for the establishment of the third and final temple as the seventy-year mark from the destruction of the Second Temple approached.

The belief in a future era of redemption is central to rabbinic thought, and it is expressed clearly in the liturgy of the synagogue as well as in rabbinic literature. The new era is always presided over by the *Messiah, who was not a constant feature of the eschatological scenarios of the prophets and the authors of the Second Temple period. Still, the rabbis remained cautious, which is not surprising in light of the unhappy outcome of the revolts against Rome. While the end was certain to come, its coming could not be forced by human beings.

No unified picture of the end of time emerges from the literature. Indeed, Gershom Scholem has suggested that there is a fundamental split in Jewish eschatology between "restorative" and "utopian" strands. The restorative strand comprises visions of an end that is possible in the world as we know it: Israel is established in its own land under a new Davidic king. The utopian strand, on the other hand, is not limited by the world as it is: the lion lies down with the lamb and death is abolished.

The third-century Babylonian rabbi Shemu'el insisted that the only difference between his age and the messianic era was that Israel would no longer be subjugated to the nations. He cites Deuteronomy 15.11, "The poor shall never cease from the midst of the land," as proof of his anti-utopian position. Such a position is less of an incitement to messianic activity than a more utopian one. Maimonides' picture of the messianic era in his legal code, the Mishneh Torah, comes from Shemu'el: the Messiah will be recognized as such because he will succeed in restoring the Jews to their homeland and rebuilding the Temple; there will be nothing supernatural about what he accomplishes; anyone who fails to restore Israel to its biblical state is not the Messiah. Maimonides' view is connected to his involvement in the controversy about a messianic pretender who had attracted many followers among the Jews of Yemen.

The most important of the messianic claimants of the Middle Ages was *Shabbetai Tsevi. The ideology of the Shabbatean movement was derived from the kabbalistic thought of Yitshaq *Luria, who believed that creation involved a cataclysm in which sparks of the divine were dispersed into the created world. By observing the commandments, a pious Jew helped to restore these sparks from their exile. When the restoration was completed, the world would be perfected and the exile of the Jews ended together with the exile of the divine. In Poland a century later, the Shabbatean Ya'aqov *Frank (1726–1791) claimed to be the Messiah and led his followers to baptism in order to complete the work of Shabbetai Tsevi.

The end of the twentieth century provides a striking example of the vitality of such expectations in some quarters. In the years before the death of their seventh rebbe, Menahem Mendel Schneerson, the Lubavitcher Hasidim undertook a campaign to encourage nonobservant Jews to perform various Jewish rituals in an effort to speed the raising of the fallen sparks so that the rebbe could manifest himself as the Messiah. Some continue to believe that he is the Messiah even after his death. The Reform movement suggests that there will not be one Messiah; rather humans will be raised to their messianic potential and thereby enjoy the fruits of a messianic era.

ESDRAS, BOOKS OF, several Jewish works in the Greek Septuagint and Latin Vulgate (see BIBLE TRANSLATIONS). Esdras is the Greek form of the biblical name Ezra. In the Septuagint, and in current scholarship, 1 Esdras is the name given to a composite work containing materials from the biblical books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and 2 Chronicles, as well as the extra-biblical story of Zerubbabel's wisdom as displayed in the court of Darius I, the Persian king. It remains uncertain when 1 Esdras was composed and whether it was originally written in Hebrew or in Greek; the book was used by *Josephus Flavius, in approximately 90 CE. The Second Book of Esdras is the Hebrew Bible's Ezra-Nehemiah*.

In the Vulgate, 1 Esdras is the name given to the biblical Book of Ezra, 2 Esdras to the Book of Nehemiah, and 3 Esdras to the above-described 1 Esdras. The Fourth Book of Esdras, which today is often called 2 Esdras, when Ezra and Nehemiah are not counted as 1 and 2 Esdras, respectively, is a work that falls into three distinct sections. The Fourth Book of Esdras 3–14 (known today as 4 Ezra) is a complex apocalyptic work, originally written in Hebrew or Aramaic and translated into Latin from a Greek translation (only fragments of which survive). It is also preserved in several other languages, including Syriac, Ethiopic, Armenian, Georgian, and Arabic. Written shortly after the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE, it reflects the confusion and desperation of Jews who lived through tumultuous times and tried to reconcile their situation with the biblical promises for God's chosen people. About half of the work is devoted to the dialogues of Ezra, distressed by the destruction of the First Temple, with the angel Uriel, who comforts him by expounding on the meaning of this apparent calamity and promising that the end and the Jews' salvation are near. The second part of the work describes the complex symbolic visions revealed to Ezra, visions of Israel's future oppression, followed by eschatological upheavals and finally salvation with the coming of the savior *Messiah. Chapters 1–2 of 4 Esdras (known today as 5 Ezra) and chapters 15–16 (6 Ezra) are later Christian additions and are among the numerous Christian texts that bear Esdras's name.

ESHET HAYIL (אִשָּׁת חַיִּיל; A Woman of Worth), alphabetical acrostic from Proverbs 31.10–31 describing the ideal wife; recited by the husband in the home on Sabbath eve in the Ashkenazi and kabbalistic rites. The custom originated with the sixteenth-century kabbalists in Safed, for whom the term eshet hayil was a mystical metaphor for the Shekhinah. The practice of reciting Eshet Hayil has been discontinued in certain circles in the light of feminist objections that the reading stereotypes women as subservient homemakers. Reform liturgy suggests a parallel reading by women (Ps. 112.1–9) in honor of their husbands.

ESNOGA, a word used among western Sephardim for a synagogue. That it appears for the first time in the Zohar is taken as evidence that this kabbalistic work was composed in northern Spain, in a Spanish-speaking, Jewish environment. In the Netherlands, the famous Portuguese synagogue in Amsterdam is commonly called the "Snoge."

ESSENES (Heb. Isiyyim), religious movement that flourished in Palestine from the mid-second century BCE to the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE. The derivation of the name is unclear but may be related to the Syriac equivalent of the Hebrew Hasidim (pious ones) or to the Aramaic word for healers (which parallels the Greek; see THERAPEUTAE). When the first *Dead Sea Scrolls were published in the early 1950s, most scholars were convinced that they originally belonged to an Essene library and that *Qumran was the site of an Essene settlement. Despite many challenges, this theory is still the most widely accepted explanation, given the many similarities between the documents found among the Dead Sea Scrolls and the descriptions of the Essenes by *Philo and *Josephus Flavius, as well as the location of the Qumran site itself, which fits well with Pliny the Elder's description of the Essenes' location.

The origins and early growth of the Essenes is still a subject of controversy, and it can only be definitely stated that the group emerged at some time during the second century BCE, a period of great political and religious change in Erets Yisra'el (see HASMONEANS). According to Philo and Josephus, whose descriptions are possibly tendentious, there were some four thousand Essenes scattered throughout the villages of Judea. The reliability of Josephus's account, which notes that there were two distinct groups among the Essenes, one practicing celibacy while the other permitted marriage, is still a matter of debate. According to these descriptions, the Essenes were a tightly knit, exclusive group, living together in communities and practicing communal ownership of wealth and goods. It was forbidden for an Essene to pass on the teachings of his sect to an outsider, and anyone wishing to join their number had to undergo a period of testing and examination. Discipline was strict, the most severe punishment being expulsion from the group, an act that, according to Josephus, was equivalent to a sentence of death by starvation if the expelled member continued to observe the peculiar dietary laws of the sect. The Dead Sea Scrolls present the Essenes as a group holding eschatological beliefs combined with a dualistic view of the world: even Israel is divided, by divine predestination, into two—the community of the elect and “children of darkness”—to be marked for salvation or for destruction in the apocalyptic events of the last days. The Essenes seem to have followed the 364-day solar calendar, known also from the Book of Jubilees, which resulted in different festival dates from those observed by other Jews, including Yom Kippur. Essene halakhah, somewhat better known after the recent publication of Miqtsat Ma'asei ha-Torah*, emerges as closely related to what the later rabbinic literature attributes to the *Sadducees, but the exact relationship between the Sadducees and the Essenes has yet to be elucidated. There are certain superficial similarities between early Christians and the Essenes, but the suggestion that *John the Baptist may have been an Essene is not generally accepted.

ESTHER (Heb. Ester), heroine of the biblical Book of Esther, one of the *Hamesh Megillot in the *Hagiographa. There was opposition to its canonization, partly because God is nowhere mentioned in the book. The name

Esther, derived apparently from the ancient Persian stara (star), occurs only in the Book of Esther. Esther's other personal name, Hebrew in origin, was Hadassah (Est. 2.7 only), derived from the Hebrew word for myrtle. In the Esther story, the Persian king *Ahasuerus ruled an empire that stretched from India to Ethiopia (1.1). During the third year of his reign, he gave an elaborate banquet, at which time he deposed his wife Vashti for her refusal to appear (1.3–8, 10–19). After a search, he finally selected as his next queen Esther, a Jew who hid her identity from him (2.1–4, 17). At the instigation of his chief minister, *Haman, who was frustrated by the refusal of Esther's relation *Mordecai to bow down to him, Ahasuerus, without even inquiring as to whose death sentence he was sealing, issued a decree of genocide against the entire Jewish people (3.1–15). The plot was eventually thwarted by Esther, leading to Ahasuerus having Haman and his sons executed and promoting Mordecai to the position of chief minister. Ahasuerus, under the influence of Esther, issued a decree allowing the Jews to defend themselves against their enemies. Their eventual victory led to the establishment of the holiday of *Purim (8.3–14, 9.5–10, 13–14). The Book of Esther contains some clearly authentic historical elements, such as the Hebrew name Ahasuerus, which is the same as the Persian name Xerxes. Other historically accurate background details include the extent of Xerxes' empire from India to Ethiopia (1.1), his winter palace at Susa (Shushan; 1.2), his seven princely advisers (1.14), the practice of showing obeisance before the king's high officials (3.2), the recording and rewarding of the king's “benefactors” (2.23, 6.8), the use of hanging as a means of capital punishment (2.23, 5.14, 7.10), and the many Persian loanwords throughout the text. These elements, together with the Hebrew style of Esther (closest to the book of Chronicles, composed c.400 BCE) and the sympathetic attitude of the author toward the Persian king (which best fits the Persian period until 330 BCE), have led scholars to the conclusion that Esther was written between 400 and 330 BCE. On the other hand, several elements must be considered at the very least historically unlikely and in some cases completely ahistoric; for example, a royal feast lasting 180 days (1.2–4) and royal proclamations written in all languages of the Persian empire rather than in the official language of the empire, Aramaic (1.22, 3.12, 8.9). Also, according to Esther 2.16 and 3.7 Esther was Xerxes' queen between his seventh and twelfth years, while according to the classical historian Herodotus (VII:114; IX:112), Amestris was queen at that time. Furthermore, Herodotus specifically indicates (III:84) that Persian queens could come only from one of the seven Persian noble families. Thus, both Esther's ascent to the throne as well as the very concept in Esther 2 of a royal beauty contest to select the new queen must be considered highly unlikely from a historical point of view.

Scholars (e.g., S. B. Berg, M. V. Fox) have asserted that reversal is the central theme of the story, whose plot is comprised of many coincidences and ironic moments. With respect to literary structure, the influence of reversal is perhaps somewhat more subtle, but in the end even more pervasive. Haman is introduced at the beginning of chapter 3, which is the first of three chapters (3, 4, and 5) in which everything that occurs points toward the strong likelihood that Haman will indeed succeed in his planned annihilation of the Jews. Then comes the turning point in Esther 6.1, after which all the previous negative events are reversed in favor of the Jews, leading to Haman's demise and the thwarting of his diabolical plot. Reversal also underlies the rabbinic dictum that one is permitted and even expected to get inebriated on Purim until one is no longer able to distinguish between "cursed be Haman" and "blessed be Mordecai" (Meg. 7b).

The purpose of including historically accurate elements must have been to provide Esther with an authentic historical background; thus, Esther can be categorized as a historical novella. Such a characterization, however, does not take into consideration the many humorous and ironic features of the book, such as the lavish and enduring royal parties (1.4); the king's letter ordering all men throughout the Persian empire to be masters in their own homes (1.22), as a result of which it is expected that "all wives will treat their husbands with respect, high and low alike" (1.20); and Haman's desperate attempt to plead for his life before the queen, which culminates in his unintentionally and haplessly falling on the queen's couch just as the king enters the room—an act to which the king responds "Does he mean to ravish the queen in my own palace?"—and the king's subsequent order for Haman's execution by hanging on the very gallows he had built to kill Mordecai (7.7–10). According to H. L. Ginsberg, the book was written "as a mock-learned disquisition to be read at the opening of a carnival-like celebration," whose express purpose was to turn the local Purim celebration of Persian Jewry into a holiday for Jews worldwide. The book is read in the synagogue on the eve and morning of the Purim festival. The regulations for its reading are contained in tractate Megillah*. It was to be read from a special scroll, which became a favorite subject for decoration by Jewish artists. Its message of the triumph of the Jews over their enemies appealed strongly to Jews persecuted throughout the Diaspora.

ESTHER, ADDITIONS TO BOOK OF, six passages that are found in the Greek translation of the *Book of Esther but not in the text preserved in the Hebrew Bible. These additions include a dream of Mordecai at the beginning of the story, in which the events about to happen are foretold in a symbolic manner, as well as the text of Haman's anti-Jewish edict and of Mordecai's own edict following Haman's downfall. From internal inconsistencies, it is evident that these textual units did not belong in the original Book of Esther, but it is less clear which additions were translated from Hebrew or Aramaic and which were originally composed in Greek. Dating each addition is equally difficult; probable dates range from the second century BCE to the first century CE.

ESTHER RABBAH, a midrash on the *Book of Esther, from the collection called the Midrash Rabbah*, originally known by several other names: Midrash Ahasuerus, Midrash Megillah, or Haggadat Megillah. In the earliest printed editions, the midrash was divided into six chapters, while publishers in Vilna divided it into ten sections. Analysis of the midrash, based on the assumption that the existence of a proem reveals the beginning of a section, shows that the midrash should be divided into seven sections. A closer reading of the midrash shows that the seventh section is actually a separate midrash. The first midrash, consisting of six sections that explain the first two chapters of the biblical Book of Esther, is an early exegetical midrash; each section is opened by a classically styled proem. The proems that mark the beginning of the second midrash are not in the classical style, and the midrash itself is more a retelling of the biblical story of Esther than an exegetical midrash. The first part uses early sources, including the Targum Onkelos, while the second part shows an affinity with the Book of Yosippon, which was compiled in the tenth century.

Closely associated with Esther Rabbah is another midrash on the Book of Esther, Abba' Guryon, known by the words with which it begins, whose contents are almost identical to Esther Rabbah, on which it is clearly based. Because Abba' Guryon has, at times, better readings of the text than those to be found in the present edition of Esther Rabbah, it must be presumed that its editor had access to earlier manuscripts of Esther Rabbah than those that have survived.

Esther Rabbah was first published in Pesaro in 1519; it was translated into English by Maurice Simon (London, 1939) and Jacob Neusner.

ESTIMATES (Heb. 'arakhim), sums of money to be given to the Temple in place of something that was dedicated by a vow but that cannot be sacrificed (Lev. 27). The possibility for such substitution, "redemption" money in biblical terms, enables a person symbolically to offer his own life or that of one of his dependents as a sacred gift, or to offer an animal even if he does not have one or cannot afford actually to put one to death; it also allows him to offer an impure animal, a home, or a field. Some of the monetary values are fixed by law; others are determined by the priest. In the case of real estate, the value is based on the field's productivity. After redeeming the dedicated item, thereby rescuing it from being sacrificed, the owner must add one-fifth of its value in order to regain possession. Fields that have been dedicated from one's ancestral allotment must be reclaimed before the jubilee year; otherwise, they become Temple property in perpetuity. The institution of 'arakhim was a major source of much-needed revenue for the Temple. In rabbinic law, the possibilities for such donations and dedications are enlarged. The laws of estimates are in the Talmudic tractates Arakhin* and Temurah*.

ETHICAL WILLS, parting deathbed messages given most often by fathers to their children. The biblical example of Jacob (Gen. 49.33) and the various instances of last messages in the Talmud, such as the deathbed message of Yehudah ha-Nasi' (Ket. 103a-b), were verbal communications. In the Middle Ages, however, the custom developed of scholars writing testamentary dispositions to their children. Since these consisted not of worldly possessions but of ethical advice, they have been called ethical wills. Among the most famous ethical wills are those of R. El'azar ben Yehudah of Worms, R. Asher ben Yehi'el, his sons Yehudah and Ya'aqov, and R. Abraham and R. Sheftel (father and son, respectively, of Yesha'yahu Horowitz). There is also at least one example of a mother writing an ethical will for her children, found in the Memoirs of Glueckl of Hameln (first published by David Kaufmann in 1896; translated into English by M. Lowenthal in 1932). Enjoining humility, piety, and ethical conduct of the highest degree, the ethical will became a distinctive literary genre. In modern times, the Holocaust was responsible for many poignant examples.

ETHICS. The norms and principles of Jewish religious ethics are founded on theological presuppositions, including the existence of God, his purpose in creation, revelation, and the destiny of the soul in this world and in the hereafter. The question of the autonomy of ethics was much discussed by medieval philosophers: is an action right because God commanded it, or did God command it because it is intrinsically right? Some thinkers assert that ethics and religion are the same, while others hold that despite the overlap, there is an essential difference between them. Abraham, they suggest, was ready on purely religious grounds to obey God's command to sacrifice his son Isaac (Gen. 32), although on purely moral grounds he ought to have disobeyed. However, the analytical distinction between the realms of religion and ethics belongs to later philosophical development. The difference is not recognized in most ancient religions, where ceremonial, ethical, legal, and cultic precepts appear together (cf. the biblical Holiness Code in Lev. 19–20). The ethical element is prominent throughout the Bible. There is an urgent appeal to man's free will to choose the good, which is also his true blessing and happiness (Deut. 30.15–20); the divine will, as revealed in the Torah, is that man do "that which is good and right in the sight of the Lord your God" (Deut. 12.28). God is the advocate "of the fatherless and widow, and loves the stranger" (Deut. 10.18). The historical books of the Bible as well as the prophets interpret history in moral terms: prosperity and disaster are regarded as divine reward and punishment, respectively. History will end with the ultimate triumph of good over evil (See ESCHATOLOGY). The great literary prophets emphasize the ethical elements of religion even more strongly. Their criticism of sacrifices and ritual (cf. Is. 1.10–17; Jer. 7.9) is a passionate denunciation of ceremonial worship that is not matched by *social justice and purity of heart. The principles of prudence and common sense in *wisdom literature are ultimately based on the fear of God and the knowledge of his commandments. A similar tendency is discernible in Jewish *Hellenism, particularly in the writings of Philo of Alexandria: the moral life and the practice of virtue are nothing but conformity to the laws of the cosmos, which the Creator established from the very beginning and which he revealed in his Torah. The Talmud, though primarily a record of legal discussions, contains a detailed though unsystematic rabbinic ethics, both implicitly in its halakhah and explicitly in a wealth of moral dictums and maxims, as well as in parables and homiletic interpretations of scripture. Hillel's saying, "What is hateful to you, do not unto your fellow man," and R. 'Aqiva's statement, "Love your neighbor as yourself—this is a basic principle of the Torah," are among the best-known of the rabbinic maxims, as is Mishnah tractate Avot*, known as the Ethics of the Fathers. The aggadah is a treasury of ethical teachings, which, in general, eschews excesses and recommends a golden mean ("a man should spend no less than one tenth of his income on charity, and no more than one fifth, lest he become himself dependent on charity"), although the extreme and uncompromising ethics of the hasid (pious one) are also held up as exemplary. Halakhah, too, implicitly assumes ethical categories; for example, it distinguishes among "matters between man and God" and "matters between man and his fellow," and it says that the agent of certain actions "must be acquitted by the human court but is guilty according to heavenly law." The concept of lifnim mi-shurat ha-din* implies an ethical norm of which the actual law is but the last limit.

Ethical literature as a distinct genre began to appear in the Middle Ages under the influence of Arabic thought. The earliest ethical treatise is the tenth, concluding chapter, "Man's Conduct," of Sa'adyah Ga'on's theological work Emunot ve-De'ot, which was written in Arabic during the first half of the tenth century. Another example is Shelomoh ibn Gabirol's Tiqqun Middot ha-Nefesh. But the most important early work is Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda's Hovot ha-Levavot. (All three of these works were translated into Hebrew by Yehudah ibn Tibbon in the second half of the twelfth century.) Bahya differed from his two predecessors in the radically spiritual and pietistic orientation of his teaching, and his work, written in the eleventh century, remains to this day one of the most influential manuals of spirituality and religious ethics.

The first ethical works in Hebrew were written in the twelfth century: Hegyon ha-Nefesh, four homilies on the nature of the soul, ethics, and repentance, by Avraham bar Hayya; Yesod Mora, by Avraham ibn Ezra; and Sefer ha-Madda, the first part of the Mishneh Torah, by Maimonides. These were followed in the thirteenth century by works of philosophers including Ya'aqov ben Abba' Mari Anatoli and Shem Tov ben Yosef Falaquera. All of these works were marked by the philosophical rationalism dominant in Sephardi theology. A different, independent school of ethical teachings, known as that of the *Hasidei Ashkenaz, headed by Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Hasid of Regensburg and his disciple El'azar ben Yehudah of Worms, developed in Germany during the second half of the twelfth century. The most comprehensive work of this school is Sefer Hasidim, which clearly addresses a distinct society of pietists who perceive their teachings as a spiritual preparation for the Crusader massacres. While the rationalist philosophers viewed ethics as an autonomous expression of the human capacity for good, the Hasidei Ashkenaz saw religion and ethics as divinely imposed demands that contradict human nature and test human devotion to God; every performance of a religious or ethical precept is a test, preparing one for the ultimate sacrifice, martyrdom.

In the first half of the thirteenth century, another school of ethics emerged in northern Spain. Although Yitshaq Saggi Nahor refused to allow his disciples to publish their kabbalistic teachings because he insisted that the *Kabbalah was strictly esoteric, his disciples produced a body of ethical work that included half-hidden kabbalistic messages and that presented an alternative to rationalist ethics. Nahmanides wrote several ethical treatises and homilies, as did Asher ben David. Among the most important works of this school were Ya'aqov ben Sheshet Gerondi's Ha-'Emunah ve-ha-Bittahon and Yonah ben Avraham Gerondi's Sha'arei Teshuvah, which became very popular and was the precursor for a whole genre of penitential literature. At the same time in Italy a non-kabbalistic ethical work based on traditional sources, Ma'alot ha-Middot, was written by Yehi'el ben Yequti'el Anav in Rome.

The expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492 and the resulting spiritual upheaval opened the way for the sixteenth-century kabbalists of Safed, whose work combined traditional ethics, philosophical ideas, the teachings of the Hasidei Ashkenaz, and kabbalistic concepts. Among the most important works of this new and vigorous ethical literature were Tomer Devorah by Mosheh ben Ya'aqov Cordovero, Re'shit Hokhmah by Eliyyahu de Vidas, Sefer Haredim by El'azar ben Mosheh Azikri, Sha'arei Qedushah by Hayyim Vital, and Shenei Luhot ha-Berit by Yesha'yahu Horowitz. Despite the great differences between them, all described the achievement of ethical perfection in the context of kabbalistic symbolism. In some respects these works can be compared to Christian and Sufi treatises on preparations for the mystical life, which emphasize individual spiritual perfection.

Kabbalistic ethical literature became increasingly popular in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Many Shabbatean works were written in a similar style, including Shevat Musar, by Eliyyahu ha-Kohen of Smyrna, and the great collection of homilies, Hemdut Yamim, written by a group of Shabbateans in Turkey at the beginning of the eighteenth century. Modern Hasidic literature, which is largely composed in the form of ethical and homiletical treatises, is based on kabbalistic symbolism.

In the nineteenth century, the *Musar movement developed out of the conviction that the legal and ritualistic aspects of halakhah were overshadowing the ethical elements, almost to their exclusion. Meeting to study ethical texts and engage in self-criticism, followers of the Musar movement succeeded in introducing the study of ethics into the great European yeshivot. A late classic of Musar literature was Messilat Yesharim by Mosheh Hayyim Luzzatto. In the twentieth century Yisra'el Me'ir ha-Kohen's Hafets Hayyim, on the laws of talebearing and slander, achieved widespread popularity.

Emancipation raised ethical issues that had been irrelevant in the world of the ghetto. Today the study of Jewish ethics has been expanded to include such subjects as business ethics and *medical ethics. See also DEREKH ERETS.

ETROG (אֶתְרוֹג; citron), one of the *four species carried and shaken in the *Sukkot synagogue service. The custom, which was well established in Second Temple times, is based on Leviticus 23.40, where the "fruit of a goodly tree" was traditionally interpreted as referring to the citron (in the lemon family); the rabbis proffer Mid-rashic explanations for that choice. The rabbis ruled that it had to be in perfect condition; therefore, to make sure that it was not damaged, it was usually wrapped in flax or cotton wool and kept in a special box (often the object of artistic decoration). In the Diaspora, societies were organized to send emissaries to purchase etrogim. At times, prices were so high that a single etrog was made to serve an entire community (or even a number of communities). Until the late nineteenth century, when they began to be cultivated in Erets Yisra'el (where they had grown in ancient times), the main source of etrogim was the Greek island of Corfu. The etrog featured widely as a Jewish symbol in classical times.

ETTLINGER, YA'AQOV (1798–1871), Talmudist and halakhic authority; pioneer of *Neo-Orthodoxy. One of the earliest Orthodox rabbis to attend university and preach in the vernacular, he served as rabbi and head of the yeshivah in Mannheim and, from 1836, as chief rabbi of Altona. A prolific author, Ettlinger was a staunch traditionalist and opponent of the Reform movement, and he founded pioneering Orthodox periodicals. He was also an activist supporter of the settlement of Erets Yisra'el. Through his own writings and those of his disciples, Samson Raphael Hirsch and Ezriel Hildesheimer, he exerted great influence on Orthodox Judaism in Germany. His major works are 'Arukh la-Ner (Talmudic novellae): on Yevamot (Altona, 1850), on Makkot and Keritot (Altona, 1855), on Sukkah (Altona, 1858), on Niddah (Altona, 1864), on Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Sanhedrin (Warsaw, 1873); Bikkurei Ya'akov (laws of Sukkot; Altona, 1836); Binyan Tsiyyon (responsa; Altona, 1868) and Binyan Tsiyyon ha-Hadashot (Vilna, 1874); and Minhat 'Ani (homilies; Altona, 1874).

EULOGY (Heb. hesped). Eulogies are of ancient origin. Biblical examples include David's elegies for Saul and Jonathan (2 Sm. 1.17–27) and Abner (2 Sm. 3.33–34), and several eulogies, couched in a very distinctive style, are recorded in the Talmud. The Talmud refers to professional eulogizers and addresses the question of whether eulogies are in honor of the dead or to honor the mourners, deciding that they are for the sake of the dead (San. 46b). If a pious person before death asks not to be eulogized, the request is respected only in the home; however, there is a eulogy in the synagogue and at the cemetery. It was customary on 7 Adar, the traditional anniversary of Moses' death, to eulogize distinguished individuals who had died during the preceding year. On Sabbaths and during certain festival periods, eulogies are not permitted. In Sephardi communities, it became customary to deliver a eulogy in the form of a Talmudic discourse after the sheloshim (the thirty-day period of mourning). The rabbis warned against exaggeration in funeral addresses but said that the dead person's piety should be emphasized, both to comfort the mourners and to encourage those present to follow a virtuous path (Ber. 62a; San. 46b–47a). It is forbidden to eulogize those who have committed suicide or those who have been excommunicated.

EUNUCH. See CASTRATION.

EUTHANASIA. Mercy killing is forbidden under Jewish law, and the killer of a dying individual is treated in exactly the same fashion as any other killer. Indeed, the Talmudic principle governing the dying is that individuals are treated as "living beings in all respects," and their legal capacity is not impaired by their physical state (minor tractate Sema'hot 1.1). The treatment of the dying is, however, governed by a distinction between precipitating death and removing an impediment to it. This distinction is articulated in early halakhic sources in the context of removing a pillow from under the head of a dying person, versus the prevention of a noise, which, apparently, disturbs the dying process and impedes death. According to R. Mosheh Isserles (Shulhan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 339.1, gloss), pillow removal is forbidden because it precipitates death, whereas, noise prevention is permitted on the grounds that it is an indirect act, the only effect of which is to remove an impediment to the demise of the moribund person (Yoreh De'ah 339.1). The general consensus among contemporary halakhic authorities is that futile medical treatment constitutes an impediment; hence, it may be withheld or even withdrawn. The maintenance of a patient's basic biological processes, that is, respiration, nutrition, and hydration, must, according to some Orthodox rabbis, be continued until the establishment of death. Most rabbis, however, including those within the Conservative and Reform movements, would permit the withholding or withdrawal of machines and medications that are artificially keeping the patient alive, and some would permit the withholding or withdrawing of artificial nutrition and hydration as well. Halakhah, in any case, does permit praying for the death of a suffering individual. Jewish criminal law provides that the killer of a person suffering from a fatal organic defect is not liable for the death penalty for homicide. Maimonides defines a fatal organic defect in terms of medical evidence as to the certainty of death within one year (Hilkhot Rotseah 2.8). This provision has been used by some authorities to justify the choosing of one life over another in cases where only one person can be saved, and it may be applicable to some of the situations that face medical staff in emergency-ward triage. While this subject continues to be an issue of discussion in Reform Judaism, the movement allows for euthanasia.

EVE (Heb. Ḥavvah), the first created woman. In the narrative of Genesis, Eve was created from the rib of Adam to be a "help meet for him" (Gn. 2.20–22). Adam called her woman (ishah; a play on the word ish [man], although actually from two different roots [Gn. 2.23]), which is to be regarded as a generic designation, due to its occurrence with the article, and not as a proper noun. Having allowed herself to be seduced by the serpent into eating the fruit forbidden to her by divine command and subsequently seducing Adam to commit the same sin, causing the couple to be expelled from the garden of Eden, she was sentenced to endure pains in childbearing and to be subordinate to her husband (Gn. 3.16), while her offspring would perpetuate the mortal antipathy toward the serpent (Gn. 3.15). She subsequently gave birth to Cain, Abel, Seth, and other unnamed children (Gn. 4.1–2, 4.25, 5.4), but there is no further mention of her. The derivation of the name Ḥavvah is uncertain and controversial. The narrative in Genesis associates the word with the root "to live" (ḥ y h; cf. Gn. 3.20: "the mother of all living"; cf. also the Septuagintal rendering for Eve: Ζῷ [life]). Rabbinical exegesis linked the name with the Aramaic word for serpent (ḥivya; cf. Gn. Rab. 20.11). Other scholars have combined these two ideas by proposing a hypothetical root (ḥ w y) that combined the notions of life and serpent. Eve is the subject of many legends in the Apocrypha and in rabbinical aggadah. The rabbis did not propound a doctrine of original sin, and the taint of her wrongdoing was, in any case, removed by the Israelites' acceptance of the Torah. Eve is prominent in Jewish feminist writing because of both the patriarchal approach to the story and what are seen as the positive aspects of her rebelliousness.

EVEL RABBATI, minor tractate, appended to standard editions of the Talmud Bavli at the conclusion of tractate 'Avodah Zarah, dealing with laws concerning death and mourning. It is euphemistically referred to as Semahot (Joys). Some scholars accept the view of certain ge'onim that Evel Rabbati is tannaitic. Other scholars, while recognizing the inclusion in Evel Rabbati of substantial bodies of original tannaitic material, some of it unattested elsewhere, nonetheless date the final redaction of Evel Rabbati to the geonic period. There is evidence that indicates that an alternative version of this tractate existed and was utilized by several medieval scholars. A critical edition was published by Michael Higger (1931) and an annotated English translation with critical text by Dov Zlotnick (1966).

EVEL ZUTARTI, minor tractate dealing with laws, teachings, and parables related to death, euphemistically called Semahot de-Rabbi Ḥiyya. Inasmuch as it was never printed together with the Talmud Bavli, it was relatively neglected, although it was known and cited by several medieval scholars. Evel Zutarti, unlike Evel Rabbati*, contains primarily—although not exclusively—aggadic material, yet evidence indicates that these two works originally were both part of a single tractate.

EVEN HA-SHETIYYAH (אֶבֶן הַשֵּׁטִיָּיָה; the foundation rock), a tannaitic term understood in two ways in Talmudic times: "the rock from which the world was woven," and "the foundation rock." Both meanings are based on the belief that the world was created from the rock located in the Holy of Holies of the Temple in Jerusalem, and thus the center of the world. This concept is closely related to the image of Jerusalem and the Temple as located at the "navel of the world." The Holy Ark was placed on this rock, and during the Second Temple period, the high priest, upon entering the Holy of Holies on *Yom Kippur, placed the fire-pan on it. Muslim tradition identifies the rock, over which was built the Dome of the Rock, with the even ha-shetiyyah.

EVIDENCE, testimony received in legal proceedings in proof or disproof of the facts under inquiry. Whoever is in possession of direct knowledge of such facts is obliged (Lv. 5.1) to state them in testimony, and it became customary to issue a herem against people who refused to testify. However, no legal decision can be arrived at in capital or civil cases in matters of atonement, sacrifices, those involving flagellation, or those relating to the promotion or demotion in the priesthood on the evidence of a single *witness (Dt. 19.15 and Sifrei). But while a single witness is insufficient, he must, nonetheless, attend court to testify, since in many instances his testimony may be joined to that of another of whom he is unaware, or his evidence might be sufficiently compelling to force the one testified against to substantiate his plea by oath (see VOWS AND OATHS). The inadequacy of a single witness extends only to the legal status of persons or property, but in deciding the ritual status of an object, his testimony is decisive. His evidence is also extremely important in the case of an agunah* (a deserted woman or a woman whose husband is suspected dead). The evidence of two witnesses bears the same weight as a hundred. When two witnesses are contradicted (hakhhashah) by two others, the case is decided as if no witnesses were available for either side. Procedurally, the court is first addressed on the gravity of bearing *false witness, and then witnesses are cross-examined in order to ascertain their reliability and trustworthiness. Two types of cross-examination are added in criminal cases: haqirah, to establish the exact time and place of the criminal act; and bediqah, to ascertain the exact nature of the crime. Once the testimony is recorded in court, it cannot be retracted. The litigant may, however, enter new evidence, in which event the court must retry the action. Persons who are known to earn their livelihood by gambling, who have no regard for the law, who are related to one of the litigants, who have some interest in the case, or, in most instances, who are women are invalidated from giving testimony in traditional Jewish law. Self-incrimination, except for admission of monetary liabilities, does not form valid ground for conviction since in Jewish law nobody can testify against himself. Circumstantial evidence (even of the most convincing nature), hearsay, or anything not actually heard or seen by the witness is invalid and inadmissible as evidence.

EVIL. See GOOD AND EVIL.

EVIL EYE (Heb. 'ayin ha-ra' or 'ein ha-ra'), in popular folklore, the power, held by particular individuals, to harm others (humans, animals, plants) by looking at them. People with eyes that are unusual, because of their color, size, shape, or some defect, are suspected of having this power. Envy is the motivation usually attributed to the use of the evil eye, which has the effect of drying the liquids that are essential for life (water, blood, milk, etc.). Young children and pregnant women are particularly vulnerable. Belief in the evil eye existed in many ancient cultures, and its popularity still persists. Protective measures against the evil eye include the use of salt, *amulets, the colors red or blue, specific hand gestures, the verbal expression of the opposite of a positive personal attribute (for example, saying a person is ugly or unsuccessful, etc.), or the number five, which is believed to have holy qualities.

If one is struck by the evil eye, special rituals conducted by professional healers can remove its influence. The evil eye can be either inherited or developed as a skill. There are people considered naturally blessed and always protected from the effects of the evil eye, such as the biblical Joseph and all his descendants and, among animals, the fish. The evil eye is mentioned in classic Jewish sources, including the Mishnah, the Talmud and Midrash, the Zohar, and Sefer Hasidim. References to the evil eye are found in all Jewish communities, despite condemnation by Maimonides (Hilkhot 'Akkum 11) and other authorities.

EVOLUTION, the theory, generally associated with Charles Darwin, that the various animal species arise from other and lower forms and that the higher forms of life (especially man) are but the latest link in the chain of development. Evolution provoked considerable controversy when first propounded in the nineteenth century and continues to exercise fundamentalist circles. Modern biological theories at first made little impact on Jewish thought. When scientific theories became more generally accepted, Orthodoxy still continued to reject them as heretical and as incompatible with the biblical account of *Creation. Attempts to interpret figuratively the biblical six days of Creation as geological ages or to "discover" Midrashic, aggadic, or medieval philosophical statements that apparently are consistent with an evolutionary theory did not go beyond homiletical apologetics; the basic philosophical issues of evolution—which do not involve the congruence or incongruence of the biblical and scientific chronologies but the transcendence or immanence of the creative act, the nature of purposiveness in the evolutionary process, and the moral implication of the survival factor—have so far not been tackled in Jewish thought. Although the Creation account of Genesis has traditionally been taken to be a mystery (see MA'ASEH BE-RE'SHIT) and creation itself understood as a supratemporal act, Orthodoxy has, nevertheless, tended to remain rigidly fundamentalist at the same time. Non-Orthodox thought on evolution has hardly moved beyond superficial commonplaces. A theological understanding of the doctrine of creation in the light of evolutionary biology is still seen by many as an outstanding challenge.

EVYATAR BEN ELIYYAHU HA-KOHEN (c.1040–1110), one of the last heads of the Palestinian academy (which had moved from Jerusalem to Tyre). He succeeded his father, Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh (whose family originated in Morocco) as *ga'on in the year 1081. He was involved in a bitter struggle aimed at maintaining some vestiges of autonomy and communal authority for the Palestinian academy. His antagonist was the political head of Egyptian Jewry, David ben Daniyye'l ben 'Azaryah, who was descended from the Babylonian dynasty of the *exilarchs and whose father had headed the Palestinian academy between 1052 and 1062. David denied the traditional authority of the Palestinian academy, not wishing it to be seen as the leading institution of the Jewish community in the Fatimid empire; he was ultimately rebuffed by Eyyatar and his allies, but their triumph was short-lived; the Palestinian academy relocated in 1127 to Al-Fustāt and was absorbed into the Jewish community of Egypt. Eyyatar's account of his struggle against David ben Daniyye¹ is contained in Me-gillat Eyyatar (published by Solomon Schechter in the Jewish Quarterly Review [1901–1902]), noteworthy for its evocation of the traditional stature and prerogatives of the Palestinian center and its academy; the one-sided picture presented by this source has now been supplemented by numerous documents from the period found in the Cairo *Genizah.

EXCOMMUNICATION, the exclusion of a person from membership in the *community and from its rights and privileges, issued by a beit din. It is mentioned in the Bible as a punishment imposed by Ezra (Ezr. 10.8). Excommunication is employed either as a punishment for transgressions or as a sanction to ensure obedience to communal enactments. The regulations governing excommunication are carefully detailed in the Talmud, and various safeguards were instituted from time to time to prevent the abuse of this powerful weapon.

Excommunication took three forms, of increasing severity. The mildest was nezifah (rebuke), which lasted for only one day in Babylonia and seven in Erets Yisra'el. The punishment consisted merely of the offender having to retire to his house and refrain from social intercourse. On expressing regret at his conduct, he was allowed to resume his normal life.

A stronger form of excommunication was niddui (banishment), which was imposed for a fixed period of seven days in the Diaspora and usually of thirty days in Erets Yisra'el, with the possibility of prolongation if the person was not prepared to change his conduct. During the period, the person excommunicated was regarded as a pariah. He was ostracized, except by the immediate members of his own family, and had to fulfill all the regulations appertaining to a mourner. His children could be denied circumcision, tuition, or attendance at worship.

Should these measures fail to bring him to penitence or conformity, the most extreme form of excommunication—the herem (ban)—was imposed with solemn ceremonial. (The term herem actually refers in its primary sense to property that must be forfeited, either for sacred purposes [Lv. 27.28] or because biblical law disallows contact with it; for example, idolatrous appurtenances from which no benefit may be derived. Thus, in Israel's "Holy Wars" [Dt. 7.23–26], no booty could be taken since it was herem and had to be destroyed. Ezra uses the term in the sense of confiscation of property [Ezr. 10.8]. In the Talmud and subsequent Jewish literature, herem refers to complete ostracism from the community.) This ban lasted for an indefinite period, and the person placed under the ban was denied every amenity of social and religious life apart from the barest necessities. During the Middle Ages, when Jews had no other legal means for enforcing conformity, the herem became a powerful weapon. Thus, the phrase "herem of Rabbenu Gershom," as applied to the famous enactments of Rabbenu Gershom ben Yehudah, including those outlawing polygamy and the divorce of a wife without her consent, meant that they contained the provision that in the absence of any other means of compelling obedience a person transgressing them would be placed in herem. Such sanction proved sufficient to ensure adherence and could be canceled after a few days, with the transgressor expressing repentance and submission. Two notable examples of the invocation of the herem by the Sephardi community of seventeenth-century Amsterdam concerned Uriel *Acosta and Baruch *Spinoza. Another was the imposition of the herem on Ḥasidim by R. Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna. In the eighteenth century, excommunication began to lose its significance as a result of its overuse by rabbis and the disintegration of the self-enclosed medieval Jewish community.

EXECUTION. See CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

EXECUTION, CIVIL, the process in Jewish law by which debts and other moneys owed by one party to another are recovered. Essentially Jewish law recognizes that debts normally create two types of obligations, personal and property; thus any debt may be recovered from the property of the debtor. Biblical verses (Ex. 22.24–26), however, prevent the creditor from depriving the debtor of basic necessities or personal freedom. Involuntary slavery is limited to cases of theft. While there were a small number of medieval authorities who permitted the imposition of forced labor to repay certain debts, normative Jewish law rejected that ruling and prohibited such conduct. Jewish law also had an established procedure for addressing priorities of claim, preferential rights, and insolvency.

EXILARCH (Aram. resh galuta' [head of the exile]), title of the head of Babylonian Jewry. The office of exilarch was hereditary, originating with King Jehoiachin, who was exiled to Babylon in 597 BCE. The purpose of the exilarchate was to maintain the continuity of Davidic rule; the importance of the position increased after the failure of the Bar Kokhba' Revolt (135 CE; see BAR KOKHBA', SHIM'ON), when the exilarch rivaled and eventually surpassed the authority of the parallel Erets Yisra'el institution of the *nasi'. The exilarch was responsible for the administration of justice in both civil and criminal cases in the Jewish community, necessitating close collaboration with the rabbis in both tannaitic and amoraic times, and he was responsible for the appointment of judges and of market overseers. He was treated with great honor by the caliph and in the Jewish community. A man called to the Torah reading in the synagogue would come to the platform on which the Torah was placed; when the exilarch was called, the Torah scroll was carried to him (Y., Sot. 22a). Under the ge'onim (see GA'ON), the influence of the religious authorities grew, and new exilarchs had to receive the approval of the heads of academies before their appointment was submitted to the caliph for approval. The Ashkenazi Sabbath morning-prayer ritual to this day carries a petition for the welfare of the resh galuta in the *Yequm Purqan.

EXILE (Heb. galut, golah), the enforced dwelling of the Israelites (Jews) outside the Holy Land. The Jewish people has lived in exile from Erets Yisra'el for a longer period than it has lived in it. Also, in periods not technically defined as exilic, such as the Second Temple period, the Jewish population in the Diaspora, especially that of Babylonia and Alexandria, was larger than it was in Erets Yisra'el. Rabbinic tradition distinguishes between two major exiles: the *Babylonian exile, and the exile following the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE. There was also an earlier Egyptian exile from the time of Jacob to the Exodus. From a historical viewpoint, however, there was continuity in the life and development of the Diaspora (Gr.; dispersion; i.e., Jewish residence outside the Holy Land) since the beginning of the sixth century BCE. The two exiles have decisively influenced Jewish religious and social development, and the seeds of many of the features characteristic of the second exile can already be detected in the brief first exile in Babylonia. Ezekiel's prophecies were uttered in Babylonia (cf. Ez. 1.1–2) and exhibit important effects of that exile: insistence on the need for personal, as distinct from national, righteousness (cf. Ez. 14); intimations of the foundation of the *synagogue, which as a "minor sanctuary" (Ez. 11.16) was subsequently to become a substitute for the "major sanctuary," the Temple; and the formulation of the motif of hope for an eventual return to Zion and the rebuilding of the Temple (Ez. 37). The rabbis noted other effects of the cultural contacts and influences to which Israel was exposed during the Babylonian exile, such as the adoption of the square or "Aramaic" script (ketav Ashuri) in place of the earlier Phoenician script (ketav 'Ivri), the adoption of Babylonian names for the Hebrew months, and the development of angelology. They interpreted the verse "So they read in the book of the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading" (Neh. 8.8) as referring to the translation of the Hebrew text into Aramaic, thereby drawing attention to the adoption by the exiles of the vernacular of their country of exile. During the second exile, which lasted almost nineteen centuries, there was a vast extension of these developments. The synagogue became the center of worship, and R. Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai deliberately transferred to it many of the rites and ceremonies that originally had belonged to the Temple (cf. R. ha-Sh. 4.1–3, Suk. 3.12). Morning and afternoon services took the place of the daily sacrifices while the *Musaf service commemorated the additional sacrifices on the days on which these used to be offered. The scriptural verses pertaining to the sacrifices for that particular day were combined with a fervent prayer for the restoration of Israel to its land and the rebuilding of the Temple. The synagogue *liturgy thus also served to keep alive the faith in the ultimate return. A great variety of external influences penetrated and enriched Jewish culture during the second exile. The adoption of the prevailing systems of Greek philosophy as preserved and developed by the Arabs, and the introduction of Arabic rhyme and meter by the medieval Hebrew poets, are among the outstanding examples. The use of the vernacular for literary purposes was particularly marked in the Muslim world, where Arabic was used by leading Jewish writers and thinkers. In Christian countries that particular influence was less marked, and rabbinic Hebrew remained the medium of religious literature. Life in the Diaspora profoundly affected ritual and civil law. With the destruction of the Temple, large areas of Jewish law, such as that pertaining to sacrifices, local and national government, and the agricultural laws that obtained only in Erets Yisra'el, became inoperative and subjects for study only, although this was passionately pursued with the double object of maintaining the belief in the restoration and of acquiring merit through study for its own sake. The area of practical Jewish law became correspondingly circumscribed. Until the advent of the modern era, exile was regarded variously as an unmitigated evil, a curse, a punishment for Israel's sins, and a redemptive suffering; in all cases as a provisional form of existence, which would be terminated by the ingathering of the exiles and messianic redemption. The latter either had to be patiently awaited or actively prepared for by piety and penitence. In early rabbinic and later mystical theology the notion of Israel's exile was complemented by that of God's own exile (galut ha-shekhinah—the exile of the divine presence). This doctrine implied both that God himself shared Israel's sufferings, and that, even in exile, Israel's communion with God was unbroken. Under the influence either of kabbalistic thought or of modern existentialist philosophy, exile has also been understood as a metaphor for alienation, the healing of which is a messianic utopia. Under the impact of the Enlightenment, influenced by the thinking of Baruch Spinoza and Moses Mendelssohn, certain circles—including nineteenth century Reform—universalized the concept of exile and identified as exile any imperfection in the human condition. The Jewish mission was defined as correcting these imperfections anywhere in the world; the Jews would not be redeemed solely through the achievement of Emancipation or through a return to Erets Yisra'el. Modern Zionism, however, continued the traditional attitude that exile was an evil to be overcome by the return to Erets Yisra'el. The Orthodox religious view of Zionism was articulated by R. Avraham Yitshaq Kook and his successor R. Isaac Herzog, who saw in statehood the beginning of redemption. With the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948 and the partial ingathering of the exiles, the problem of the historical, political, and social definition of exile came to the fore. Now that every Jew has the option to return to Israel, there is discussion as to whether the Diaspora Jewries should consider themselves as living in exile or not, with many maintaining that they are living in the Diaspora but not in exile.

EXILE, BABYLONIAN. See BABYLONIAN EXILE.

EXILES, INGATHERING OF THE, biblical concept, first expressed in Deuteronomy 30.3–5, that God will bring back to Erets Yisra'el those of his people scattered throughout other lands. According to the prophets, exile was a punishment for the people's sinfulness. When Ezekiel prophesied the eventual return of the Babylonian exiles to their native land, he addressed himself first to the Judean exiles and then extended his prophecy to include the exiles of the northern kingdom (the ten tribes) who had been dispersed over a century earlier (Ez. 37.16–28). Although there is disagreement in the Mishnah (San. 10.3) about whether or not the ten tribes are destined to return, the prevailing view is that the ultimate restoration will include the ten tribes (see TRIBES OF ISRAEL). It is this belief that explains the phrase qibbutz galuyyot (ingathering of the exiles), that is, the exiles of both Judah and Israel; the word exile refers to the condition, not the persons. According to the rabbis, the ingathering of the exiles was as significant as the creation of heaven and earth (Pes. 88a). Whenever the liturgy incorporates prayers for the ingathering of the exiles (in the Ahavah Rabbah, the tenth blessing of the 'Amidah, the Birkat ha-Hodesh) the words "from the four corners of the earth" (cf. Dr. 30.4–5) are added, and the reference is to the messianic future. The ingathering of the exiles became a basic concept of modern *Zionism (rejected by some Orthodox, who believed it had to be effected not by human initiative but by divine intervention), and after 1948 the term was applied to the mass immigration to the State of Israel of Jews from over one hundred countries in the Diaspora. This return was regarded by religious Zionists as the beginning of the fulfillment of the biblical prophecy of redemption.

EXISTENTIALISM, a modern movement in philosophy concerned with the understanding of human existence in its concreteness rather than as an object of understanding or theoretical abstraction. In spite of certain existentialist features of early philosophy (as in Socrates, Pascal), existentialism proper begins with the nineteenth-century Danish Protestant thinker Søren Kierkegaard. A basic attitude toward philosophy rather than a well-defined doctrine, existentialism encompasses atheistic thinkers (Heidegger, Sartre) as well as religious ones (e.g., Marcel). Franz *Rosenzweig, one of the greatest modern Jewish thinkers, was one of the founders of the existentialist philosophy. Many modern thinkers believe that existentialism provides better tools than classical philosophy for interpreting the significance of religion. Martin *Buber's "I and Thou" philosophy and his interpretations of the Bible have exerted wide influence as major expressions of a religious existentialism that sees in religion no objective system of doctrine or law but rather a relationship and mode of being realized in actual existence.

EXODUS (Heb. yetsi'at Mitsrayim), the departure of the Israelite people from their enslavement to Pharaoh in Egypt. In the Bible, this event is related as an act of God's intervention in human affairs on his people's behalf, and the belief in God's role in the Exodus is a central tenet of the Jewish faith. In the first words of the *Ten Commandments, God presents himself as "YHVH your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt" (Ex. 20.2).

According to the Bible, God told Abraham that his descendants would be enslaved in a foreign land, and only afterwards would they be set free in order to take possession of the land of Canaan, which he had promised them (Gn. 15.13–16). Later, as a result of the famine in the time of Joseph, the entire Israelite clan took up residence in Egypt, where they became a numerous people (Gn. 42–46), also part of the divine promise (Gn. 12.2, 15.5). Astounded by Israel's numbers, a "new king" of Egypt commandeered them into teams of forced laborers, setting over them cruel taskmasters and putting them to work on his construction projects. When this failed to weaken them, he decreed that all newborn Israelite males were to be drowned in the Nile.

Aroused by his people's suffering, God resolved that the time had come to keep his promise. Meanwhile, Moses, a Levite who was cleverly saved from the order of extermination, attained his manhood, discovered his Israelite identity, and fled to Midian (Ex. 2). There, God directed him, along with his brother Aaron, to announce to the people that the moment of their deliverance was near and to demand of Pharaoh that he set the Israelites free; at this juncture, the divine name, YHVH, was also revealed (see GOD, NAMES OF). Moses was warned that

The mission to Pharaoh met with the expected refusal. Pharaoh was not even willing to allow the slaves to depart for an ostensibly brief period; thus, the ruse devised in order to quit Egypt by stealth did not succeed. The battle between God and Pharaoh ensued, taking the form of a series of miraculous plagues (Ex. 7–11; see PLAGUES OF EGYPT), at the culmination of which Pharaoh was forced to admit the superior might of God. In his suffering, Pharaoh begged the Israelites to leave his country as quickly as they could (Ex. 12); yet, when he realized what he had done, he pursued them with full military force. The climax of the story is the episode at the Red Sea; God miraculously split the sea in two, enabling the multitude of fleeing slaves to pass through on dry land, after which he reunited the waters, drowning Pharaoh and all his army. God then led his people safely through the Sinai Peninsula until they eventually reached Canaan (Ex. 14–15).

In biblical tradition, the Exodus marks the birth of the Israelite nation. It is an act of undeserved grace: it is not a reward for Israel's righteousness; rather, it is purely the fulfillment of a sovereign promise made by God. It thus serves to place Israel permanently in God's debt, since it owes its very existence to him. God's demand that Israel serve and obey him is founded on this (Ex. 19.1–6); compliance with his commands is due because of this act of salvation (Dt. 6.20–25).

The Exodus is also the source of Israel's love and gratitude to God; it is called a "redemption." God is pictured as Israel's close kinsman, showing familial concern for his kinsfolk and relieving them from their hopelessness. The Exodus is the archetype of divine lovingkindness, the type of behavior Israel is expected to emulate. Over and over again, Israel is enjoined to recall its former condition of need; to be kind to the poor, the orphan, and the widow; and not to mistreat slaves or those without property. Numerous biblical passages recall and celebrate various miraculous facets of the Exodus; it would seem that in biblical times the retelling and embellishing of the tale had already become an accepted form of exhortation, chastisement, and praise (Jos 24.5–7; Jgs 2.12, 6.8–13; Ez 20.5–10; Neh 9.9–12; Ps 74.12–15, 78, 81.6–7, 104.34–39, 106, 114, 136.10–16; Jer 11.1–8).

Although the appropriate historical context for the Exodus can probably be identified (the building projects of Ramses II, a generation or so before the known period of Israel's invasion of Canaan) and historical data from the mid-thirteenth century BCE can be adduced, outside of the Bible no corroboration for the actual events has been found. However, in view of the antiquity, weight, and quantity of biblical evidence, scholars tend to attach to the story a kernel of historical truth. Evidently a group of Israelite herdsmen were pressed into corvée by an Egyptian pharaoh, a bondage so traumatically different from their traditional way of life that it was never forgotten, and their eventual release from it was naturally attributed to the merciful aid of their ancestral God. Bib-

First among commemorative rituals, the annual *Pesah offering was instituted to recall the Exodus each year on the date of its occurrence. In post-Temple times, this was replaced by the Pesah *Seder. In both rituals, the liturgical retelling of the story of the Exodus figures prominently (see HAGGADAH OF PESAḤ), taking literally the instruction "You shall tell your son on that day: 'This is because of what the Lord did for me when I came out Egypt'" (Ex. 13.8).

EXODUS, BOOK OF (Heb. Shemot; [These Are] the Names [of]), the second book of the *Torah, whose Hebrew title is from the opening phrase of the book. The name Exodus (from Gr. exodos), referring to Israel's departure from Egypt, also appears in rabbinic literature. After a brief recapitulation of the Israelites' arrival in Egypt, the book, which is divided into forty chapters, narrates the Israelites' bondage to *Pharaoh (chap. 1); the birth and early years of *Moses (chap. 2); Moses' mission to Pharaoh (chaps. 3–6); the *plagues of Egypt and the *Pesah sacrifice (chaps. 7–13); the departure from Egypt (see EXODUS) and the miraculous crossing of the sea (chaps. 14–15); and the first portion of the journey to Canaan, until the arrival at *Sinai (chaps. 16–18). The remainder of the narrative takes place while the Israelites are camped at Sinai: the theophany and giving of the *Ten Commandments (chaps. 19–20); the laws given to Moses and the *covenant made over them (chaps. 21–24); and the worship of the *golden calf, the renewal of the covenant, and the two sets of tablets (chaps. 32–34). Interspersed with the final portion is the account of how Moses received and carried out the detailed instructions for the building of the *Tabernacle (chaps. 25–30, 35–40); the narrative ends when, a year after the Exodus, the Tabernacle is completed. Thus, following two introductory chapters in the which Israelites develop into a numerous people, most of the book covers a time span of two crucial years in Israel's history in which its central formative events take place: its redemption from slavery, its covenant with God at Sinai, and the establishment of its central cultic institution. In Jewish tradition, the Book of Exodus—like all books of the Torah—was written by Moses under divine inspiration. Bible critics detect at least three distinct narrative sources (J, E, and P) running through the book and assign to each of them a section of the legal material.

The Book of Exodus consists of eleven weekly portions, read in the synagogue on successive sabbaths during the winter months. See also GIVING OF THE TORAH; PILLAR OF CLOUD AND FIRE; TABLETS OF THE LAW.

EXODUS RABBAH, aggadic midrash on the Book of Exodus, included in the compilation commonly referred to as Midrash Rabbah* (the main edition of which, with commentaries, was published in Vilna in 1878). Written almost entirely in Hebrew, it is a composite work. The first part, Exodus Rabbah 1 (sections 1–14), covers chapters one through ten of the Book of Exodus; the second part, Exodus Rabbah 2 (sections 15–52), is a midrash covering chapters twelve to the end. While Exodus Rabbah 2 is an edition of the Tanḥuma'-Yelammedenu midrash* to Exodus and is thus an example of a homiletical midrash, Exodus Rabbah 1 is an exegetical midrash, containing Midrashic comments on almost every verse. Each section (parashah) begins with one or more petiḥot (see PETIḤAH), almost all of them anonymous. Exodus Rabbah 1 is a relatively late redaction (c.10th cent.) of Midrashic material found mostly in the Midrash Tanḥuma' to Exodus, including several sections from the Talmud Bavli and perhaps material originating with the redactor himself. It is first cited by Spanish authors from the thirteenth century. It has been posited that the redactor of Exodus Rabbah 1 was interested in creating an exegetical midrash that would bridge the gap between Genesis Rabbah and the tannaitic midrash to Exodus (Mekhilta' de-Rabbi Yishma'e'l), which begins only at Exodus chapter 12; this part was then supplemented by an edition of the Tanḥuma'-Yelammedenu midrash to the remaining chapters of Exodus.

Midrash Rabbah: Exodus (edited by H. Freedman and M. Simon, 3d ed. [London, 1961]) is an English translation of Exodus Rabbah. A critique of Exodus Rabbah 1 was published in Jerusalem in 1984 (Midrash Shemot Rabbah: Chapters 1–14).

EXORCISM, the expulsion of foreign spirits that have possessed an individual. Mention of exorcism is rare in early Jewish literature. In the Bible, the only clear examples are the possession of Saul by an evil spirit and its exorcism by David's playing the harp (1 Sm. 16.14–23) and in the Apocrypha in the Book of Tobit. The New Testament refers to the casting out of "unclean spirits." References in the Talmud are sparse. With the spread of Kabbalah and its doctrine of the transmigration* of souls, especially the variety defined as 'ibbur (the impregnation of a living person or soul by another soul or spirit), the belief in exorcism became powerfully reinforced, notably in eastern Europe. A particular form of exorcism was the expulsion of a dybbuk*.

EYBESCHUETZ, YONATAN (c.1690–1764), Talmudist and kabbalist. Born in Kraków, Eybeschuetz was recognized as a Talmudic prodigy ('illu'iy). A student of R. Me'ir Eisenstadt, he attained prominence as a scholar, community rabbi, and yeshivah head in Prague in 1715, where he came into contact and conflict with R. David ben Abraham Oppenheim, the leading rabbinic figure of that city. From Prague, Eybeschuetz moved on to Metz in 1741 and Altona in 1750.

Eybeschuetz was instrumental in persuading the Christian authorities to allow the printing of the Talmud in Prague (1728–1739). This edition, from which all potentially anti-Christian passages were censored, aroused strong opposition from Oppenheim and other Talmudists, who decried it as a distortion of the true text and feared that its circulation would influence future printings of the Talmud. Ultimately, the edition's opponents succeeded in persuading the emperor to prohibit its further publication. These events are indicative of the controversies that filled Eybeschuetz's public life. On the one hand, he was respected as a brilliant Talmudic scholar. His Urim ve-Tummim, a two-part commentary on the Hoshen Mishpat section of the Shulḥan 'Arukh, and his Kereti u-Feleti, a commentary on the Yoreh De'ah section of the Arba'ah Turim, are regarded as classics of halakhic literature and are still widely published. He was also a popular preacher, whose sermons are collected in Ya'arov Devash and other works. He enjoyed widespread popularity in the communities in which he served. On the other hand, many rabbis suspected that Eybeschuetz was a follower of Shabbetai Tsevi. A kabbalistic text published in 1724, Ve-'Avo' ha-Yom el ha-'Ayin, was recognized by rabbinic consensus as a Shabbatean work; the book bears striking similarities to Eybeschuetz's Shem 'Olam. According to Eybeschuetz's leading opponent, R. Ya'aqov *Emden, amulets by Eybeschuetz that were opened in 1751 were found to contain Shabbatean mystical formulas. Though exonerated by Polish Jewry's Council of the Four Lands in 1753, Eybeschuetz remained a controversial figure. Modern scholars tend to accept as true the claims of his opponents that he was, in fact, a Shabbatean.

EZEKIEL (Heb. Yehezqel'; 6th cent. BCE), prophet in the Babylonian exile*; son of Buzi, a member of the priestly house of Zadok. His prophecies are contained in the biblical book bearing his name. He was deported along with King Jehoiachin of Judah and a large group of Jerusalemites in 597 BCE to Babylon by the invading forces of Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kgs. 24.8–16; Ez. 1.1–3). The exiles were settled at Tel-abib on the river Chebar; there they were joined by later waves of deportees. Eventually they received the news of the siege and final destruction of Jerusalem (586). Ezekiel's call to prophesy came in July 593, and all of his preaching took place among the deported Jerusalemites. From July 593 until January 585, he spoke only of the impending downfall; these oracles were probably uttered in the privacy of his home. Once news of the fall arrived, Ezekiel spoke openly, primarily of the future restoration of Israel's land and Temple cult. He continued to prophesy until 571. Due to his background, Ezekiel's style and vocabulary are highly influenced by the Torah, particularly the Priestly tradition. His prophecy is rich in visionary experiences and symbolic actions, and his highly sophisticated, often daring, and always forceful use of language indicates that he composed his prophecies not only as orations but as literary works. The inescapable nature of God's punitive justice and overriding concern for divine sovereignty are the hallmarks of his message; they are probably also a reflection of his own pessimism and uncompromising integrity.

The Book of Ezekiel is the third book of the *Latter Prophets. It opens with the appearance of the divine chariot (chap. 1), a portent that God is about to abandon his Temple and city to destruction, and the call to prophesy (2.1–3.15), in which Ezekiel is warned that his pronouncements of doom will not change the people's behavior since they, like all previous generations, are incorrigible. In the prophecy of Ezekiel 3.16–21 (repeated in 33.1–9), God compares Ezekiel's task to that of a watchman; he is morally bound to sound the alarm whether the people listen or not. This is followed by the oracles of judgment (chaps. 4–24). The climax of this section is Ezekiel's visionary excursion to Jerusalem (chaps. 8–11), where—six full years before the city was actually destroyed—he witnesses the abominations of the Jerusalemites, their slaughter by divine messengers, the burning of the city, and God's departure. The historical surveys (chaps. 16, 20, 23) emphasize that God has lost patience with his people's uninterrupted sinfulness; the allegorical portrayal of the wanton Jerusalem (chap. 16) is the most outspoken. The prophet stresses that guilt is not passed from generation to generation (18.1–20); his intent is to show that although Israel's imminent punishment is not a case of inherited guilt, all generations have been equally sinful (chap. 20). When God informs Ezekiel that the siege of the city has begun, this period in Ezekiel's ministry ends (chap. 24). A series of oracles against foreign nations follows (chaps. 25–32). Then the news of the actual fall arrives in Babylon, vindicating Ezekiel (33.21–22). In the oracles that follow, Ezekiel announces God's intention to return Israel from captivity, reunite and resettle the tribes, reestablish the monarchy, and rebuild the Temple. All this, God will do not out of compassion or because Israel deserves it, but for the sake of his own holy name, which Israel has desecrated. God desires to rehabilitate his reputation, which has been tarnished by Israel's exile, in the sight of other nations. The exiles doubt they will ever be returned home, and this despair prompts the vision of chapter 37.1–14, in which a massive heap of dry bones comes back to life—affirming that the ingathering of the exiles, however unimaginable, will indeed take place. In the concluding vision (chaps. 40–48), Ezekiel is again transported to Jerusalem, where he is given a preview of the rebuilt Temple and the return of the divine presence to dwell in his city, now renamed YHVH Shammah (the LORD is there; 48.35).

Ezekiel's descriptions of the divine chariot became the basis for an entire branch of Jewish mysticism (see MA'ASEH MERKAVAH); the rabbis of the Talmud forbade untutored lay persons to delve too deeply into the study of these portions (Hag. 2.1). The vision of the dry bones (37.1–14) was taken by later Jewish sources as a scriptural basis for the belief in *resurrection (San. 92b). Since a number of legal provisions of the restored Temple cult contradict the Torah, some of the sages, though not doubting the book's authenticity or its sanctity, advocated removing it from circulation (Shab. 13b). The contradictions were resolved, however, and the book continued to be read. Though some of its harsher sections were not permitted to be read in the synagogue, a number of haftarot are taken from Ezekiel. The chariot vision is read on Shavu'ot to complement the theophany at Sinai, and the vision of the dry bones is read on Pesah, a promise of a new exodus from exile.

EZRA (5th cent. BCE), priest and *scribe (descendant of *Zadok), who was primarily responsible for a series of religious reforms laying the spiritual foundations of the new Judean commonwealth after the Babylonian exile. According to the traditional account (Ezr. 7–8), he returned to Jerusalem at the head of a group of exiles, with full powers from the Persian king Artaxerxes I to impose the law of the Torah on the community there (458 BCE) and, bearing the sacred vessels of the *Temple, set about effecting reforms in the religious as well as civic conditions then prevailing in Judah. Mixed marriages with heathen wives were annulled (probably completing the breach with the nascent *Samaritans; Ezr. 10.18–44) and a vigorous program was launched for observing the Sabbath and sabbatical year and expounding the Torah to the common people. Ezra also revived the practice of the thanksgiving Sukkah (Neh. 8.13–18). As the traditional founder of the *Keneset ha-Gedolah, Ezra laid the basis for the future form of Judaism. The Talmud also ascribes to him the introduction of the square Hebrew script. It says that he promulgated ten decrees including the Torah reading on the Sabbath *Minhah service and in *Shaharit on Mondays and Thursdays (Meg. 31b).

The Book of Ezra (partly in Aramaic) appears tenth in the Hagiographa and is regarded as a single unit with the Book of Nehemiah (see EZRA-NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF). The narrative centers around the vicissitudes of the rebuilders of the Second Temple and is written from a priestly viewpoint. The relation of Ezra's activity to that of Nehemiah, as well as their respective dates, are a matter of controversy among modern biblical scholars. Rabbinic evaluation of Ezra's initiative during the critical period of transition from the prophetic to the Pharisaic era can be gathered from the Talmudic observation that, had not Moses preceded, God would have given the Torah through Ezra (San. 21b). Various traditions relate to his burial site, but the one most generally accepted places it near Basra, Iraq, which became a site of pilgrimage.

EZRA-NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF (Heb. 'Ezra'-Neḥem-yah), the penultimate book in the Hagiographa section of the Hebrew Bible, originally referred to by the name Ezra alone. The first reference to the division of this book into separate books of Ezra and Nehemiah was made by the church father Origen (3d cent. CE). Ezra-Nehemiah is set in the period of Persian rule over Erets Yisra'el. The book's three major sections are Ezra 1-6, which covers the period from Cyrus's proclamation permitting Jews to return from exile in Babylonia to Jerusalem in order to rebuild the Temple (538 BCE), through the successful completion of the rebuilding project in the sixth year of Darius I (516); Ezra 7-10, which describes Ezra's mission and activities (beginning in 458); and Nehemiah 1-13, which describes Nehemiah's career (445-c.432). Ezra-Nehemiah brings together many diverse source materials. These include Aramaic documents, such as Tattenai's letter to Darius questioning the Jews' right to rebuild the Temple (Ezr. 5.6-17) and Artaxerxes' letter of commission to Ezra (Ezr. 7.12-26); selections from Ezra's autobiography (Ezr. 7.27-28, 8-9); and selections from Nehemiah's autobiography (most of Neh. 1.1-7.5, 12.27-13.31). The finished literary product reflects a carefully planned portrayal of the restoration process marked by a particular ideology. Each step of the process is supported by the reigning Persian king, whose favorable attitude toward the Jews, despite vehement opposition from local enemies, is a sign of divine providence (Ezr. 1.1-3, 6.14, 7.6, 7.27-28; Neh. 2.4-8). The ultimate goal of the restoration is the creation of a community that lives by the commandments of the Torah (Neh. 8.1-8, 10.29-30).

EZRA OF GERONA (died c.1240), one of the earliest and most important kabbalists, who established the center for Kabbalah in the town of Gerona in Catalonia. He was the disciple of R. Yitsḥaq Saggi Nahor, the leader of the kabbalists in Provence. Ezra is one of the first writers to quote Sefer ha-Bahir, the earliest work of medieval Kabbalah. Together with his relative R. 'Azriel of Gerona (with whom he was often confused), he developed the main genres of kabbalistic creativity in the thirteenth century: commentaries on the aggadot in the Talmud, on the exegesis of biblical books (especially the Song of Songs), and on Sefer Yetsirah. He influenced considerably the kabbalistic works of Nahmanides, the leader of the Gerona kabbalists, and of other writers in that center. Rabbi Ya'aqov ben Sheshet, another kabbalist of Gerona, presented arguments against some of his ideas. Ezra was quoted by later kabbalists, like R. Bahya ben Asher at the end of the thirteenth century, and some of his ideas found their place in the Zohar.

'EZRAT NASHIM (עֲזְרַת נָשִׁים; women's courtyard), originally, a separate uncovered courtyard for women in the Temple in Jerusalem, located in the eastern sector. Women were not permitted to go beyond the 'ezrat nashim into the main courtyard. The term was later used for the separate women's section of the synagogue, either a balcony or a section on the same level as, or slightly above, the men's section, partitioned off from the men's section by a mehitsah (divider). There is no evidence of such a division in early synagogues, but it was well established in the medieval period. In the synagogues of Provence in the late Middle Ages, women were in a room under the synagogue with a grille in the ceiling through which they could hear the service. In Nürnberg, women had their own synagogue. In Poland, women were provided with an annex and a separate entrance. In some places, women had their own prayer leader in the 'ezrat nashim, who also preached on occasion. In some Muslim lands, there was no provision for women, who would sit outside the synagogue window and listen to the service. Abolishing separate seating for men and women was one of the earliest changes introduced by the *Reform movement into the synagogue service. At present, all Reform synagogues maintain seating with "family pews," and most Conservative synagogues have followed suit.

FAITH. The biblical concept of faith is expressed in the Hebrew term emunah, which is derived from a root meaning "firm" or "steadfast" and hence denotes, in a religious context, unwavering trust and confidence in God, rather than assent to theological propositions. Isaiah 7.9 uses the verb for a punning double-entendre: "if you will not have faith [in the sense of total trust] you will not be established." The word amen* is derived from the same root. There is considerable overlap with the concept of bittahon*.

In due course, however, and in response to a variety of aggressive cultural alternatives, a more self-conscious awareness of faith as belief in the truth of certain ideas and propositions developed. The Talmud shows an awareness that the Torah or, conversely, idolatry could be affirmed or denied (cf. Sifrei on Dt. 28), and that the holding of certain views rendered an individual a kofer ba'iqqar (one who denied the very basis). The Mishnah (San. 11.1) lists doctrines by the denial of which one forfeits one's share in "the world to come."

In the Middle Ages the encounter with two rival monotheistic religions, which themselves had encountered the challenge of rationalist philosophies inherited from Greece, demanded a "defense of the faith." On the philosophical level, the more serious problem was that of faith versus reason. Most philosophers after Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on* agreed that certain tenets and even commandments were evident truths of reason, capable of rational proof, whereas others had to be accepted on the authority of revelation*. Moses Maimonides*, in his commentary on the Mishnah (San. 11.1), enumerated thirteen principles ('iqqarim)* of faith, which were subsequently reformulated in the form of a creed* ("I believe with perfect faith that. . ."); in this form, they found their way into some versions of the prayer book*. Maimonides' list was criticized on many counts by other philosophers, including Hasda'i ben Avraham Crescas*, Shim'on Duran (see DURAN FAMILY), Yosef Albo*, and Yitshaq Abravanel (see ABRAVANEL FAMILY), but there is little doubt that the discussion contributed greatly to the clarification of theological reflection. Faith as an expression of Jewish historical experience rather than rational philosophizing was propounded by Yehudah ha-Levi*. The view that Judaism was concerned primarily with conduct (praxis) was reformulated in the eighteenth century, in terms of universalist Enlightenment* rationalism, by Moses Mendelssohn*. Mendelssohn argued that religious truths were universal; the specificity of the "Mosaic Law" was in its commanding the Israelites what to do, or refrain from doing, rather than what to believe. Mendelssohn himself preferred to translate the opening phrase of the Thirteen Principles of Maimonides with "I am firmly convinced." Reform Judaism* sought to uncover a new basis of faith to replace the traditional observances and ritual laws that it regarded as no longer binding. Internal religious polemics between orthodox and rationalists, that is, progressives, tended to turn on questions of alleged facts (e.g., the Mosaic origin of the Pentateuch, the account of Creation in Gn. 1). The nature of faith itself (i.e., the act of faith and the nature of the "man of faith") rather than its contents, or, faith as a mode of life rather than as a matter of "I believe that . . .," has become an increasingly central concern of modern thinkers (e.g., Martin Buber*, Abraham Joshua Heschel*, Yosef Dov Soloveichik [see SOLOVEICHIK FAMILY]), especially under the impact of existentialist philosophy on the one hand and the Holocaust on the other.

FALAUQUERA, SHEM TOV BEN YOSEF (c.1225–1295), philosopher and poet in Spain or southern France; author of many books aimed at reconciling Judaism with philosophy. His best-known work, Moreh ha-Moreh (1837), is a commentary on Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed, which quotes extensively from Arab and Jewish philosophers. Falauquera wrote Sefer ha-Ma'alot (1557) and Iggeret ha-Vikkuaḥ (1875), a dialogue between a Talmudic scholar and a philosopher about the various degrees of intellectual perfection. His biblical commentary and an exegesis of the aggadot of the Talmud have been lost. His most important work, De'ot ha-Filosofim remains in manuscript. His work on psychology, Sefer ha-Nefesh, was published in 1978 by Raphael Jospe in a critical edition with an annotated translation in English.

FALK, YA'AQOV YEHOSHUA (1680–1756), Polish-born rabbi. He studied in various yeshivot before embarking on a career in trade. Personal tragedy (the death of his wife and daughter) led him to resume full-time study and a rabbinical career. He served in Lemberg (Lwów) and the surrounding region before becoming rabbi of Berlin in 1730, Metz in 1734, and Frankfurt am Main in 1741. He was bitterly opposed to Shabbateanism, excommunicating its adherents in Lemberg in 1722. He supported Ya'aqov Emden* against Yonatan Eybeschuetz*, issuing a ban against him—a stand that led to Falk's resignation from the Frankfurt rabbinate in 1751. Falk's fame rested on his volumes of novellae on the Talmud, Penei Yehoshua'a (published separately, 1730–1780; together, in Lemberg, 1809), distinguished from a work of the same name written by his grandfather by the subtitle Appei Zutrei. His aim was to resolve the problems raised by the tosafists in their commentary on Rashi.

FALK, YEHOSHU'A BEN ALEKSANDER HAKOHN (c.1555–1614), Polish halakhist known by the acronym Sma' from the title of his best-known work, Sefer Me'irat 'Einayim. Born in Lublin, Falk studied under Mosheh Isserles and Shelomoh Luria. Declining to accept rabbinical posts, he settled in Lemberg (Lwów), where, with the assistance of his wealthy father-in-law, he established a private yeshivah. He was a leading rabbinic authority and participated in the Polish Jewish autonomous body, the Council of the Four Lands, drawing up its regulations concerning credit and interest—Hetter 'Isqa' (published as Qunteres 'al ha-Ribbit [1962]). His famous Sefer Me'irat 'Einayim is a commentary on the Shulhan 'Arukh*, Hoshen Mishpat, today printed in all editions of the Shulhan 'Arukh. This work is the fourth part of a larger commentary on the Shulhan 'Arukh and the Arba'ah Turim, the other three parts of which are called Perishah, Derishah, and Be'urim. Most of his work (including the first three parts of his commentary) remains in manuscript, though some of his responsa have been published.

FALSE WITNESS. The prohibition "you shall not bear false witness against your neighbor" (Ex. 20.13) embraces all forms of slander, defamation, and misrepresentation, whether of an individual, a group, a people, a race, or a faith, but is primarily directed against the giving of false testimony in court. The biblical injunction to do to the false witness as he had proposed to do to his brother (Dt. 19.19) applies only if a second pair of witnesses state in court, "How can you testify? You were with us that day in another place." The punishment is, however, only carried out if the false testimony of the witness is proven prior to the execution of the sentence. FAMILY. From earliest biblical times, it was taken for granted that the family was an integral part of the social structure. The tribe was an extension of the family. The first of the six hundred thirteen commandments, "Be fruitful and multiply," was interpreted by the rabbis as implying the prime duty of rearing a family. The Bible inculcates respect for *parents (Ex. 20.12) and protection of *inheritance rights (e.g., Dt. 18.8, 21.15–17). The latter was of great importance in keeping the patrimony within the possession of the family, and even land that was sold reverted to the family in the jubilee year (see YOVEL). The execution of justice was also often entrusted to the family in early society, and in the event of a murder, for example, the next of kin was obligated to seek revenge on the murderer (see BLOOD AVENGER). Wisdom literature abounds with advice on familial happiness (e.g., Prov. 13.1, 15.5, 19.13). The *mother is the object of reverence and love, but her status was lower than that of her husband (see WOMEN). In biblical times, the family unit would often include concubines (especially when the wife was barren), but Judaism's tendency was toward the monogamy that became the rule among Western, and later also Eastern, Jewry. The Talmudic concept of the family set the tone for the rich Jewish family experience of the Middle Ages, when Jewish life, to a large extent, centered around the home, especially on Sabbaths and festivals. *Children were expected to honor (Ex. 20.12) and revere (Lv. 19.3) their parents, while the parents had obligations to rear and educate their children. Marital relations were strictly regulated by halakhah, and great stress was laid on taharat ha-mishpahah* (family purity), which included shunning forbidden relationships and observing the relevant laws of ritual cleanness. Families were proud of their illustrious descent (yihus), originally from the line of David or the priests and later from distinguished scholars. See also FATHER; MARRIAGE; SHELOM BAYIT.

FANO, MENAHEM 'AZARYAH DA (1548–1620), Italian rabbi and kabbalist. He lived in various Italian cities and as a wealthy man was a patron of scholarship. His influence on medieval Jewish thought was largely through his work on Kabbalah, 'Asarah Ma'amarot (first three parts [Venice, 1597]). One hundred thirty of his responsa were published in Venice in 1600. In his Gilgulei Neshamot (Prague, 1688) he described many figures in Jewish intellectual history. He thought the problem of evil would be solved when Satan made atonement and became a holy angel. His mystical thought influenced scholars in Safed and also in eastern Europe. His Sefer Sefat Emet (Lubaczów, 1898) was a noted source for the symbols of Jewish mysticism. He held that God has no name or attributes, and nothing can be said of him except that he exists. But his divinity is absolute, and he is the *Ein Sof who is beyond the imagination and thought.

FASTS, periods of abstention from food as a sign of mourning or in expiation of sins. A major fast involves abstention from eating, drinking, sexual intercourse, and the wearing of leather footwear. The only fast in Mosaic law is *Yom Kippur, which concludes the ten-day period of repentance on 10 Tishrei. The phrase "you shall afflict your souls" (Lv. 23.27) was taken as a synonym for fasting and is the basis of the Talmudic word ta'anit (in preference to the biblical word tsom). Physical abstention is regarded not as an end in itself but as a means to spiritual affliction and self-abasement. This finds eloquent expression in the portrayal of the true fast in Isaiah 58, which was adopted not only as the prophetic reading for Yom Kippur but was probably read on the occasion of each public fast. The regulation of Yom Kippur specifically mentions that it shall be observed "from evening to evening" (Lv. 23.32), namely, for twenty-four hours. The only other fast to which this applies is *Tish'ah be-'Av, observed in commemoration of the destruction of the Temple. The period of abstention for all other fasts is from daybreak until nightfall. All statutory fasts, apart from Yom Kippur, are days of mourning in commemoration of tragic events in Jewish history. Four of them date back to the period of the First Temple or immediately after its destruction, as is evidenced by the reference to "the fast of the fourth month and the fast of the fifth and the fast of the seventh and the fast of the tenth" (Zec. 8.19). The query of the people whether fasting was still obligatory after the return (Zec. 7.3) and the prophecy that the fasts would be turned to "joy and gladness and cheerful feasts" (Zec. 8.19) prove that they were instituted to commemorate that tragic period. These fasts are 17 Tammuz (see SHIV'AH 'ASAR BE-TAMMUZ), 9 Av (see TISH'AH BE-'AV), 3 Tishrei (see TSOM GEDALYAH), and 10 Tevet (see 'ASARAH BE-TEVET). To these was later added 13 Adar (see TA'ANIT ESTER). All fasts falling on the Sabbath, except Yom Kippur, are observed on another day (generally the following Sunday). In addition to these statutory fasts, public and private (individual) fasts were also instituted. The former were to ward off threatened calamities, most frequently in the case of severe drought, and almost the whole of the tractate Ta'anit* is devoted to the regulation of these fasts—which are days of supplication and a call to penitence in the hope that "repentance will nullify the evil decree." The purpose is conveyed in the standard words of admonition uttered by the head of the elders on these occasions: "Brothers, it is not written of the men of Nineveh that God saw their sackcloth and their fasting, but that God saw their works that they turned from their evil ways [Jon. 3.10]; and the prophet Joel says [2.13] 'Rend your hearts and not your garments'" (Ta'an. 2.1). Other common fasts were the firstborn fast on 14 Nisan (see TA'ANIT BEKHORIM); the fast observed by the bride and groom on their wedding day; the fast observed in certain kabbalistic circles on the eve of the new moon (see YOM KIPPUR QATAN); and fasts on a yortsayt*. In the thirteenth century, some pietists fasted on the first Monday and Thursday of the month of Heshvan and Iyyar to atone for possible overjoyful indulgences during the festivals of Pesah and Sukkot. (For another set of fasts inaugurated after the 1492 expulsions from Spain, see SHOVA-VIM TAT). Some sages condemned excessive fasting, and *Levi Yitshaq of Berdichev complained that the evil inclination encouraged fasting to deflect from genuine worship. Individual fasts were undertaken mostly as a result of evil *dreams. Some extremely pious Jews fast every Monday and Thursday (see SHENI VA-HAMISHI). According to halakhah, fasting is obligatory for males over thirteen and girls over twelve. Exceptions are made for the sick or when health might be endangered.

FAT. See HELEV.

FATALISM, the belief in the inexorable operation of fate, to which everything is subject. Fate can be conceived of as impersonal (e.g., a cosmic law to which even the gods are subject, the rule or influence of the stars [see ASTROLOGY], natural causality, etc.) or as personal. In the latter case it might be interpreted as the will of an omnipotent God. A certain tension between fatalism and indeterminacy owed to the freedom of action of humans and/or God exists in monotheistic religions (see DETERMINISM; FREE WILL). Generally speaking, Jewish theological tradition emphasizes the element of freedom: everything—or at least Israel—is directly subject to God's will, but God permits himself to be influenced by prayer, repentance, and good works. Other tendencies are also in evidence, but full-fledged fatalism could not develop in the religious climate of Judaism.

FATE. See PROVIDENCE.

FATHER (Heb. av; Aram. abba). In the Bible, the basic family unit is designated "house of the father" (Gn. 24–38). In Jewish law, the rights of the father over his *children, as long as they are minors, are unbounded, and the Fifth Commandment enjoins children to respect their *parents. The father, however, has definite legal obligations toward his children, which are codified in the saying that "the father is obliged to circumcise his son, teach him Torah, teach him a trade, and marry him off" (Qid. 29b). There was originally no legal obligation on the father to provide for his children's material needs (instead, this was regarded as a moral duty); hence, the rabbinical application of the verse "Happy are they that keep justice, that do righteousness at all times" (Ps. 106.3) to the man who maintains his sons and daughters in their childhood (Ket. 50a). The second-century synod of Usha' made it obligatory upon a father to maintain his children during their minority (Ket. 49b). Only when parents order a child to transgress the precepts of Judaism must a child defy them. Later authorities ruled that a child could defy his or her father's objections to choice of a bride or groom (after the child has reached majority). Paternity requires no proof, and it is assumed that the husband of a married woman is the father of her child. In all cases, if a man says "this is my child," he is believed. In the case of the child of a Jew and a non-Jew, the child's Jewishness is determined by the status of the mother. In Jewish marriages, the child's communal standing is modeled after the father's; that is, the son of a priest is a priest regardless of whether the mother belongs to a priestly family or not (Qid. 3.12). A father can punish his children only while they are minors (Mo'ed Q. 17a). His legal responsibility toward them generally ends upon their attaining their majority (see ADULT), which is the basis of the blessing uttered by the father at the bar mitsvah of his son: "Blessed be he who has relieved me of the responsibility for him." There is no provision in Jewish law for *adoption, and these regulations apply only to a natural parent. The use of "father" as a title of honor is rare in Judaism. It is said that only the three *patriarchs may be called father (Ber. 15b); in rabbinical literature Hillel and Shamm'ai ('Eduy. 1.4) and R. Yishma'e'l (Y., R. ha-Sh. 56a) are referred to as "the fathers of the world." On the other hand, during the tannaitic period a number of rabbis were given the honorific title (as distinct from a cognomen, common in amoraic times) of abba*', generally those who maintained a particularly high standard of saintliness and purity in their lives. The second in rank in the *Sanhedrin, after the nasi', was given the title of av beit din (father of the court; Hag. 16b). The word is also applied to a teacher, and the Talmud regarded the father and son of the Book of Proverbs as teacher and disciple (Hul. 6a). God is seen as the father of the Jewish people and is frequently addressed as such in the liturgy (our father, our king, merciful father, etc.). See also FAMILY; INHERITANCE; MOTHER; PATRILINEAL DESCENT.

FEAR OF GOD, or awe, is regarded as the basis of Jewish religious awareness and is repeatedly exhorted in the Pentateuch, for example, "And now, Israel, what does the Lord your God require of you, but to fear the Lord" (Dt. 10.12). Fear of God is the "beginning of knowledge"

(Prv. 1.7) and the "beginning of wisdom" (Prv. 10.10). In biblical language the terms "fear" and "love" are close to each other in meaning. According to the Talmud the person who "possesses knowledge without fear of heaven is like a treasurer who possesses the outer keys but not the inner" (Shab. 31a-b; Talmudic literature uses the alternative phrase "fear of heaven" [yir'at shamayim]). The purity of motive that is demanded in the service of God is emphasized by Antigonus of Sokho who states that one should serve God without any thought of reward but "let the fear of heaven be upon you" (Avot 1.3). The rabbinic attitude is expressed in the statement of R. Shim'on ben El'azar, "Greater is he who acts from love than he who acts from fear" (Sot. 31a). Fear of heaven is entirely in humankind's hands, and the statement "everything is in the hands of heaven except for the fear of heaven" (Ber. 33b) is a key to the rabbinic doctrine of *free will. Fear of God is to be distinguished from fear of divine punishment, for as "fear and trembling" arise out of an awareness of the awesome and numinous quality of the divine majesty, it is closely allied to the complementary attitude of love of God. Impressive formulations of the sense of numinous awe in the presence of God are found in the liturgy for Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur (the first and last of the "Days of Awe," see YAMIM NORA'IM). Among the medieval philosophers, *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda' sees fear of God as an essential prerequisite to the love of God. He also distinguishes between two grades of fear of God: the lower being fear of punishment for sin, the higher being awe of God (Hovot ha-Levavot 10; a similar distinction is made in the *Zohar and by the eighteenth-century moralist Mosheh Hayyim *Luzzatto). *Maimonides suggests that fear of God leads to moral action and love of God leads to right thinking (Guide of the Perplexed 3.52). Although extensively discussed in medieval thought, the concept of fear of God is almost totally absent among modern Jewish thinkers.

FEAST. See HAGGIM; SE'UDAH.

FEINSTEIN, MOSHEH (1895-1986), Orthodox rabbi generally acknowledged as one of the outstanding Orthodox legal adjudicators of the twentieth century. Born in Uzda, Belorussia, Feinstein studied in yeshivot in Slutsk, Shklov, and Arntsishaw before being named rabbi of Luban, Belorussia. He remained in that post for sixteen years before fleeing Soviet oppression and immigrating to the United States in 1936. Settling on the Lower East Side of New York City, he was appointed ro'sh yeshivah (dean) of the Mesivta Tifereth Yerushalayim, a position he maintained until his death fifty years later. He was president of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada and chaired the American section of Agudat Israel's rabbinical council, Mo'etset Gedolei ha-Torah. He also took a leadership role in the independent Orthodox educational system in Israel, Hinnukh 'Atsma'i.

Feinstein's greatest renown stemmed from a lifetime of responding to religious questions posed by Orthodox Jews in America and worldwide. His thousands of responses, which deal with the widest range of human experiences and Jewish ritual problems and observances, have been compiled in his seven-volume Iggerot Mosheh (New York, 1959–1986). He also published several volumes of Talmudic hiddushim (novellae) and discourses under the title of Dibberot Mosheh (11 vols. [1946–1984]). These works serve as a major source for understanding twentieth-century Orthodox Jewry's encounter with modern science, technology, and politics.

FEMINISM. Jewish feminism first arose in the United States in the early 1970s, as thousands of American Jewish women, already committed to enhancing women's roles and status in society, began to subject Judaism and the American Jewish community to feminist critique. With the exception of the short-lived Jewish Feminist Organization (1972–1974), feminist inroads continue to be made largely through communal and denominational efforts; the growing visibility of women in Jewish leadership roles; scholarly works written from feminist perspectives; the proliferation of conferences, classes, and lecture series on Jewish feminism and issues related to gender; and such magazines as Lilith: The Independent Jewish Women's Magazine (1976–present) and Bridges: A Journal for Jewish Feminists and Our Friends (1991–present).

Since the early 1990s, the Israel Women's Network has initiated and actively supported feminist efforts in Israel and has facilitated communication and coordinated action among Jewish feminists throughout the world. Outside of North America and Israel, Great Britain, with a Jewish population of over three hundred thousand, can claim the only other Jewish community in which feminist issues have consistently been placed on the communal agenda. Given their many religious and cultural differences, Jewish feminists do not share a common agenda. Some feminists have called for greater participation by women within religious life, though not necessarily equal access. Many of them, Orthodox or traditional Conservative, have attempted to create or facilitate public religious opportunities for girls and women from which traditionally they were exempt if not excluded; other Jewish feminists call for equal access to all aspects of Jewish life, including those rights and responsibilities (such as rabbinic ordination and cantorial investiture) formerly reserved for men, and the integration of women's experiences into Jewish life leading toward Judaism's eventual transformation. Still others are working toward a feminist Judaism, in which concepts of God, Torah, and Jewish peoplehood are reevaluated and re-created. See also WOMEN.

FESTIVAL PRAYERS. In their basic structure, festival prayers do not differ greatly from the daily prayers or the Sabbath liturgy; however, they are distinguished in four areas: scriptural readings; changes in number and content of obligatory prayers and additions; poetic embellishments (see PIYYUT); and musical aspects of the congregational service. The Torah and prophetic readings are taken from passages concerning the festival or containing a special theological message associated with the festival by the sages. The Five Scrolls (see HAMESH MEGILLOT) are read on relevant occasions: Song of Songs on the Sabbath during the week of Pesah; Ruth on Shavu'ot; Lamentations on Tish'ah be-Av; Ecclesiastes on Sukkot; and Esther on Purim. On festivals the number of services is increased from three to four with the addition of the *Musaf service and even a fifth, concluding service on Yom Kippur (*Ne'ilah); the intermediary benedictions of the daily *Amidah are replaced by one benediction dedicated to the specific "holiness of the day," reducing the total number of benedictions to seven; and special additions are made to the *Amidah, such as those in the Ro'sh ha-Shanah Musaf service (*Malkhuyyot, *Zikhronot, and *Shofarot) or the addition of the *confession in the Yom Kippur *Amidah prayers (see 'AL HET'; ASHAMNU). The other sections of the liturgy for festivals do not differ essentially from the weekday version. *Pesuqei de-Zimra' is enlarged and followed by *Birkat ha-Shir, as on the Sabbath. *Hallel is recited after the morning service on the Shalosh Regalim, Ro'sh Hodesh, Hanukkah, and Yom ha-'Atsma'ut; *Kol Nidrei is recited at the solemn opening of Yom Kippur. Although the festival prayers have been elaborated with piyyutim, in recent times the tendency has been to reduce or omit them. Special cantillations for the reading of sections of the Torah (for example, the reading of the Ten Commandments on Shavu'ot) or special melodies for piyyutim or prayers also contribute to the special character of Jewish holy days. Festival prayers are printed in a special volume, the *Mahazor.

FINES (Heb. genasot). While any court can render a decision involving monetary statutes, the authority to levy a fine as a punishment for wrongdoing, such as is explicitly stated in the Bible (for example, "He whom God shall condemn shall pay double unto his neighbor"; Ex. 22.8), rests only with those judges who have received ordination in Erets Yisra'el from teachers themselves so ordained. Fines can be imposed only on the evidence of two witnesses; the admission of the defendant is insufficient (Ket. 42b–43a). In practice, certain categories of fines are levied by rabbinical courts up to the present, despite the fact that ordination has long ceased to exist. Generally the amount of the fine is fixed by the court, although in some cases it is fixed by law. Fines for which one can only become liable on conviction in court, but not when one freely admits to wrongdoing, are payable to the injured party and not to the court or the state. Later rabbinical courts, however, ruled that fines should be paid to the communal fund in the case of certain public misdemeanors. Fines could also be imposed for failure to observe public obligations (e.g., refusal to accept communal office).

FINKEL, NATAN TSEVI (1849–1927), Talmudic scholar and leader of the *Musar movement. He was born in Raseiniai, Lithuania, and was a disciple of Simḥah Zissel Broida, who was one of the outstanding students of Yisra'el *Salanter, founder of the Musar movement. Finkel devoted his life to the dissemination of Musar literature, stressing the importance of ethical behavior and the ability of man to elevate himself to greater heights. In 1882 he established a Musar yeshivah in *Slobodka, Lithuania, where hundreds of Talmudic scholars were educated. In 1924 he opened a branch in Hebron and moved there himself in 1925. His students called him the Sabba' (Grandad) of Slobodka. Finkel left no published works, but a number of his discourses were collected by students in Or ha-Tsafun (Jerusalem, 1959) and Sihot ha-Sabba' mi-Slobodka (Tel Aviv, 1955).

FINKELSTEIN, LOUIS (1895–1991), scholar of rabbinical thought and chancellor of the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York. Born to an Orthodox family in Cincinnati, Finkelstein gained his reputation as a leading Conservative rabbi, educator, and scholar. He earned his doctorate at Columbia University in 1918 and received his rabbinical ordination one year later from the Jewish Theological Seminary. He taught at the seminary and served as provost in 1937, president in 1940, and chancellor in 1951, raising the seminary to an international center for Jewish studies. He guided the Conservative movement to a preeminent role in Jewish religious life in the United States in the post-World War II years. He wrote and edited many books and articles exploring historical and sociological understandings of rabbinic Judaism. In his pioneering Jewish Self-Government in the Middle Ages (1924), Finkelstein traced the development of European rabbinical authority and the structuring of medieval Jewish life through synods and taqqanot. FIRE (Heb. esh). The use of fire as an element of ritual worship is common to all faiths. It was associated with the revelation of God to Abraham (Gn. 15.17) and Moses (Ex. 3.2 [the *burning bush] and Ex. 19.18). At the time of the Exodus and in the wilderness, God appeared in a pillar of fire (Ex. 31.13–22). In ritual practice, its use was limited to the fire on the altar for the burnt offering (Lv. 6.5) and the eternal light (ner tamid*) that burned in the Temple (Ex. 27.20; Lv. 24.2). Both had to remain permanently alight. The lamp is regarded as the symbol of God's presence among his people (Shab. 22b), and most synagogues have a ner tamid for that symbolic reason. Aaron's two sons forfeited their lives for offering up on the altar "strange fire which he had not commanded them"; as a result "fire went forth from before the Lord and consumed them" (Lv. 10.1–2). Kindling a fire is singled out as a Sabbath prohibition (Ex. 35.3). While the rabbis ruled that a fire kindled before the Sabbath was permitted, the Sadducees and Karaites forbade even the existence of a fire on the Sabbath. The blessing over the *Havdalah candle praises God "who creates the lights of fire" (Ber. 52a) through which man becomes culturally creative during the six workdays. The use of Sabbath and Havdalah candles is not connected with the ritual use of fire in the Temple. See also CANDLES; MENORAH; OIL; SABBATH.

FIRKOWITSCH, AVRAHAM (1785–1874), Karaite scholar. Born in Lutsk, Poland, Firkowitsch was a controversial figure in eastern European Jewish culture in the nineteenth century. He began to publish the writings of the early Karaite scholars, which he edited, sometimes changing or omitting sections in order to strengthen the Karaite position. He attempted to prove that it was the Karaites who had converted the Khazars to Judaism. His contempt for Talmudic Judaism is evident in his work Massah u-Merivah (1838). His views led to bitter disputes with rabbinical authorities, and he angered many Jews by seeking to curry favor with the Russian government, suggesting that the Jews should be encouraged to enter agriculture and should be removed from the areas near the western border in order to prevent smuggling.

He was commissioned by the governor-general of Crimea and the Historical Society of Odessa in 1839 to undertake expeditions in the Caucasus in order to uncover the origins of the Karaites. He acquired many valuable documents from the genizot (storehouses) of Jewish communities and sought to prove that the Karaites were descendants of the ten lost tribes, who had lived in Crimea from antiquity and could not be accused of any connection with the crucifixion of Jesus. Firkowitsch describes his discoveries and travels in his main work, Avnei Zikkaron (1872). The authenticity of much of Firkowitsch's material has been questioned; some documents were forged. However, he succeeded in stimulating interest in Karaite and Jewish history and literature and saved a large number of Karaite manuscripts in the east that would have been lost without his initiative. Most of them were gathered in Erets Yisra'el, Syria, and Egypt in 1843. He sold many of these manuscripts to the Saint Petersburg library.

FIRMAMENT. See COSMOLOGY; CREATION.

FIRSTBORN (Heb. bekhor), a designation that applies to a father's firstborn male child, regardless of whether the child is his mother's firstborn. The Bible allots the firstborn a double portion of the inheritance from his father's estate (Dt. 21.17). This right does not apply to that which accrues posthumously to the estate. Since in Jewish law it is not the testator's will that determines to whom the "inheritance should go, a father cannot deprive his firstborn of his inheritance right. A father may, however, divide his property during his lifetime, thus equalizing his children's shares; the property is then a gift bestowed during the lifetime of the owner and does not infringe upon the laws of inheritance. According to some authorities, however, a father violates a religious precept if he does not make provision for his firstborn son to enjoy his *birthright, although the firstborn may voluntarily renounce his birthright (B. B. 124a). A child born after his father's death, although an inheritor, does not enjoy the right of primogeniture, and a child delivered by Caesarean section is likewise excluded (Bekh. 8:2). On receiving his double inheritance, the firstborn takes on double the obligations affecting the estate; thus, he is obligated to pay a double share in settling his father's outstanding debts. Kingship and other hereditary offices pass to the firstborn, provided he is suited for the tasks of office. See also BIRTHRIGHT; FIRSTBORN, REDEMPTION OF THE; TA'ANIT BEKHORIM.

FIRSTBORN, FAST OF THE. See TA'ANIT BEKHORIM.

FIRSTBORN, REDEMPTION OF THE (Heb. pidyon ha-ben), the obligation of a father to redeem his firstborn son from a priest by payment of a ransom of five shekels (Nm. 3.44–51) or its equivalent in goods. The commandment to redeem the firstborn refers to the firstborn male on the mother's side—"whatsoever opens the womb"—and applies to both man and beast (Ex. 13.1–16).

The redemption of a firstborn son is effected at a short religious ceremony on the thirty-first day after a child's birth (if that falls on a Sabbath or festival, the ceremony is postponed until the eve of the following day), and the occasion is a festive one. The ceremony was finalized in the geonic period. The father quotes Numbers 18.16 and Exodus 13.1, assures the priest that he prefers to give the priest money rather than his firstborn son, and recites two appropriate blessings. The ceremony is usually followed by a festive repast.

Prior to the construction of the Tabernacle, the firstborn male in each family was consecrated to the service of God, thus forming a priesthood of the firstborn, in return for the deliverance of the Hebrew firstborns during the night of the Exodus, when Egyptian firstborns were slain (Nm. 8.17). Tradition asserts (Zev. 112b) that the Israelite firstborns indeed served in the priesthood until the completion of the Tabernacle, whereupon they were exchanged for the tribe of Levi (Nm. 3.12–13). Priests and Levites are exempt from the obligation to redeem their firstborn since they are, in fact, consecrated to the service of God (Nm. 3.6–10). The firstborn sons of the daughters of priests or Levites are also not redeemed. The obligation of redemption does not apply in the case of a child who was preceded by a miscarriage or a stillbirth, or who was delivered by Caesarean section, since in these instances the child does not in fact "open the womb" of its mother.

The firstling of clean animals (that is, those from which sacrifices can be brought) are automatically consecrated at birth and, in Temple times, were to be sacrificed as peace offerings (Nm. 18.15–18; Dt. 15.19–23). The firstling of an ass is to be either redeemed or destroyed. Since the destruction of the Temple, the firstlings of animals are given to a priest and left to pasture. They may not be used nor may benefit be derived from them unless a blemish occurs that would have invalidated them for sacrifice, in which case they may be slaughtered for food. The laws of the firstborn are found in tractate Bekhorot*. Since Reform Judaism rejects social class distinction, this ceremony is considered irrelevant for most Reform Jews; however, some families still choose to observe the ceremony or to change it to a ritual that is more compatible to the principles of Reform Judaism.

FIRST FRUITS (Heb. bikkurim). The biblical precept to bring the first ripe fruits, cultivated or wild, to the Temple (Ex. 23.19, 34.26; Dt. 26) applied, according to the Talmud, only in Temple times (since the first fruits, which had the sacred status of the terumah*, were to be placed "before the altar of the Lord") and affected only the produce of Erets Yisra'el, in which the rabbis included Transjordan and Syria. First fruits could be brought only from the seven kinds of produce for which the Land of Israel was praised: wheat, barley, figs, vines, pomegranates, olives, and honey (Dt. 8.8). When the first fruits appeared in the field, they were to be tied with a marker and left to grow and ripen. They were then cut and brought with great ceremony to the Temple court. Psalms were chanted throughout the journey, which was made by as large a group of people as possible. The streets of Jerusalem were adorned, and those bringing the first fruits were profusely welcomed. The main occasion for bringing the fruits was the feast of Shavu'ot* (called the Festival of the First Fruits), but they could be brought until the following Hanukkah. Placed in a basket (Dt. 26.2), the copiously decorated fruit was presented to the priest, while the donor recited the confession prescribed in Deuteronomy 26.5–10, thereby expressing his faith in God, the owner of the land, and thanksgiving for allowing him to hold it in trust. The priest then touched the basket, and the fruit became his property. The entire ceremony was accompanied by the singing of Psalm 30 by the Levitical choir and followed by the peace offerings. After the destruction of the Temple, when first fruits could no longer be brought, the rabbis regarded acts of charity as a substitute (Lv. Rab. 24), especially those for the support of scholars (Ket. 106a). The relevant legislation is discussed in the Talmudic tractate Bikkurim*. A modern celebration of the bringing of the first fruits has been introduced in some Israeli settlements.

FLESH (Heb. basar). The word is used in the Bible for the body as a whole; as a collective noun for mankind (Is. 66.16); figuratively, as the impressionable side of human nature (Ez. 35.26) or weakness (Is. 31.3); and as a type of food (Dn. 7.5). Originally forbidden to humans as food (Gn. 1.29–30), it was later permitted with qualifications (see MEAT). The dualistic opposition of flesh and spirit taught by some Jewish groups (such as the *Qumran community) and adopted by the *New Testament was not favored by rabbinic Judaism, which encouraged neither the mortification of flesh nor the ascription to it of inherent sinfulness. Although recognizing that human frailties stem from the nature of the *body and the temptations to which it is subject, the consensus of Jewish precept and teaching, far from negating the flesh, is directed to uplifting and sanctifying it.

FLOGGING (Heb. malqot), punishment by the infliction of lashes as provided for in Deuteronomy 25.1–3. Although the Bible prescribes a maximum of forty lashes, the rabbis interpreted this as a maximum of thirty-nine, one-third being administered on the chest and two-thirds upon the back. The number of lashes was determined by the beit din in accordance with the gravity of the offense. Flogging was the normal punishment for the active infringement of negative commandments for which no specific mention was made of a death penalty. It was also considered to be sufficient punishment for severe violations of commandments for which the punishment was traditionally decreed as karet* (cutting off). Although there was no physical punishment for the failure to carry out a positive commandment, the rabbinical authorities administered such punishment for the general welfare of the community in all cases where they saw fit. Flogging has not been applied in modern times, and in the State of Israel corporal punishment was forbidden in 1950. The subject is fully discussed in the Talmudic tractate Makkot*. Formerly, symbolic lashes were administered in synagogues to male congregants on the eve of Yom Kippur as an indication of contrition.

FLOOD. The biblical account of the flood that God visited upon the earth because of human wickedness is told in Genesis 6.5–9.17. Only the righteous *Noah, his family, and representatives of the animal kingdom were allowed to escape in a floating ark. The Flood is described as a release of the primeval waters of chaos that had been restrained by the act of creation. Subsequently, God vowed never to repeat this punishment and proclaimed the *rainbow as a sign of his covenant (Gn. 9.12–17). Flood legends are known from many parts of the world. The biblical account shows many similarities to the Sumerian–Babylonian versions. Bible scholars maintain that Genesis 6–9 weaves two originally distinct versions into a single story, in which the ancient Oriental material was refashioned into a moral drama to express a monotheistic and universalist conception of history. The Midrash develops this view by describing in detail the sinfulness of antediluvian humanity and Noah's attempts to make them repent.

FOLKLORE, popular traditions, including beliefs, customs, ritual practices, music, songs, dances, legends, and tales, originally oral but no longer exclusively so since the spread of literacy. Jewish folklore comprises traditions that are specifically cultivated and practiced by Jews. In a community spread around the world, these traditions also inevitably reflect the influence of the respective environments. The bearers of so-called "high" culture, whether literary, philosophical, theological, or halakhic, have tended to regard folklore as a debased, or at any rate lower, and primitive form of culture, often associated with magic, superstition, and non-Jewish and pagan traditions. Hence the term is sometimes used with a pejorative connotation, and many beliefs and minhagim (e.g., *Lag ba-Omer, *kapparot, *pilgrimages to tombs of holy rabbis, *dybbuk, *golem) were at first disapproved. Today, folklore is treated as a legitimate form of culture, and an increasing number of monographs, journals, and archival collections are devoted to the study of all aspects of Jewish folklore.

FOOD. Jewish culinary traditions date back three thousand years. The *dietary laws governing the selection, preparation, and consumption of all food were laid down in the Pentateuch. They are based on the concept of holiness and include permissible and forbidden foods and the laws of ritual slaughter, to which the rabbis added the ban on consuming meat and milk products together. Jews used ingredients available in the countries in which they lived, and considerable differences emerged between Ashkenazi and Sephardi traditions and nomenclatures.

Ceremonial foods in ancient Israel served as a means of expression of the relationship between humans and God and between the priestly tribe of Levi and the rest of the Israelite people.

Each act of dining, from the preparation of food to the recitation of *Birkat ha-Mazon, is carefully prescribed by Jewish law. The rituals surrounding Sabbath and festival meals express thanksgiving to God. *Wine is an essential component of festive meals.

Many food customs evolved that were linked to the holiday. The celebration of Ro'sh ha-Shanah includes partaking of honey and a fruit not previously eaten in that season to symbolize the hope for a sweet year ahead. Foods like lekeh (honey cake), teyglakh (boiled dough dipped in honey) and carrot tsimmes are also eaten. By placing the head of a fish on the table, Sephardim express the hope of being like the head and not the tail.

During *Sukkot, the fall harvest festival, families dine in a specially constructed booth (see SUKKAH) and traditionally eat stuffed vegetables, as a symbol of plenty, such as yaprak (stuffed grape leaves), or holishkes or praches (stuffed cabbage). In Yemen, families would consume a sheep or an ox. During *Hanukkah, latkes (potato pancakes fried in oil) are eaten by most American Jews, while Sephardi Jews eat sweets fried in oil and dipped in honey, and Israelis eat sufganiyyot (jelly doughnuts), symbolic of the oil of the Hanukkah miracle. On *Purim, the last festival before Pesah, when the yearly store of flour must be used up, hamantashen (triangular-shaped pastries filled with poppy seeds or fruit, traditionally believed to be in the shape of Haman's hat) are eaten. For seven days (eight in the Diaspora) during Pesah, dishes prepared with matsah (unleavened bread), symbolizing the Exodus from Egypt, and eggs, abundant in the spring and symbolic of fertility, are eaten.

Various symbolic dishes are part of the *Seder ceremony. Ashkenazim eat knaidlach, a matsah dumpling made with eggs and fat, in chicken soup. During Pesah, Ashkenazim, but not Sephardim, refrain from eating rice. On *Shavu'ot, the feast of the first fruits and the time of the receiving of the Torah, dairy foods such as cheesecake and blintzes (thin pancakes, an Ashkenazi dish) filled with cheese are served.

The Sabbath is marked by the eating of hallah* (two symbolic loaves of white bread often baked in a braided or twisted form) and the drinking of wine. Ashkenazim favor gefilte fish, which is prepared from a mixture of fish, bread or matsah crumbs, eggs, and seasonings simmered in a fish stock. Cooking is not allowed on the Sabbath; thus delicacies that could be prepared ahead, like chopped liver; kugel (baked sweet or savory pudding made from noodles, potatoes, or bread); and the eastern European tsholent, Moroccan adafina, and Iraqi hamim (all Sabbath stews of slow-baked meat, vegetables, and sometimes rice or barley) were devised by different communities. Many Moroccan communities start each of the Sabbath meals with fish, and there was a popular saying "Whoever eats fish will be saved from the judgment of Gehenna" (see GEHINNOM).

FORCED CONVERSION. See CONVERSION, FORCED.

FORGERY, any alteration in the text of a document, such as an erasure or the insertion of words between lines; this renders the document invalid. In order to detect possible changes in documents, rabbinic legislation established the type of paper, ink, and so forth that was to be used for certain documents (Git. 19a, 22–23; B. B. 162–167). In order to remove complications stemming from charges that an entire document has been forged, any document could be submitted to a rabbinic court for certification. Although forgery is considered a sin, it is not a criminal offense, and there is no prescribed punishment for it, although if a forged document is used as an instrument to commit *fraud, the perpetrator can be punished under that charge. At most, a person convicted of forgery is disbarred from serving as a witness.

FORGIVENESS. God is proclaimed as "forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin" (Ex. 34.6–7), and the sixth of the 'Amidah blessings is a prayer for such forgiveness. The conditions for forgiveness are confession, repentance, and the resolution to abstain from repeating the transgression. Since the individual should imitate the attributes of God, forgiveness for injuries or offenses should be freely given by the injured party, but human forgiveness involves the added need for rectifying any wrong and appeasing the person injured. FORMER PROPHETS (Heb. nevi'im ri'shonim), originally the biblical term used in postexilic biblical works (Zec. 1.4, 7.7) to refer to the prophets who prophesied before the Babylonian exile. Later, however, Former Prophets became a designation for the historical books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, which were placed at the beginning of the Prophets, the second division of the Bible. FORMSTECHER, SALOMON (1808–1889), German Reform rabbi and religious philosopher. In his main work, Die Religion des Geistes (1841), he developed a systematic philosophy in support of Jewish religious reform and integration into modern culture and society. Recasting the principles of Hegel and Schelling, he argued that Judaism is governed by an overarching idea—which affirms God to be a transcendent, pure moral being—whose extensive meaning is progressively revealed in time to all of humanity. In this process the pagan elements of human and culture sensibility, grounded in a "religion of nature," are gradually eliminated. Until such time that paganism is finally overcome, Judaism is to persist as a distinct entity so that it may secure the idea of the Religion of Spirit. Nonetheless, parallel to the progressive universalization of its animating idea, Judaism should undergo progressive change toward its ultimate union with the rest of humanity.

FOUR CAPTIVES, the story of four famous rabbis who set sail from Bari in Italy during the tenth century, were captured by Muslims, and were ransomed by Jewish communities, where they established eminent rabbinic academies—Shemaryah ben Elhanan in Alexandria, *Hushi'el ben Elhanan in Kairouan, and *Mosheh ben Hanokh (with his son *Hanokh ben Mosheh) in Cordova (the identity of the fourth rabbi is not known). The story, which first appeared in Avraham *ibn Daud's Sefer ha-Qabbalah, is not believed to be true, but offered consolation for the declining authority of the Babylonian academies and the rising primacy of academies in North Africa and Spain.

FOUR CUPS (Heb. arba' kosot), the four cups of wine obligatorily consumed during the course of the Pesah *Seder service. Midrashic explanations of the custom variously link the four cups to four references to redemption in Exodus 6.6–7 or to four references to Pharaoh's cup in Genesis 40, to the four times the word cup is applied to punishments traditionally to be meted out to the nations of the world, and to the four times the word is used in connection with the consolations that Israel will eventually receive (Y., Pes. 10). The four cups are drunk after the sanctification (Qiddush), after the conclusion of the first part of the Seder, after *Birkat ha-Mazon, and following the conclusion of the second part of the service (see HAGGADAH OF PESAH).

FOUR QUESTIONS. See MAH NISHTANNAH.

FOUR SPECIES (Heb. arba'ah minim), the four plants taken and waved during the morning service on *Sukkot. The Bible decrees: "you shall take on the first day the fruit of goodly trees, branches of palm trees, boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook and rejoice before the Lord your God seven days" (Lv. 23.40). The Bible does not explain the injunction, although from Nehe-miah 8.15–16, it appears that Nehemiah (and later the Sadducees and Karaites) interpreted the verse to refer to the species used in building the *sukkah. Rabbinic tradition identified the "fruit of goodly trees" with the myrtle (hadas; Suk. 32b–33a). The four species are traditionally made up of one palm branch (lulav*), one etrog*, three sprigs of myrtle, and two willow* twigs. The Midrash offers a wealth of allegorical interpretations (for example, the qualities of the four species correspond to four types of Jews who make up the community, or the shapes of these species correspond to the organs of the human body—the heart, eye, lip, and spine). Modern scholars regard the four species as part of the ancient ritual of prayer for rain (see TEFILLAT GESHEM); rabbinic tradition also confirms that one of the main concerns of Sukkot was rain for the coming season. In the morning service, the lulav is held in the right hand and the etrog in the left (Suk. 37b). After reciting the appropriate benediction (“to take the lulav”) during the Hallel* prayer on each day of the festival, the four species are waved in the four directions of the compass, as well as upward and downward, and a circuit is made with them around the synagogue (in Temple times, around the altar). In Temple times the waving was done on each day of the festival in the Temple but only on the first day elsewhere. After the destruction of the Temple it was ordained that the four species would be waved everywhere on all days of the festival, except the Sabbath (Suk. 3.12). On Hosha’na’ Rabbah* seven circuits are made.

FRANCKEL, DAVID (1707–1782), rabbi and commentator on the Talmud Yerushalmi. Franckel was born in Berlin and was rabbi in Dessau until he was appointed chief rabbi of Berlin in 1743. Moses Mendelssohn* was Franckel’s student, following him from Dessau to Berlin and eventually supporting him there. Franckel’s commentary to the Talmud Yerushalmi, one of the two standard commentaries printed with it, is his most significant literary achievement. The commentary is comprised of two parts: the Qorban ha-’Edah, which is modeled after Rashi’s commentary on the Talmud Bavli and explains the plain meaning of the text; and Shirei Qorban, which is modeled after the tosafistic commentaries, examines contradictions in the text, and offers novellae.

FRANK, YA’AQOV (1726–1791), last of the pseudo-Messiahs who emerged in the wake of the messianic movement initiated in 1665 by followers of Shabbetai Tsevi*. Even after Shabbetai Tsevi’s death, various groups of believers persisted, including the Dönmeh* in Turkey and secret societies in Poland and Galicia. Many of these groups embraced sexual license as part of a perverse mystical faith in the Messiah. Frank, who was born in Podolia, was brought up in one of these sects, became its leader, and eventually claimed to be the successor of Shabbetai Tsevi. He preached an antinomian doctrine and advocated a rapprochement with the Catholic church similar to the adoption of Islam by Shabbetai Tsevi and the Dönmeh (with whom Frank had personal contacts). After various disputations with the rabbis, in which Frank repudiated the Talmud, confessed a Trinitarian Judaism, and even repeated the blood libel, his followers, known as Frankists, took the decisive step of baptism in Lemberg (Lwów) in 1759. Frank himself insisted on being baptized in the Warsaw Cathedral with great pomp, having chosen Emperor Augustus III as his godfather. Accused of heresy against the church a year later, Frank was incarcerated and remained in prison for thirteen years, during which time he became known as the “suffering messiah” among his followers. In 1786 he settled in Offenbach near Frankfurt, where he and his daughter Eve presided over the secret headquarters of the sect and indulged in orgiastic rituals. After Frank’s death, the sect ceased to exist, and the baptized Frankists completely merged with Polish society.

FRANKEL, ZACHARIAS (1801–1875), rabbinical scholar; founder of the Historical* movement, which developed into Conservative* Judaism. Born in Prague, he served as rabbi in Teplitz (Teplíce) and Dresden until his election in 1854 to the post of director of the Breslau Rabbinical Seminary, which he headed until his death. He was the author of many basic Wissenschaft des Judentums* works, notably Darkhei ha-Mishnah, a history of halakhah (which argued that the oral law derived from the rabbis and not from Sinai, causing an outcry among the Orthodox), and Mavo’ ha-Yerushalmi, an introduction to the Talmud Yerushalmi. He established and edited the Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums, which remained the central German journal of Jewish scholarship until the Nazi era.

While Frankel felt the need to introduce changes in Judaism, he was unsympathetic to the extreme measures adopted by Reform Judaism in his time, especially the replacement of Hebrew with German as the language of prayer (he withdrew from the 1845 Reform synod over this issue) and the omission of references to sacrifices and the return to Zion. At the same time, he advocated liturgical changes and the modernization of Jewish education. Frankel saw the Jewish people as the source of law and tradition, and his study of the development of halakhah was guided by his search for the elements that had promoted the Jewish people’s vitality and those that had lost their relevance and should therefore be discarded. He regarded Hebrew and messianism as two of the main eternal elements in Judaism. He maintained the Sinaitic revelation but held that this had been supplemented by the oral Torah, which originates in the will of the people. Since it is of human origin, the oral Torah is not immutable; therefore, the sanctity of the Sabbath and the dietary laws repose not on their Sinaitic origin but on their expression over thousands of years in Jewish souls. His ethnic approach contrasted with the ethical emphasis of the reformers. These ideas formed the basis of the Positive Historical school of Judaism, which accepted adaptation to modernism, but only if rooted in tradition. Frankel's school did not become a movement in Germany, but his middle course between Orthodoxy and Reform provided the ideological underpinning for the Conservative movement when it emerged in the United States.

FRANKISTS. See FRANK, YA'AOOV.

FRAUD. Jewish law strongly condemns all forms of fraud and legislates appropriate punishments. A judgment of fraud annuls a contract, and the injured party is entitled to damages. The Bible strictly prohibits the use of false weights and measures (Lv. 19.35–36). Fraudulent representation and unfair profit are termed ona'ah (oppression). The rabbis apply the biblical prohibition "You shall not wrong one another" (Lv. 25.14) to transactions in which the profit obtained is so great that the overcharge is tantamount to fraud. Overcharging by the seller or underpayment by the purchaser by one-sixth of the market value constitutes grounds for canceling a transaction. This formula applies to transactions involving movable goods; the rule was not generally applied to real estate transactions, where the overcharge had to exceed 50 percent in order for the agreement to be annulled. A deal is regarded as fraudulent only when the seller conceals the profit margin. An individual selling personal property, because of the sentimental value attached to it, may sell it at any price (B. M. 51a). If an article for sale is defective, the purchaser must be informed prior to the sale, otherwise the transaction is considered fraudulent; any false description gives the buyer the right to have the contract annulled and the purchase money refunded. The term ona'ah was also applied to wounding another's feelings, considered to be a worse offense than monetary imposition (B. M. 58b); with the latter there exists the possibility of restitution, whereas the former offense cannot be completely nullified. The term ona'ah is also used in the extended sense, for example, of asking the price of an object with no intention of buying it, regardless of what price is quoted, or reminding a convert of an idolatrous past.

FREEDOM. Although the word freedom means release from all arbitrary control or authority, it originally referred to the exemption or release from slavery, which was an accepted part of the economic and social system of the ancient (but not only the ancient) world. The supreme gift of national independence is symbolized by the *Exodus from slavery in Egypt (Pesah is referred to as the feast of freedom). The Ten Commandments begin with the evocation of the fundamental historical experience of liberation: "I am the Lord your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage," rather than with a theological statement such as, "I am the Lord your God, creator of heaven and earth." The gift of national freedom through the Exodus, meant to turn the Israelites from the slaves of Pharaoh into a nation of servants of God, served as a paradigm for all liturgical and spiritual evocations, such as the dictum of *Yehudah ha-Levi, "The servants of time are servants of servants; only the servant of God is truly free," as well as subsequent theoretical discussions of freedom, including such issues as *free will versus *predestination, divine foreknowledge, and causality.

FREEHOF, SOLOMON BENNETT (1892–1990), American Reform rabbi and scholar. Born in London, he came to the United States in 1903. In 1915 he began teaching liturgy at Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, where he had been ordained. He then became rabbi of Congregation Kehillath Anshe Maarav in Chicago (1924–1934) and in 1934 rabbi of Rodef Shalom in Pittsburgh. He was the outstanding American Reform authority on Jewish law and headed the Responsa Committee of the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR). His volumes of responsa guided the American Reform movement and linked its practices to the historic teachings of Jewish law. His many volumes of responsa include The Responsa Literature and Treasury of Responsa (repr. New York, 1973), Reform Responsa and Recent Reform Responsa (repr. New York, 1973), Current Reform Responsa (Cincinnati, 1969), Modern Reform Responsa (Cincinnati, 1971), Contemporary Reform Responsa (Cincinnati, 1974) and New Reform Responsa (Cincinnati, 1980). As chairman of the CCAR Committee on Liturgy, he was influential in the publication of the standard Reform prayer books, the Union Prayer Book (1940–1945) and the Union Home Prayer Book (1951). His writings on the Bible include commentaries on Psalms (1938), Job (1958) and Isaiah (1972). He was president of the World Union for Progressive Judaism from 1959 to 1964.

FREE WILL, the notion that men and women determine their own actions and are therefore morally responsible for them. Free will becomes a religious and philosophical problem in the light of the belief in divine omniscience or predestination of *providence (see DETERMINISM; FATALISM). Although the contradiction is often transcended in actual religious experience (cf. Jer. 4.3ff.), it remained a serious problem for reflective thought. Attempts to solve it often tended to curtail either one's free will or God's omniscience and omnipotence. The former solution not only outrages one's moral sense, but also calls in question the justice of God in rewarding virtue and punishing sin. The limitation of God's sovereignty also entails serious theological difficulties. Philosophical discussions of free will oscillate between these two poles, one side maintaining that every being, including God, is determined by the necessity of its own being and cannot voluntarily do anything or leave it undone, and the other side asserting that God is not bound by necessity external to himself. Freedom of choice seems to be presupposed in the Bible (cf. Dt. 30.19) and, in particular, in prophetic preaching. According to Josephus, the *Sadducees denied the existence of divine providence and attributed everything to chance; the *Essenes, however, were absolute determinists and attributed everything to predestination and the will of God (see QUMRAN COMMUNITY); the *Pharisees asserted both the sovereignty of God and the freedom of the individual, holding that not all things are predestined and that in certain matters humans have freedom. Indeterminism and freedom in one's religious choice are asserted in such rabbinic statements as, "Everything is in the hands of God except the fear of God" (Ber. 33b) or "The eye, ear, and nostrils are not in man's power, but the mouth, hand, and feet are" (Tanḥuma', Toledot), meaning that external impressions are involuntary but actions, steps, and words arise from an individual's own volition. The Jewish philosophers generally follow the Pharisaic tradition, defending free will either at the price of limiting the scope of God's foreknowledge or by arguing that divine omniscience does not impinge on a person's free will. *Philo departed from Stoic thought and held that free will is a divine part of divine knowledge in such a way that it does not impinge on one's freedom. *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on and *Yehudah ha-Levi held that God's knowledge of human actions, past and future, did not prejudice or determine them in any way. *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda' saw free will as limited to the mental acts of decision and choice; external acts, however, he claimed, were determined. Hasda'i ben Avraham *Crescas alone among the Jewish philosophers, although aware of the demoralizing effect of his doctrine, denied free will in the interests of proving the sovereignty of God and his infinite attributes.

FREE-WILL OFFERING (Heb. nedavah), one of the *sacrifices made by an individual as an act of spontaneous devotion (as distinct from one that is required in expiation for sin or impurity, in visiting the Temple on festival days, in payment of a vow, or in thanksgiving for some form of salvation). Free-will offerings could take two forms: the animal could be offered in its entirety, or it could be eaten as a sacred meal in celebration of God's lovingkindness. Thus, it is a subcategory of both the *burnt offering and the *peace offering. In the latter case, it was the least-sacred type of offering; not only could it be eaten over a two-day period (Lv. 7.16-17), but also certain imperfections in the animal were allowed (Lv. 22.23)—the only exception to the rule that sacrificial animals had to be without blemish.

FRIEDLÄNDER, DAVID (1750-1834), communal leader and educator. Born into the wealthiest Jewish family in Königsberg, David Friedländer received a thorough Jewish and secular education. Soon after moving to Berlin, he married a banker's daughter in 1772 and established himself as a partner in a silk factory in 1776. His early reputation in the textile industry propelled him into a position of influence. A disciple of Moses Mendelssohn, Friedländer argued for emancipation through reform. Friedländer helped to establish the Free School in 1778, which he directed for twenty years, along with an adjacent Hebrew press and bookstore. He prepared numerous textbooks and translations. Frederick William II invited him to present the grievances of the Jewish community in 1787. In 1799 Friedländer, representing "some Jewish householders," penned an open letter to a prominent theologian, Wilhelm Abraham Teller, in which he offered to convert to Christianity so long as he and those he represented would not be expected to accept the dogmas of the church. Teller rejected Friedländer's conditions.

FUNERAL SERVICE. While there is no prescribed form for funerals (see BURIAL), the various branches of Judaism have delineated basic structures. The funeral service usually includes the recitation of psalms and passages from the Bible or rabbinic literature, a *eulogy, and the memorial prayer *El Male' Rahamim. The funeral is most often conducted in a special funeral chapel and/or at the graveside; some still follow the older practice of conducting funerals at the home of the deceased. In the case of notables and among some Reform congregations, the service begins in the synagogue. Immediate burial is preferred in Judaism as a way of honoring the deceased. However, a funeral service may be delayed to allow a mourner to arrive.

At the graveside the coffin is borne by designated pallbearers, who stop seven times before reaching the grave while Psalm 91 is recited. (In Reform Judaism the practice of stopping seven times has been eliminated.) The coffin is then placed in the grave. Some follow the custom of covering the coffin with earth before the service continues. The prayer *Tsiddiq ha-Din, which is an acclamation of God's justice, is recited (in some rites, it is said before the burial), followed by the recitation of the *Qaddish by the next of kin. Filling the grave is a mitsvah, and those present often participate. After the service at the graveside is concluded, the people in attendance form two rows through which the mourners pass and offer condolence with the words "May God comfort you among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem." It is customary to wash one's hands and to pluck some blades of grass before leaving the cemetery. Traditionally, Orthodox Jews did not place flowers on the grave, but in modern times this has become a frequent practice.

GABBA'I (גַּבְּאִי; a collector, tax gatherer), a synagogue warden or treasurer. In Talmudic times, when it referred to tax gatherers, the term was one of opprobrium, as in Hagigah 3.6, "If gabbai'im entered a house, the house is unclean." Similarly, the Talmud (San. 25b) states that gabbai'im are disqualified from giving evidence, the reason being that, as tax collectors, the gabbai'im collect more than the amount permitted them by law. Gabbai'ei tzedakah, on the other hand, collected and often distributed money for charitable causes, a position offered only to those of the highest probity. Family members of gabbai'ei tzedakah were able to marry into priestly families without the check into genealogy required of others (Qid. 4.5). The Talmud nevertheless required gabbai'ei tzedakah to collect and disburse funds in pairs to avoid even the faintest hint of suspicion. In the Middle Ages that rule was applied to administrators of the various societies of the *community (for example, the societies for caring for the dead, visiting the sick, charitable funds); administrators for the largest funds rotated office every month. In Erets Yisra'el there were gabbai'im who headed each kolel*, and there were also women with the title who cared for poor women and instructed women in ritual. Among the Hasidim, the term is applied to the person in charge of the court of the rebbe*. Eventually, the term evolved to mean the synagogue treasurer and then to refer to the synagogue warden, even though the latter function often involves no financial aspect. See also PARNAS.

GAD, the name of two biblical figures. The earlier Gad was the seventh son of Jacob; son of Zilpah, the hand-maiden of Jacob's wife Leah. One of the twelve tribes is descended from him. The original meaning of the word gad (good fortune, deity of luck) appears in the account of his naming (Gn. 30.11). Members of the tribe of Gad, most of whom were shepherds, dwelt east of the Jordan River in Jazer and Gilead, regions known for their livestock. They were required to be among the first to arm themselves and cross the Jordan in the conquest of Canaan (Nm. 32.1–33) as a condition of their land allotment. They subsequently constructed an altar near the Jordan as a sign of their allegiance to the worship of God (Jos. 22.26–34). The later Gad was a prophet at David's court who advised David to return to Judah and to build the altar on the threshing floor of Araunah (1 Sm. 22.1–5; 2 Sm. 24.18).

GALANTE FAMILY, family of rabbis and scholars originating in Spain, who settled in Italy, Turkey, Syria, and Erets Yisra'el.

Mosheh bar Mordekhai Galante (1540–1608), born in Rome and a pupil of Yosef Karo in Safed. He was one of the outstanding poseqim in Safed, where he served as av beit din. He wrote responsa; Mafteah ha-Zohar (Venice, 1566), an index to Bible verses interpreted in the Zohar; and Qohelet Ya'agov (Safed, 1578), a commentary on Ecclesiastes.

Mosheh ben Yehonatan Galante (1620–1689), grandson of Mosheh bar Mordekhai; representative of the Jerusalem Jewish community before the Ottoman authorities and distinguished head of the Beit Ya'agov Yeshivah. He played a leading role in making Jerusalem a rabbinical center and traveled extensively throughout the Ottoman empire on behalf of the Jerusalem community. He was known as Ha-Magen (The Defender) after his (unpublished) book of a thousand responsa, Elef ha-Magen. His published works included Zevah ha-Shelamim (Amsterdam, 1708), a commentary on the Torah.

GAMBLING. There are no references to games in the Bible, although lots were cast to make decisions, and on this basis Ya'ir Hayyim *Bacharach permitted raffles (Havvot Ya'ir 61). It seems that only under Greek and Roman influence were games such as dice playing (qubyah) adopted and indulged in by Jews. The rabbis were strongly opposed to all forms of gambling, which although not classed as actual robbery (since appropriation against the will of the owner is an essential legal requirement for proving robbery in Jewish law) was considered closely akin to it; gambling debts could not be legally claimed. Although the general tendency of rabbinic law is to forbid all manner of gambling, careful distinction is made between those who indulge in it as a pastime and those for whom it is a profession (San. 24b). Professional gamblers were considered untrustworthy and invalid as witnesses, for "they waste their time in idleness and are not interested in the welfare of humanity" (R. ha-Sh. 1.8; San. 3.3). The Shulhan 'Arukh permits gambling (Hoshen Mishpat 207.13, 370). The numerous communal enactments against gambling that are found in the medieval records of European Jewry show that gambling was fairly widely indulged in, and several instances of addiction are recorded (including Leone *Modena, despite the fact that in his youth he wrote an antigambling treatise). Debts incurred in gambling could not be recovered in a beit din (Resp. Rashba 7, 445), and addicted gamblers were excluded from community activities. The custom of playing cards on Hanukkah and other festive occasions was fairly widespread among Orthodox Jews in eastern Europe. In modern times, rabbis have discussed the morality of using synagogue premises for games of chance; this has usually been approved if charity or the synagogue benefits from the proceedings.

GAMLI'EL. It is often uncertain which Gamli'el is meant in the primary sources. The name can appear with no further qualifiers; sometimes the title "the Elder" is used for Rabban Gamli'el I, who was active during the time of the Second Temple. Some of the tosafists rely on this distinction and assume that when the name Gamli'el appears alone it is a reference to Gamli'el II of Yavneh; however, parallel texts exist in which "the Elder" appears in one version only. Historians, therefore, add another criterion: if the incident clearly occurred before the destruction of the Second Temple, the reference is to *Gamli'el the Elder. An additional difficulty is the confusion in texts between Gamli'el and *Shim'on ben Gamli'el, the latter name referring to one of two separate patriarchs. There are more than twenty-five such variants in Mishnah manuscripts alone.

Gamli'el II of Yavneh was the name of the son of the nasi R. Shim'on ben Gamli'el and grandson of Gamli'el the Elder. He was born about twenty years before the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE. Most of his public activities took place after that time. He succeeded R. Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai at Yavneh in about 80 CE. Since he was a nasi, he should have assumed the patriarchate at Yavneh immediately after the fall of Jerusalem. He may have been kept out of office by the Romans and perhaps even hunted down by them in an attempt to eradicate all descendants of the ruling family; his father, Shim'on, in all probability was killed during the Great Revolt. It is possible that Gamli'el was in hiding for a number of years. No source records Gamli'el's participation in the academy at Yavneh with R. Yoḥanan, and only one source links them as teacher and disciple. When Gamli'el succeeded Yoḥanan at Yavneh, Yoḥanan retired to Beror Hayil.

At Yavneh, Gamli'el's main tasks were to reestablish the Sanhedrin and to strengthen the institution of the patriarchate (nesi'ut). A strong leader, he came into conflict with other sages at the academy, notably R. *Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos and R. *Yehoshu'a ben Hananyah. He was temporarily deposed but was reinstated after coming to terms with his antagonists.

Most of Gamli'el's important halakhic dictums dealt with the need for religious readjustment and a uniform halakhah after the destruction of the Temple. Many important ordinances were issued in his name fixing the liturgy (i.e., determination of the Pesah Seder service [Pes. 10.5] and three daily prayers), incorporating elements reminiscent of the Temple ritual. He instituted a prayer against sectarians (*Birkat ha-Minim), to be recited in the daily 'Amidah. It was directed against Jewish-Christians and further distanced them from Judaism and the synagogue. He was well versed in the sciences, which he used in fixing the Jewish calendar. His knowledge of Greek made him a spokesman for Judaism in encounters with paganism and Christianity. The translation of the Bible into Greek by Aquila the Proselyte was undertaken in the Yavneh period; unlike the Septuagint, it followed the Masoretic Text closely. This, too, can be seen as the creation of a new norm to shore up rabbinic Judaism. Gamli'el did much to raise the prestige of the patriarchate through his frequent trips in Erets Yisra'el and abroad—to Beirut, Damascus, Tripoli, Antioch, Aleppo, and Rome. His dialogues with gentiles, which took place on these journeys, make up a major portion of the nonhalakhic traditions about him.

GAMLI'EL THE ELDER (died c.50 CE), head of the Sanhedrin during the rule of Caligula; grandson of *Hillel; also known as Rabban (Our Master) Gamli'el or Gamli'el I. There were six Palestinian patriarchs (1st–5th cent.) of the school of Hillel, and it is often unclear to which *Gamli'el the Talmud is referring. Gamli'el the Elder introduced important judicial reforms, including improving the legal status of women; for example, he permitted a woman to remarry even if there was only a single witness to her husband's death (Yev. 16.7). He also condemned discrimination against non-Jews, for example, in giving of charity to them. Among his pupils was *Paul (Acts 22.3), who mentions sympathetically Gamli'el's tolerance for the small Christian sect.

GANZFRIED, SHELOMOH (1804–1886), halakhic authority and chief rabbinical judge in Ungvár (Uzhgorod), Hungary. He was a leading spokesman for the separatist camp in the Orthodox struggle against Neology, but he is best known for his code of Jewish law, the Qitsur Shulḥan 'Arukh (1864), an abridgment based on Yosef Karo's Shulḥan 'Arukh*, which summarizes in fluid, simple Hebrew the laws incumbent on the individual Jew. Generally, he included only those opinions that he held to be correct. In his lifetime, fourteen editions of the Qitsur Shulḥan 'Arukh, as well as a number of commentaries, had been published. The book's popularity reflects the decline in basic traditional Jewish study skills among laymen, who preferred the popularization to deeper study of the original. Additionally, its unequivocal nature echoes the Hungarian approach that demanded strict adherence to uniform practice.

GA'ON (גאון; excellency, pride), title of the head of either of the two leading *academies in Babylonia, *Sura and *Pumbedita, following the period of the *savora'im. The beginning and end of the geonic period are difficult to date precisely, but the geonic period is considered to have extended from the mid-sixth to the mid-eleventh century. The title ga'on is an abbreviation of the designation ro'sh yeshivat ga'on Ya'akov (head of the academy that is the pride of Jacob). Although the *exilarch served as the official representative of the Jewish community vis-à-vis the Muslim authorities, the ge'onim, too, exercised considerable temporal power: the Jewish communities nearest Babylonia were divided into three reshuyot (spheres of influence), of which one was controlled by the exilarch and one by each of the ge'onim (or their academies). In every district, the appropriate central authority was empowered to appoint (and, if necessary, to dismiss) local officials and to collect taxes from the Jewish populace; these comprised a major source of funding for the central institutions. The exilarch also played a leading role, at least on several occasions, in the selection of a new ga'on when the office became vacant.

The ge'onim did much to foster and develop Talmudic law and to enhance the status and authority of the *Talmud Bavli in particular. The geonic period saw the Talmud Bavli established as the recognized standard of halakhic authority throughout the Jewish world, at the expense of the ancient Palestinian center and its traditions. This victory, which was achieved only after a prolonged struggle, reflected a widespread recognition of Babylonian superiority in the halakhic realm.

In addition to transmitting and explicating the Talmudic text, the ge'onim were obliged to draw practical conclusions concerning questions that had been discussed without clear decisions having been reached, as well as questions that had not arisen in the Talmud and so had to be answered by analogy to earlier discussions.

The characteristic literary form of the period was the responsum (see RESPONSA), in which a ga'on (writing on behalf of and with the cooperation of the scholars of his academy) answered correspondents' queries, mostly on Talmudic and halakhic matters. These responsa were often copied and referred to by contemporary and later scholars, and not only by the original addressees. Geonic influence was felt most directly and profoundly in North Africa and Spain, where Jewish communities frequently corresponded with the Babylonian academies, but geonic writings were later accorded a semicanonical status even in areas such as France and Germany.

The earlier part of the geonic period saw the publication of three ambitious literary works, none of which (in all probability) was written by a ga'on. One of these was the She'iltot, a collection of homilies combining halakhah and aggadah, the redaction of which is attributed to Aḥa' of Shabḥa. The other two are in the nature of systematic halakhic codes with some pretensions to comprehensiveness. The earlier of these, Halakhot Pesuqot, is traditionally but somewhat implausibly attributed to Yehuda'i ben Nahman Ga'on; the later Halakhot Gedolot was attributed to R. Shim'on Kayyara, of whom virtually nothing is known.

Yehuda'i Ga'on, who trained in Pumbedita but from 760 headed the academy of Sura, is the earliest ga'on whose responsa have been preserved in significant numbers. He is also the earliest figure reported to have attempted to establish Babylonian hegemony in matters of halakhah and tradition, going so far as to instruct Palestinian Jews to abandon their ancestral customs in favor of Babylonian ones.

The ninth century saw a number of prominent ge'onim of both academies sending large numbers of responsa to the Diaspora. Perhaps the most prolific of these was *Natrona'i bar Hila'i, ga'on of the Sura academy; over five hundred of his responsa have been preserved. Equally famous is Natrona'i's rival and possible successor, *Amram bar Sheshna', best known for his prayer book Seder Rav 'Amram. Leading ge'onim of Pumbedita included Palto'i Ga'on (842–857), who is reported to have sent a copy of the Talmud to Spain.

The nature of the gaonate changed considerably in the tenth century, primarily as a result of the career of *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, who became ga'on of Sura in 928. Sa'adyah's unconventional background and personality had far-reaching effects on the intellectual elite of Babylonia, most notably a broadening of their intellectual horizons to include non-Talmudic subjects such as Bible, poetry, and philosophy, and of their literary activities to include the writing of systematic works on these and other topics. Sa'adyah's most notable followers were *Shemu'el ben Ḥofni, ga'on of Sura, and *Ha'i Ga'on, Shemu'el's son-in-law and the head of the Pumbedita academy. Ha'i's father and predecessor as head of the academy, *Sherira' ben Hanina' Ga'on, is famous primarily for his epistle of 986, Iggeret Rav Sherira' Ga'on, which constitutes the most important source for the chronology of the geonic period and a major discussion of the evolution of Talmudic literature. Shortly after Ha'i's death the Babylonian academies lost their leading role in the Jewish world, and in the late ninth century they relocated to Baghdad but retained their traditional names. The head of an academy located in Baghdad continued to lay claim to the title of ga'on as late as the thirteenth century. A gaonate also emerged in Erets Yisra'el, although its early history is not clear. The Babylonians were dissatisfied with this use of the title ga'on and refrained from addressing the heads of the Erets Yisra'el community as such. The ga'on headed the yeshivah of Tiberias, which moved to Jerusalem, and he also directed all aspects, including economic, of the country's Jewish community. He was recognized by the non-Jewish rulers as the representative of the community. The gaonate was headed by a group of seven scholars (sometimes called the Great Sanhedrin) headed by the ga'on, with the av beit din as his deputy and successor. The senior positions were often hereditary and were usually held by members of three families, of whom the Ben Me'ir family was the most prominent. They appointed judges and community leaders in Erets Yisra'el and Syria. Few of the responsa of these ge'onim have survived, but many of their letters, often requesting support, have been found in the Cairo Genizah. After the Seljuk conquest in 1076, which brought great suffering to the Jews, the gaonate moved to Tyre and later to Damascus, where it came to an end. Egyptian Jews also founded a gaonate in the eleventh century, and it flourished for some decades in the twelfth century. The term ga'on continues in popular Jewish usage to describe an outstanding scholar.

GAR'JI, MATTATYAHU (1844–1918), rabbi in Afghanistan. The Jewish community of Afghanistan was strengthened after 1839 by refugees from Mashhad in Persia (where the Jews had been forcibly converted to Islam), including several members of the Gar'ji family. They were among the rabbinical leaders in their new home. The Jews of Afghanistan had a vibrant Jewish life, maintained almost completely without contacts with the outside world, and produced a literature in Judeo-Persian and Hebrew. Gar'ji, who lived most of his life in Herat, wrote many works, among them Qorot Zemanim (Jerusalem, 1913), describing the fate of the refugees from Mashhad, including their move to Erets Yisra'el, from the end of the nineteenth century and, most notably, 'Oneg Shabbat on the Torah and Five Scrolls, divided according to the weekly synagogue readings. He also wrote a commentary on Psalms and sermons on the Talmud and Pirquei Avot.

GEIGER, ABRAHAM (1810–1874), scholar and spiritual leader of *Reform Judaism in Germany. The outstanding intellectual figure among the early Reformers, he was animated by the desire to liberate Judaism from its ceremonialism, to link it with European traditions, to organize it on modern scientific lines, and to interpret it in the light of an ethical universality based on the prophets. His Reform principles and theological convictions are embodied in the prayer book that he published in 1854. It omits all references to angels, the resurrection of the dead, the restoration of the Temple, and the return to Zion. Geiger was opposed to the doctrine of Israel's election and all religious or national particularism. Among the innovations he introduced into the service were choral singing, confirmation exercises, and sermons in German. He favored the elimination of circumcision and the dietary laws but opposed the tendency in certain Reform circles to observe the Sabbath on Sundays. His scholarly activities were based on a historical-critical study of the evolution of Judaism. He believed that Judaism ought to become a world religion that would take the place of Christianity, which he maintained was marred by basic misconceptions.

Geiger was one of the most versatile and influential Jewish scholars of the nineteenth century. His initial research focused on the question of Jewish influence on Islam, which was followed by a long series of articles on various aspects of Jewish literature. Geiger's most renowned book was on the transmission of the Bible within Jewish tradition, Urschrift und Übersetzungen der Bibel (1857). As a professor at the *Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums, Geiger lectured on the whole course of Jewish history. Reflecting the fusion of his roles as critical scholar and Reform activist, he gave expression to a view of Judaism as ceaselessly and dynamically evolving, for instance, from a period of rigid legalism in medieval and early modern times to an age of liberation in the post-Enlightenment era.

GEIHINNOM, valley (Gei ben Hinnom) outside the western wall of Jerusalem, mentioned in the Bible (Jos. 15.8, 18.16; 2 Kgs. 23.10; Jer. 7.31; Neh. 11.30) as a valley through which ran the boundary between the tribes of Benjamin and Judah. It was the site of *Topheth, where child sacrifices were offered to *Molech. The valley also served for the incineration of the city's refuse and for dumping of animal carcasses and the bodies of criminals. Jeremiah prophesied (Jer. 7.32) that the valley would become a "valley of slaughter" and a burial place. Thus it assumed in post-biblical literature the connotation of hell, where the wicked are punished (in opposition to the garden of Eden, or paradise)—though no such allusion to it exists in the Bible itself, which refers to the abode of the dead only as Sheol (cf. Gn. 37.25). Some rabbis place Geihinnom (or hell) in the bowels of the earth ('Eruv. 19a); others, in the heavens or beyond "the mountain of darkness" (Tam. 32b). The form of punishment inflicted on the wicked is not clearly defined in the Talmud but is principally associated with fire. Maimonides interpreted the tradition of punishment of the wicked in Geihinnom as a denial of eternal life for them. The Zohar describes an upper Geihinnom and a lower Geihinnom; the dross of the soul that is not purged in the lower Geihinnom is finally removed in the upper Geihinnom. See also AFTERLIFE.

GELILAH (גְּלִילָה; rolling), in the Ashkenazi rite, the honor accorded a person of rolling (i.e., closing) up and binding the Torah scroll and putting on the Torah ornaments after the Torah reading in the synagogue. One person first raises the scroll (hagbahah*), whereupon another performs gelilah. In the eastern Sephardi rite, in which the Torah scroll is not tied, there is no gelilah. In Talmudic times, the person who read the last portion of the Torah would roll it up. In some congregations, gelilah is now performed by children.

GEMARA' (Aram.; גְּמָרָא; completion), the usual designation for the commentary and discussions on the Mishnah* that surround the latter on the printed page of the Talmud. The Mishnah together with the gemara' make up the Talmud*. There is both a Palestinian and a Babylonian gemara' to the Mishnah, but there are many tractates to which no gemara' has been preserved.

GEMATRIA. See GIMATRIYYAH.

GEMILUT HESED (גְּמִילּוּת חֶסֶד), any act of kindness, consideration, or benevolence. Torah, worship, and gemilut hesed are the three foundations of the world (Avot 1.2), and gemilut hesed is one of the distinguishing characteristics of the Jewish people (Yev. 79a). In three respects gemilut hesed is superior to tsedaqah (acts of charity): tsedaqah can be given only in money or in kind; gemilut hesed can be given in personal service also. Tsedaqah can be given only to the poor; gemilut hasadim to both rich and poor. Tsedaqah can be performed only for the living; gemilut hasadim for the living and the dead (Suk. 49b). Gemilut hesed is unlimited in its applications and is listed among those actions by which "man enjoys the fruit in this world, while the stock remains to him in the world to come" (Pe'ah 1.1). Gemilut hesed is one of the attributes of God, who is described in the daily 'Amidah as gomer hasadim tovim (bestower of loving-kindness). Because lending money to enable a person to become self-sufficient is gemilut hesed and is considered superior to almsgiving, which could humiliate the recipient, the term gemilut hesed was applied more specifically to the lending of money free of interest to those in need of temporary financial assistance. Gemilut hesed societies exist for this purpose.

GENEALOGY. See YUHASIN.

GENESIS, BOOK OF (Heb. Be-Re'shit [In the Beginning]; from the opening word of the book), the first book of the Torah, whose English title was taken from the Greek genesis (coming into being). The book, which is divided into fifty chapters, consists of four cycles, the first of which covers primeval history (1.1–11.26) and describes the creation* of the world and Israel's understanding of the origins of humanity (stories about Adam* and Eve*, Noah*, and the Flood*, etc.). The second cycle (11.27–22.24) presents the life story of Abraham* and centers around his relationship with God, the establishment of the covenant*, and Abraham's quest for an heir (realized by his son Isaac*). The third major unit is the Jacob* cycle (25.19–35.22), which details the trials and tribulations of the third of Israel's patriarchs*. There is no special cycle devoted to Isaac, whose character is the least developed of the three patriarchs. The final unit is the Joseph* story (37.1–50.26), which concentrates on Jacob's favorite son and the migration of the Israelites to Egypt. Small units of linking material (23.1–25.18, 35.23–36.43) provide minor details necessary to round out the stories of the patriarchs; they are placed between the Abraham and Jacob cycles and between the Jacob and Joseph cycles. The Book of Genesis lays the foundations for the historical accounts, teachings, and legislation of the subsequent books of the Bible. Major issues are the sovereignty and providence of the one God who created the world, who is the source of morality, and who guides Israel; the emergence of the peoples of the world; the special relationship of the patriarchs to God and the election of their seed to be God's people; and God's promise of the land of Canaan as Israel's ultimate home. The traditional Jewish view of the Book of Genesis is that it is of divine origin and was given by God to Moses at Sinai. Since the seventeenth century, critical scholars have rejected this view and have proposed various dates for the authorship and/or final redaction of Genesis. Several indications in the text point to a tenth-century BCE (Davidic–Solomonic) date. Such clues include the promise of kings descending from Abraham and Sarah (17.6, 17.16); Abraham's tithing to a priest of Salem (Jerusalem; 14.18–20); Abraham's sacrifice of a ram on "the mount of the Lord" (22.14), a phrase used elsewhere in the Bible only with reference to Jerusalem; Israel's rule over Edom (27.29); the latter's rebellion (27.40); the close relationship with Ammon and Moab (19.36–38); and the connection between Judah and royal rule (49.8–10). All of these reflect the historical, political, and theological developments of the united kingdom under David and Solomon. According to this view, the Book of Genesis presents the early history of Israel as filtered through the lens of an Israelite author (or authors) of the tenth century BCE.

GENESIS APOCRYPHON, an Aramaic manuscript of the *Dead Sea Scrolls, found in Qumran, Cave 1, in 1947. The Genesis Apocryphon is a collection of patriarchal narratives based on the Book of Genesis. The material in its preserved twenty-two columns (only cols. 2 and 19–22 have been fully published) covers the narratives from Lamech to Abraham. In style, it is related to the Targum and the Midrash, while much of its content parallels the Book of Jubilees. The Genesis Apocryphon manuscript dates from the late first century BCE to the early first century CE, while it was composed between the early and middle second century BCE. It was first published by Nahman Avigad and Yigael Yadin (Jerusalem, 1956), and an English translation by Geza Vermes appeared in his The Dead Sea Scrolls in English (London, 1987).

GENESIS RABBAH, a collection of Midrashic-homiletic comments to Genesis, generally considered the earliest of the aggadic midrashim. Compiled in Erets Yisra'el in the fifth or sixth century CE, Genesis Rabbah includes an abundance of exegetical comments, parables, biblical narrative expansions, and aggadic stories transmitted by rabbinic sages of the Mishnaic and Talmudic periods. The passages, written in a mixture of Rabbinic Hebrew and Galilean Aramaic (with an influence of Greek vocabulary) are arranged in order of the verses of Genesis; almost every verse is expounded by one or more passages. The work is divided into 101 sections or parashiyyot (the numbering of sections varies slightly among the manuscripts and printed editions). These sections conform partially to the "open" and "closed" paragraphs of the Masoretic Text of the Torah, and partially to the sedarim of the *triennial cycle of Torah readings. Each section, with a few exceptions, commences with one or more petiḥot (proems): the petiḥah presents an exposition of a verse unconnected to Genesis (taken generally from the Hagiographa), which is subsequently related to the beginning verse of the section. The Midrashic material in Genesis Rabbah, serving as a prime example of rabbinic thought and exegesis, has numerous direct parallels in other early rabbinic works, especially the Talmud Yerushalmi. Many of the themes, legends, and exegeses in Genesis Rabbah may also be found in the apocryphal and pseudepigraphal literature as well as in the first-century CE Jewish authors Philo and Josephus, although a direct influence of these works on the Midrash is not generally assumed.

Two English translations of Genesis Rabbah are H. Freedman and M. Simon's Midrash Rabbah, volumes 1 and 2 (3d ed. [London, 1961]), and J. Neusner's Genesis Rabbah: The Judaic Commentary on Genesis, A New American Translation (3 vols. [Atlanta, 1985]).

GENESIS RABBATI, Midrashic anthology on Genesis composed by Moshe ha-Darshan of Narbonne (11th cent.), or at least emanating from his school. The existing text may be an abridgment of a more extensive anthology by Moshe ha-Darshan. It draws heavily on Genesis Rabbah but also makes abundant use of the Mishnah, Talmud (primarily Bavli), Midrash Rabbah, Tanḥuma'-Yelammedenu, Pesiqta', and Pirḳei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer, among other works. Moreover, embedded in the Midrashic compilations are elements culled from apocryphal literature, such as Jubilees, Enoch, and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (which apparently Moshe read in an improved Hebrew version). Subsequently, medieval authorities, such as Rashi and Nathan ben Yehiel of Rome (author of the Arukh*), cited it extensively. The work was published in Jerusalem in 1940 by Hanokh Albeck from the only known manuscript. It was mentioned and quoted by the thirteenth-century Spanish Dominican Raymund Martini as Midrash Be-Re'shit Rabba' Major.

GENETICS. The first reference to heredity may be in the biblical passage in which Jacob is granted a vision about "he-goats which leaped upon the flock [and] were streaked, speckled, and grizzled" (Gn. 31.10). He requests his wages in the form of speckled young, presumably because he had noticed how this characteristic was transferred from the parents to their offspring. The Talmud rules that a man may not marry a woman from a leprous or epileptic family for fear that these diseases will be passed on to their offspring (Yev. 64b). Marriage between spouses possessing diverse physical characteristics is encouraged (Bekh. 45b), and while marriages between uncles and nieces are approved (Yev. 63a), later authorities frowned upon this practice.

GENIZAH (גִּנְזָה; storing), a hiding place or storeroom, usually connected with a synagogue, for the depositing of worn-out sacred books and sacred objects, such as tefillin*, which must not be destroyed according to Jewish law. It is also the place for storing books considered heretical but which contain the name of God and hence are too sacred to be burned. Present-day Orthodox custom is to give cemetery burial to all such documents, which are accumulated in a special place set aside in the synagogue. Reference is made in the Talmud to

R. Gamli'el's placing an Aramaic translation of the Book of Job, considered improper at the time, under the pillars of the building on the Temple mount. During the Middle Ages, a room was set aside in almost every synagogue as a genizah for old or imperfect books or ritual objects. Such synagogue hiding places for sacred works have often provided later generations with precious pages of books considered lost. The most famous such genizah is that discovered in the synagogue of Fostat, in Cairo (built in 882), which comprised two hundred thousand fragments, including part of the lost Hebrew version of Ben Sira (see WISDOM OF BEN SIRA) and other lost Hebrew works; extracts from *Aquila's Greek translation of the Bible; early Masoretic documents throwing light on Palestinian and Babylonian vocalization; the Zadokite fragments, which portray a halakhic system with affinities both to the Pharisaic tradition and to that of the Judean Desert sect (see DAMASCUS DOCUMENT); variant text readings of the Mishnah and Talmud; ancient liturgies and synagogue poetry from almost all places of known Jewish settlement at the time; works of lexicography; early mystical treatises; as well as miscellaneous secular documents and letters, many of which are extremely valuable as historical sources. The oldest known work in Yiddish (14th cent.) was also found in this genizah. The finds in the Cairo Genizah have thrown much new light on the history of the gaonate, the *Karaites, and the conditions of Jews in Erets Yisra'el and Egypt between 640 and 1100. A new kind of genizah has come to light more recently with the discovery of the *Dead Sea Scrolls.

GENTILES (from Lat. geni or genites [family nation]), the common English translation for the Hebrew nokhri or goy, that is, members of non-Jewish nations. A Jew is a person either born of a Jewish mother (the Reform movement has stated a Jewish parent of either sex) or who has accepted the Jewish faith by undergoing conversion; all others are gentiles. In Jewish law, gentiles are divided into different categories depending on their acceptance of various basic standards of conduct; of these divisions and subdivisions, the most important are akkum (a word made up of the initial letters of the Hebrew phrase for "a worshiper of stars and planets"—that is, an idolater or pagan) and those who have abandoned idolatry and accepted the belief in one God. According to rabbinic opinion ('A. Z. 64b) the latter type alone—that is, those who accept the seven *Noahic laws—can qualify for the status of a ger toshav (resident stranger) with defined rights in the community. The rabbis said "the pious of all the nations of the world have a share in the world to come," and these are identified by Maimonides as those who accept Noahic laws as divine revelation. As a result of this distinction, the extremely severe laws applying to heathens and idolaters in the Bible and Talmud are not held to apply to Christians or Muslims. Another consideration, however, came into play that deleteriously affected the relationship between Jews and gentiles. In their determined efforts to prevent assimilation and loss of identity as a small minority in the midst of a hostile majority, the rabbis deliberately set up barriers for the explicit purpose of preventing social intercourse with gentiles that could lead, among other things, to *intermarriage. The injunction in Deuteronomy 7.2–4, originally limited specifically to the seven Canaanite nations who inhabited Erets Yisra'el, was extended to include all gentiles, and decrees were enacted to erect barriers against this danger (see HUQQAT HA-GOYIM). The partaking of meals with gentiles was forbidden, even when it did not infringe the dietary laws. Food cooked by gentiles was banned ('A. Z. 2.6), and the prohibition sometimes extended even to bread and oil. The prohibition against "non-Jewish wine," originally of a strictly ritual nature, was maintained and extended even after the ritual motivation had lapsed, for the purpose of minimizing Jewish–gentile conviviality. The modern period, starting with the Emancipation, has witnessed a revolution in relations between Jews and gentiles. Having emerged from ghetto conditions, Jews maintain close everyday contacts with gentiles; on one level, this has brought about the tendency to *assimilation; on another, it has encouraged a more liberal approach to gentiles from the religious aspect, including interfaith activities (see INTERFAITH RELATIONS).

GER (גֵּר; sojourner, i.e., in a strange land), originally meaning a stranger dwelling in Erets Yisra'el (cf. Lv. 19.33–34), subsequently came to signify a convert to Judaism. Rabbinic law distinguished between the ger toshav (resident sojourner), who has renounced paganism and observes the seven *Noahic laws, and the ger tsedeq, the full "proselyte of righteousness," who is considered a Jew in every respect. GER, the Yiddish name (Heb. Gur) of the Polish town Góra Kalwaria, near Warsaw, and seat of a Hasidic dynasty established in 1859. The Ger Hasidim represented the largest Hasidic group in central Poland from the late nineteenth century until the destruction of Polish Jewry during World War II. The dynasty was founded by Yitshaq Me'ir Rothenberg Alter (1799–1866), a follower of R. *Menaḥem Mendel of Kotsk. Rabbi Yitshaq Me'ir was well known as a Talmudist and is often referred to by the title of his work, Hiddushei ha-Rim (Warsaw, 1875–1891). He was succeeded by his grandson R. Yehudah Leib Alter (1847–1904), one of the most creative and original of the later Hasidic masters. His five-volume Sefat Emet (Piotrków-Kraków, 1905–1908) is still widely studied within Ger Hasidic circles and beyond. The third leader of Ger, R. Avraham Mordekhai Alter (1866–1948) was a key figure in the founding of *Agudat Israel and in the leadership of Polish Jewry during the period between the two world wars. He managed to escape the Holocaust and to reestablish the court of Ger in Jerusalem, where it continues to flourish.

GERIM, minor tractate, consisting of four chapters, compiled (probably in Palestine) during the period of the ge'onim, dealing with the laws regarding *proselytes. In order to convert to Judaism, the proselyte must agree to accept willingly both the persecutions and the commandments associated with Jewish peoplehood, male proselytes must be circumcised, and both male and female proselytes are subject to ritual immersion. Gerim also outlines the laws of a ger toshav (resident alien), who receives the right to dwell in Erets Yisra'el, among other privileges, after accepting certain fundamental theological and ethical principles. Gerim concludes with the admonition to treat the ger with consideration and special love and esteem.

GERIZIM, MOUNT, the highest of the hills of Ephraim; south of Nablus, the ancient Shechem. According to Deuteronomy 11.29, Gerizim was the mountain from which six of Israel's tribes were to pronounce the blessings upon the observant; Joshua carried out this ceremony immediately upon conquering the region (Jos. 8.30ff.). Gerizim is fertile and endowed with natural water sources, in contrast to its arid neighbor Mount Ebal, which was designated for the curse. When the *Samaritans were denied participation in the building of the Second Temple, they built their own sanctuary on Gerizim, which was eventually destroyed by John Hyrcanus in 129 BCE. Gerizim remains the focal point in the ritual of the Samaritans who call it "the blessed mountain" and face in its direction when praying. The existence of the shrine on Mount Gerizim was a serious source of disagreement between the Jews and the Samaritans, who denied the sanctity of Jerusalem and refer to the sanctity of Gerizim at the end of their text of the Ten Commandments. Even after the destruction of the shrine, the Samaritans continued to observe their festivals on the mountain. Today the entire congregation dwells on the slopes during the Pesah season, when a paschal lamb is still sacrificed.

GEROUSIA (Gr.; council of elders). In the Roman period, the affairs of many Jewish communities in the empire—including Erets Yisra'el—were conducted by councils of elders. The gerousia of Jerusalem was headed by the high priest. Those chosen for the gerousia were selected for their learning and piety and were not necessarily old. Josephus applies this term to the seventy elders who were chosen to aid Moses (Antiquities of the Jews 4.8.14).

GERSHOM BEN YEHUDAH (c.960–1028), leading halakhic authority in the Ashkenazi (Franco-German) community, surnamed Me'or ha-Golah (Light of the Diaspora). Little is known of his predecessors, and Talmudic thought in Ashkenaz effectively begins with Rabbenu Gershom, as he is usually called. It is difficult to separate his personal accomplishments from those of the Mainz school, to which he so significantly contributed. The commentary that bears his name, and which underlies the more famous commentary by *Rashi, was probably a multigenerational product of his school. Although many of the ordinances regulating Jewish life in Europe, such as the prohibition against polygamy and the requirement of mutual consent to a divorce, bear his name, some possibly antedate him and others clearly postdate him by centuries. Those who violated these regulations were subject to excommunication; hence, they were known as herem (ban) of Rabbenu Gershom. His exegetical activities encompassed both explication de texte and the determination of correct readings. Attaching great importance to textual accuracy, he personally transcribed many of the classic texts, copies of which are cited authoritatively by his successors. Communally active, he wrote numerous responsa. At the same time, he composed liturgical poems and commented upon the liturgical works of his predecessors. Little is known of his personal life. He married a widow, Bona, the daughter of David (a copy of their marriage contract has survived), and had two children. Tradition has it that one son converted to Christianity, and R. Gershom went into mourning for him.

GERUSHIN (Aram.; גְּרֻשִׁין; driving out, banishment, or expulsion), a technical term denoting *divorce. Among the kabbalists in sixteenth century Safed, gerushin also meant peregrinations undertaken for the purpose of sharing the "exile of the shekhinah*" and gaining mystical illumination. The practice was cultivated especially by the circle of Mosheh ben Ya'aqov *Cordovero and Shelomoh *Alkabez, who wrote a description of these travels to the tombs of saints and of the illuminations experienced.

GE'ULLAH (גְּעֻלָּה; Redemption), the name of various benedictions in the liturgy: one of the petitions in the weekday *Amidah; a benediction following the *Shema' in the *Shaharit and *Ma'ariv prayers; and the benediction concluding the first part of the *Haggadah of Pesah, which gives thanks for the redemption from Egypt. It expresses the central Jewish dogma of God's involvement in history. The Ge'ullah in the 'Amidah may be understood as a prayer for redemption not in the messianic sense but for deliverance from hardships and the troubles of the individual. The Talmud Bavli (Pes. 117b) rules that the Ge'ullah in the 'Amidah is to be concluded in the present tense ("... who redeems [or, the redeemer of] Israel"), but the Ge'ullah in the Shema' in the past ("... who has redeemed Israel"). This distinction was not made universally. In the old Palestinian rite the Ge'ullah after the Shema' was concluded "... the Rock of Israel and its Redeemer." Moreover, in the Ge'ullah of Pesah eve, a petition for future redemption was inserted by R.Aqiva' ben Yosef, and in the Ge'ullah after the Shema', messianic prayers have been added in a variety of forms, mostly in piyyut style (see EMET VE-EMUNAH AND EMET VE-YATSV). This shows that, at least according to the Palestinian tradition, the main topic of the benediction was the possibility of redemption without any special distinction between past, present, and future. Poetic embellishments composed for insertion into the Ge'ullah of the Shema', especially on festivals, are also known as Ge'ullah.

GEZERAH (גְּזֵרָה; decree), legal term paired with taqqanah* referring to a halakhic directive that is not derived from scriptures or from previous legal decisions. It generally refers to a directive that obstructs a prohibited action, while a taqqanah calls for positive behavior. The power to make such decrees is derived for the former from Leviticus 18.30; for the latter, from Deuteronomy 17.11 or 30.7. Gezerah is also applied to a divine command for which no reason is apparent (e.g., the *red heifer; cf. Nm. Rab. 19.4). In nonlegal usage, the term came to mean an evil or anti-Jewish decree and, by extension, anti-Jewish persecutions and pogroms.

GHETTO, section of a town enclosed by a separate wall and designated by law as an exclusive living quarter for the Jews (as distinct from a section chosen by Jews because of their preference for living together for religious, social, and security reasons). The term most probably derives from the name of the Jewish quarter established near a foundry in Venice in 1516. In spite of the degradation, overpopulation, and other dangers, Jewish life in the ghetto had its positive aspects, and there were many Jewish authorities who dreaded the demolition of its walls. In the enforced seclusion of the ghetto, the precepts of Judaism could be inculcated and observed with little or no interference from without, and the close communion among ghetto inhabitants fostered a highly developed morality. Life in the ghetto was regulated by Jewish law, including Jewish civil law; the age-old prohibition against taking one's lawsuits to a non-Jewish court could be and was rigidly enforced. As a result, a large section of hoshen mishpat (civil law), which was otherwise largely inoperative in the Diaspora, was fostered and applied.

GIANTS. Mythological giants rarely, if ever, occur in the Bible, though the descendants of the sons of God (Gen. 6.1–4) may have been such. Anaqim*, usually translated "giants," are mentioned among the inhabitants of Palestine and must have impressed the Israelites by their physical stature (cf. Nm. 13.22, 13.28, 13.32–33). The two giants whose measurements are specified in the Bible are Og of Bashan (Dr. 3.11) and Goliath (I Sm. 17.4).

GIBEONITES. See NETHINIM.

GIDEON (c.12th cent. BCE), one of the judges of Israel; son of Joash the Abiezerite from the tribe of Manasseh and the town of Ophrah (Jgs. 6–8); also called Jerubbaal. Gideon coordinated a successful effort to drive marauding Midianites, Amalekites, and other eastern raiders from the west bank of the Jordan River. Later he had the Ephraimites block the Jordan River crossings, trap the Midianites, and annihilate them. Gideon diplomatically averted a potential civil war by placating the Ephraimites, who resented not being invited to join the original coalition of Naphtalites, Asherites, and Manassehites. He then pursued the remaining fugitives to the edge of the eastern desert, where he captured two Midianite princes, whom he eventually killed. On returning, he sacked Succoth and Peniel, Israelite cities on the east bank of the Jordan, for refusing to provide sustenance during the pursuit (Jgs. 7.15–8.21).

Gideon was invited to become the first ruler of Israel, but he declined, proclaiming instead, "I shall not rule over you, nor shall my son rule over you; the Lord alone shall rule over you." Nevertheless he continued to wield great economic and political power and named one of his sons *Abimelech (My Father Is King; Jgs. 8.22–31).

Despite destroying an altar to Baal, hewing Asherah's grove, and using the remains to dedicate an altar to YHWH, Gideon later instituted idolatrous worship involving an *ephod (Jgs. 6.25–27, 8.24–27).

GID HA-NASHEH (גִּיד הַנָּשֶׁה; sciatic nerve), a nerve that runs the length of a mammal's leg, which Jews are forbidden to eat. The prohibition on its consumption is derived from the biblical passage that describes Jacob's fight with a messenger or angel: "A stranger fought with him until before daybreak. When the stranger saw that he was unable to win, he touched Jacob's upper thigh and his hip became dislocated in the struggle . . . As a result of this incident, the children of Israel are forbidden to eat the sciatic nerve that runs from the hip down the leg" (Gn. 32.25ff.). A more complete discussion of the rules related to the sciatic nerve appears in Hullin 89b and in the Shulḥan 'Arukh, Yoreh De'ah 65.5. Essentially, the biblical prohibition applies to both hind legs of kosher mammals. The prohibition does not extend to birds because they do not have hips. The sages prohibited eating the area directly above or below the sciatic nerve lest one accidentally eat the nerve itself.

GIFT, the transference to another of the rights enjoyed in a particular object or piece of property. Even though a gift is without payment, the laws of *sale apply. Such transfer becomes legally valid only when a qinyan (see ACQUISITION) has been effected. A verbal promise (except in the case of heqdes*) is not legally binding. An exception is made in the case of a dying person, whose gift is valid even without a qinyan. A gift may be given for a limited period of time, after which it reverts to the owner. It may also be subject to other conditions. The sending of gifts to friends forms part of the celebration of Purim. See also CHARITY; PRIESTLY PRIVILEGES.

GIKATILLA, YOSEF BEN AVRAHAM (1248–c.1325), one of the most influential kabbalists during the period in which the Kabbalah reached its peak in medieval Spain. He was born in Castile and lived for many years in Segovia. His first teacher in Kabbalah was Avraham ben Shemu'el *Abulafia, and Gikatilla's early writings reflect the teachings of the Abulafia school, especially his Ginnat Egoz, devoted to the analysis of the Tetragrammaton and the Hebrew alphabet. Later, however, his views changed, and he joined R.*Mosheh de León's school. Gikatilla's later writings are among the clearest and most profound presentations of the system of the ten divine hypostases, the sefirot (which do not play a part in Abulafia's Kabbalah), and include Sha'arei Orah and Sha'arei Tsedek, each describing the particular characteristics of the sefirot and their inner relationships. In Sha'arei Orah Gikatilla also defined the nature of kabbalistic symbolism and the relationship between the supreme Godhead and the sefirot (he viewed the first sefirah as identical with the Godhead). Gershom Scholem discovered some evidence suggesting that Gikatilla participated in the authorship of the Zohar with R. Mosheh de León, but the extent of this is not clear.

GILGAL, name of several places of religious significance in ancient Palestine; possibly marked originally by a heap (Heb. gal) of stones (cf. Gn. 31.46–47): (1) biblical site west of the Jordan, where Joshua set up twelve stones commemorating the Israelites crossing the river and where he circumcised the people (Jos. 4–5) and where Samuel judged the people and proclaimed Saul king (1 Sm. 11); (2) site near Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal (Dt. 11.29–30); (3) site visited by Elijah and Elisha (2 Kgs. 2.1–2, 4.38–44); (4) site that is the residence of a Canaanite king (Jos. 12.23).

GIMATRIYYAH (גימטריא; from Gr. geōmetria), the calculation of the numerical value of Hebrew words and the search for other words or phrases of equal value. The system was known in Babylonia and elsewhere and was apparently first used in Jewish circles during the Second Temple period. Since every Hebrew letter (as in some other alphabets) has a numerical value, words and phrases could be added to make sums. Gimatriyyah as a method of exegesis is mentioned in the baraiyta' of R. Eli'ezer ben Yosei ha-Galili on the "thirty-two hermeneutical rules" (see HERMENEUTICS) and was much used for aggadic and homiletical purposes; for example, Jacob's words to his sons, "go down (redu) to Egypt" (Gen. 42.2), are said to have initiated the Israelites' stay of 210 years in that country (the numerical value of raish, dalet, and vav equals 210). While many scholars were critical of gimatriyyah or took it as a kind of homiletical game, others considered it an important avenue to the hidden or implied meanings of scripture. Certain authorities, such as Moses Nahmanides, frowned on its overuse. Under the influence of letter mysticism, which played an important part in esoteric tradition, gimatriyyah became a major feature of kabbalistic exposition as well as of magical practice (e.g., in *amulets). Gimatriyyah was not common in the Zohar and early Spanish Kabbalah but entered kabbalistic thought in the late thirteenth century under the influence of the Ḥasidei Ashkenaz, who influenced its usage in the formulation of halakhah. Not all kabbalists used gimatriyyah, but for some it was a major aspect of their writing, and it was a favorite device of North African rabbis. Among followers of *Shabbetai Tsevi and in some Hasidic circles, it was a favorite tool of interpretation.

GINZBERG, LOUIS (1873–1953), Talmudic and rabbinic scholar. Born in Kovno, Lithuania, Ginzberg attended the Lithuanian yeshivot of Slobodka and Tels, then studied history, philosophy, and ancient Near Eastern languages at the universities of Berlin, Strasbourg, and Heidelberg. In 1899 he immigrated to the United States, where he became an editor of the rabbinic section of the Jewish Encyclopedia in 1900; his many entries in that work are still regarded as authoritative. From 1903 to 1952, he taught Talmud at the *Jewish Theological Seminary of America. He was also a cofounder of the American Academy of Jewish Research. The major thrust of Ginzberg's scholarship focused on the origins of aggadah, halakhah, and geonic literature. His introductions, commentaries, and extended analyses of various texts opened scholarly and popular access to many basic works, notably the Talmud Yerushalmi, on which he wrote a commentary (3 vols. [1941]), and texts from the Cairo Genizah. In his The Legends of the Jews (7 vols. [Philadelphia, 1909–1938]), Ginzberg analyzed the origin and development of the legend in Midrashic literature by interweaving rabbinic, Hellenistic, early Christian, kabbalistic, and other textual sources.

GITTIN (גיטין; Bills of Divorce), tractate in Mishnah order Nashim, consisting of nine chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and in both Talmuds, dealing with laws pertaining to *divorce. The biblical provision that divorce be effected by means of a get (bill of divorce; Dt. 24.1) is analyzed and expanded in exacting detail. Gittin stresses the unique nature of the get vis-à-vis other legal documents. Strict provisions govern all aspects of writing and delivering the get. Its writing must be explicitly authorized by the husband, and the get must sever entirely any relationship between husband and wife; hence, the husband may not attach conditions to the divorce that would restrict the woman's freedom after the divorce is effected.

The conditions of life in the Diaspora and Roman domination of Erets Yisra'el left their imprint on Gittin. The tractate regulates divorce proceedings for a woman whose husband has sent her a get from a Diaspora community far removed from the halakhic institutions in Palestine. Provisions are made for witnesses who sign their names in Greek and for dating the get in accordance with the reign of the Roman emperor.

The tractate in the Talmud Bavli was translated into English by Maurice Simon in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1936).

GIVING OF THE TORAH (Heb. mattan Torah), the central event in the establishment of the covenant between God and the Israelite people, in the form of a body of divinely revealed legislation (religious, moral, criminal, and civil), endowing them with their distinct way of life; hence, also the close association of the concepts of *Torah and *halakhah. Though some laws are said in the Bible to have been given to the Israelites before arriving at Sinai (the Sabbath command, given in the wilderness; the precepts concerning the Pesah sacrifice, in Egypt) and even to the patriarchs (the command of circumcision), the full corpus of laws was given by God through the mediation of Moses at Mount Sinai. According to the biblical account, the giving of the law took place in stages. It began with a public theophany, at which God spoke to the entire people, proclaiming to them a sampling of the laws to be given subsequently (Ex. 19–20;

Dt. 5; see TEN COMMANDMENTS). Next, Moses ascended Sinai and received a body of legislation to be communicated to the people (Ex. 20–24). After he did so and the laws were committed to writing (see COVENANT, BOOK OF THE), a covenant ceremony was performed, and the people reaffirmed their commitment to the divine command. Following this, Moses reascended the mountain to receive the tablets of the Law. On this occasion Moses was given detailed instructions for the construction of a portable shrine (Ex. 25–30; see TABERNACLE) that would serve as a meeting place for God and Moses for the purpose of giving additional laws (Ex. 25.22). Moses was also given laws pertaining to the ritual to be performed at the shrine. Moses' final ascent to the mountaintop, for the purpose of having the second set of tablets inscribed by God, provided another occasion for God to communicate further laws to him (Ex. 34). Once the Tabernacle was erected, the prolonged process of continuous law-giving commenced. On regular occasions, God spoke to Moses from the Holy of Holies, each time conveying to him the legislation pertaining to a specific topic. Each time, Moses verbally transmitted to the entire people what he had been commanded. This process continued even after the Israelites left Mount Sinai, extending into the forty years of wandering in the wilderness (Lv. and Nm.). In a final stage right before his death, and just prior to the entry into Canaan, Moses assembled the entire people and in a lengthy address conveyed to them a full body of legislation that was communicated to him by God at Sinai but that he had not yet disclosed to them (Dt. 5.20–26.19). He then committed the entire text to writing and deposited the Law with the Levites (Dt. 31). Thus, the greater part of Exodus 20 through Deuteronomy 26 consists of a series of laws that together make up "the Torah" in the strict sense of the word.

Rabbinic tradition tended to concentrate on the first phase—the epiphany at Sinai—in which the entire people participated (Ber. 58a). This event is described in superlative terms: the entire universe participated, generations unborn were present, and each individual heard the voice of God in a way suited to his or her own intellect.

The Bible mentions no festival in commemoration of the giving of the Law, because in the biblical view, it was a protracted process and could not be restricted to a single date. Later tradition, however, reckoned the theophany at Sinai to have taken place on 6 (or 7) Sivan. Thus *Shavu'ot, originally the wheat harvest and first-fruits festival (Lv. 23.9–14), became the festival of the giving of the Law. See also ORAL LAW; WRITTEN LAW.

GNOSTICISM (from Gk. gnōsis [knowledge]), a term describing the ideas and mystical theories—usually confined to a limited circle of initiates—of a number of sects that arose both within and around Judaism, Christianity, and paganism in the Roman world during the first and second centuries. The beginnings of gnosticism, however, seem to be earlier, and some scholars suggest that it originated in Jewish or Samaritan circles influenced by certain oriental ideas. While gnostic sects differed widely from each other in style of behavior and in theories, most shared a number of beliefs. Gnosticism distinguished between the "Supreme Divine Being" and the "Demiurge," a secondary power responsible for creation and involved in the material world. *Dualism—the belief that the world is ruled by two opposing principles—divided the heavenly powers into pairs—male and female, left and right, and so on; the "Supreme First Principle" was conceived as an all-good power, whereas the "Creator-Demiurge" was considered a lower, fallen, and imperfect being. Some Christian Gnostics, for example, Marcion, identified the "First Principle" with the New Testament "God of love," and the "Creator-God" with the Old Testament Law, which they labeled as evil. In contrast to the biblical tradition, which regarded creation as essentially good (Gen. 1.31), gnosticism considered the material universe the result of a primordial fall from a state of pure, that is, spiritual, being. The soul, too, is thought to be in exile in the lower and basically evil material world, into which it has fallen and from which it can be redeemed and returned to its celestial home by means of gnōsis, that is, secret knowledge. The sense of irreconcilable conflict between the sphere of pneuma (spirit) and the material world of creation made for some affinities between gnosticism and Neoplatonic philosophy. Some of the gnostic sects demonstrated their liberation from the material world (of which morals and the law form part) and the spiritual freedom that they had attained by theoretical and practical antinomianism. The early church combated the Christian forms of gnosticism as a dangerous heresy. The Jewish struggle against gnosticism is reflected in liturgical and other regulations directed against the minim. However, in spite of its struggle against gnostic heresy, Judaism, and Jewish mysticism in particular (see HEIKHALOT; MA'ASEH MERKAVAH), absorbed certain gnostic themes and ideas. Tendencies of a gnostic character also appeared in medieval Kabbalah, for example in the *Zohar and particularly in the esoteric doctrines of Yitsḥaq *Luria.

GOD, the Supreme Being; the Creator of the universe; the Judge and Ruler of history; the Supreme Lawgiver and object of the religious attitudes of love, awe, reverence, obedience, and worship. The existence of God is presupposed in the Bible from the very first sentence, and no attempt is made to prove it. His power and love are immediately experienced. He is conceived not in philosophical or abstract terms, such as "First Cause," but in imaginative pictorial ideas, such as father, shepherd, judge, and king. Although ideas of God were present in the civilization in which the Bible came into being, the Israelite conception is unique. All others were based on mythological ideas, so that the gods were conceived to be subject to the laws of natural necessity. In the biblical idea of God, the Supreme Being has no mythological quality whatsoever. He has no body, no relative, no human needs. He is the Sovereign Lord of nature, which is completely dependent on him. There is no force that is independent of his sovereign will and does not do his bidding. He is completely independent, and there are no other divine beings to compete with him for lordship. These notions may have developed in stages, but ultimately they gave rise to the pure *monotheism of the Bible and later literature. There is a constant battle against *idolatry, which is the substitution of some nonabsolute force or entity for the Supreme God of the Bible. God and the world are distinct. He is the Creator of the world, which is completely subject to his will. Nature is orderly and regular, not because of any inherent law but because the Creator maintains that order under his covenant with creation. Man experiences the presence and power of God in seemingly contradictory ways. He is majestic, yet kind and compassionate. He punishes those who do wrong, yet he is quick to forgive. He is transcendent, beyond anything in the world, yet his wisdom is the source of human understanding. There is a special relationship between God and Israel. Israel is God's chosen people, not because of any special merit that the people of Israel possess, but because of God's own act of grace. Through God's relations to his people, his relationship to the world is also exhibited. Israel is to be God's witness. When Israel falls away from its task of being God's people, he sends prophets to admonish and chastise it. Through Israel, the rest of mankind will be brought to recognize God's sovereignty. Thus, Israel is the instrument of *redemption. Another aspect of God's love for Israel is his activity as a lawgiver to his people. Through *revelation God relates himself to man. Under the covenant of the Law (Torah) Israel is called to be a holy nation. The God of the Bible, however, is not a national God; he is the Lord of all nations. The fate of one people mirrors the universal facts of his kingship and fatherhood. His power and presence are experienced through great historical events like the *Exodus from Egypt. Humanity has been given the freedom to obey or to defy God. When individuals disobey, God metes out his *justice. In the end of days (see MESSIAH), people will possess a new heart and all the disharmonies of history will be banished. Thus, three aspects of God's relationship to the world are manifest in the Bible. Through *creation God calls the world into being; through revelation God speaks to humanity; and through redemption God will sanctify all existence.

Post-biblical literature reflects the beginning of philosophic influence on the formulation of the God idea in Judaism. This influence came by way of the Greek philosophers, whose view of God was abstract and impersonal. The earliest traces of philosophic formulations in speaking of God are found in the Apocrypha (see APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA). The books originating in Palestine deal with the concept of God in substantially traditional terms. Differences stem from the terminology rather than the content of the ideas. In the Alexandrine Apocrypha some change of conception is evident, but even these include works whose theology is a restatement of biblical teachings. In the *Targum and *Septuagint translation of the biblical books there are evidences of an attempt to avoid *anthropomorphism. The writings of *Philo reveal a consistent effort to reinterpret the biblical view of God in philosophic traditions. These are the first attempts to harmonize the biblical and Greek philosophical traditions. Philo's synthesis exerted far-reaching effects on the subsequent history of *philosophy and theology in the West. Philo placed great stress on God's complete transcendence and posited the existence of intermediaries through which God influences creation. Of special importance is the *Logos. The personal, direct relationship between God and man was stressed in the Talmudic and Midrashic literature. Although the rabbis use circumlocutions for God in order to increase respect for his holy name (see GOD, NAMES OF), they brought the divine near to even the humblest heart. They would speak of God as suffering together with his children, weeping over the destruction of the Temple, and rejoicing over piety and good works, and they would even describe him as taking part in learned discussions or putting on *tefillin. The rabbis were essentially carrying on the prophetic concept of God, but they expressed themselves in a more popular and picturesque way. As a reaction to the teachings of heretical sects and *Christianity, the rabbis laid great stress on the unity of God. Thus, the *Shema' was considered the most important confession of faith, and it was incumbent on all Jews to recite it twice daily. The rabbis were especially careful to repudiate any suggestion that there were two powers (dualism) and insisted that God has no father, son, or brother (Dt. Rab. 2). Of special importance in rabbinic literature is God's role as the lawgiver. The Torah, which is God's gift to Israel, is highly exalted and even described as the purpose and instrument of creation. It is through the study of the Torah that individuals know the will of God. The best source for the study of rabbinic theology is the *liturgy, which contains all the basic teachings of the rabbis concerning the divine being.

Medieval Jewish thought developed under the influence of the rediscovery and development of Greek philosophy by the Arabs. Jewish theologians reinterpreted their faith in the light of the new philosophy, especially *Neoplatonism and *Aristotelianism. The philosophers of the Middle Ages were particularly concerned with such problems as the attributes of God (see GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF), the relation between divine foreknowledge and human freedom, and the presence of evil in the world (see GOOD AND EVIL). It was their aim to demonstrate that the biblical and Talmudic teachings about God were in conformity with rational thinking. Thus, they held that the existence of God could be logically proved. Since the Creator is the cause of all bodies, he himself must be beyond all matter. He is free of all human and natural properties. The absolute unity of God implies the spiritual nature of his essence. For were he not one, he would be many, and multiplicity is characteristic of corporeality; his oneness thus implies his incorporeality. Although God is abstract and transcendent, he is not inactive. He reveals himself to his prophets and directs the affairs of creation. Direct biblical expression about God, however, should be understood in a metaphorical sense. Jewish medieval philosophy tended generally to deny the possibility of saying anything valid about the essence of God, who is conceived as utterly transcendent to his creation and to human understanding. Only his existence could be asserted, along with certain qualities or attributes. The greatest medieval Jewish philosopher, Moses *Maimonides, was also the most extreme in stressing God's transcendence. He denied that humans had the capacity to say anything meaningful about God. The existence of God, it was true, could be proved. But the meaning and nature of this existence were beyond human comprehension. Everything said about God is allegorical, and all positive ways of describing him clothe essentially negative statements. Thus, when one says that God exists, the only real meaning of the statement is that his nonexistence is unthinkable. Maimonides is the exponent of the so-called "negative theology" that was then developed in other directions by the mystics. Other thinkers, like *Yehudah ha-Levi, felt the aridity of the abstract formulations of God's nature and stressed the experience of the divine action in history, especially in the crucial events in the annals of Israel. A bold solution of the problem of God's power and foreknowledge, and an individual's free will, is offered by Avraham *ibn Daud. He concluded that God restricts his omniscience and omnipotence deliberately so as to allow people freedom of choice. Another attempt to overcome the tension between the transcendent, absolutely unique God of philosophy and the vital, real, and dynamic God of religious experience was made in the medieval kabbalistic literature, which taught the doctrine of the two aspects of the Godhead: the infinite, inaccessible "mystery of hiddenness" (see EIN SOF) and the ten *sefirot of divine manifestation. This profound and audacious conception often came under criticism for harboring the seeds of heretical deviations and, particularly, for coming dangerously close to polytheism.

Contemporary Jewish philosophy reflects the fundamental change in outlook that characterizes modern thought in general. Whereas medieval speculation was concerned with harmonizing revelation and reason (both elements being taken as authoritative), the period of the Enlightenment (see HASKALAH) called the authority of revelation into question. The Jewish religion must be authenticated as a manifestation of the human spirit and be shown as significant within the larger framework of thought, be it conceived as universal reason (Hegel), the dialectic of the mind (Kant), or human existence as such (*existentialism). The first significant attack on the Jewish conception of God was made by Baruch *Spinoza, who denied the medieval attempt to derive the material world from a god who is wholly transcendent to it and propounded a thoroughgoing *pantheism. Moses *Mendelssohn taught that the basic ideas of religion—the existence of a personal God and the immortality of the individual soul—were universal possessions of humankind because of their reasonableness. They need not wait for revelation to be known, since they were manifest at all times and everywhere. Mendelssohn summed up his view in his famous phrase: "Judaism is not a revealed religion, but a revealed law." The rise of Kantianism accentuated the division between theoretical and practical reason. The proofs that Kant adduced to destroy rational theology led to the idea that religion was dependent on ethics and fundamentally an expression of practical reason. Hermann *Cohen produced the most impressive synthesis between Kantianism and Judaism. To him the idea of God is indispensable both to theoretical and to practical reason. It establishes the necessary link between the two spheres by ensuring the final realization of man's moral destiny within the natural order of being. The philosophy of Franz *Rosenzweig is an elaboration of Schelling's positive philosophy combined with modern existentialism. God, humanity, and the world are irreducible entities. The task of philosophy is to interpret the interrelation between God, humanity, and the world. God and people are united in and through speech. The term "speaking" as used by Rosenzweig means "speaking to a person in all earnestness and devotion." God speaks to humanity through revelation. He also calls the world into being through creation. This philosophy plays an important part in the thought of Martin *Buber. God cannot be known in his essence. He can only be addressed, when one turns to him in full devotion, in the full power of an "I" addressing a "Thou." Mordecai Menahem *Kaplan was influenced by naturalism. God is conceived as a "force" or a "power" within the physical universe that makes for humanity's *salvation. Hasidic mysticism, which was based largely on kabbalistic thought, at times came close to pantheism but generally remained orthodox.

GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF. In the history of philosophy, discussions of attributes almost always concern the nature of *God. Attributes are permanent qualities of a substance that determine its nature, and they generally stand in contrast to accidents, the absence of which would in no way detract from the nature of a thing. In traditional Jewish texts like the Bible and the prayer book, God's attributes are set forth in unquestioned terms; that is, the conception of God as omnipotent, omniscient, eternal, and so on is never analyzed. The attributes merely attest to the sense of human dependence on a power that compels reverence and obedience. When they began to be analyzed, however, God's attributes became philosophical and theological issues with implications for the understanding of the nature of God, his unity, and his transcendence. Jewish philosophers beginning with *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on (9th cent.) have dealt with the difficult problem of how to assert anything positive about God. If it is assumed, as by most Jewish philosophers, that one cannot know what God is like and that God's absolutely transcendent nature cannot in any way be said to resemble a man's or a woman's nature or to be expressible in human terms, then it becomes impossible to talk meaningfully about God's attributes. Indeed, Gersonides (*Levi ben Gershom [14th cent.]) attacked the prevailing Maimonidean view that there is nothing in God's attributes susceptible to human grasp. Moses *Maimonides (12th cent.) had declared that assertions about God's thinking can have no real cognitive significance, since God thinks in a way unknown to humankind. This led Gersonides to the conclusion that if such be the case, a person cannot legitimately assert anything about God's attributes. To escape this conclusion, he challenged the premise and insisted that divine and human attributes were distinct merely in the measure of their perfection, not in their essence. This solution of Gersonides, however, was not generally accepted by medieval Jewish philosophers. The whole trend of Jewish philosophy was to seek a definition of God's attributes that would set them apart from any human associations. There was always the problem of finding something in God about which one could talk intelligibly; hence, the various divisions made by philosophers into those qualities that could be asserted about God and those that had to be treated obliquely. Sa'adyah, for example, denied that God possesses positive attributes except in regard to his existence, unity, power, and wisdom, which are one in fact, although not in humanity's thought about God. This objection against articulating any distinctive attributes that do not actually imply each other is respected throughout the Jewish philosophical tradition. *Bahya ben Yosef ibn Paquda' (12th cent.), in making a distinction between the essential attributes and those that describe God's actions, lists the former as his existence, unity, and eternity. He hastens to add that they are really one. Moreover, even when affirmed positively, their real meaning is to negate the possibility of God's possessing the opposite attribute. Thus, God cannot be multiple or have parts; nor can he be in time. *Yehudah ha-Levi (12th cent.) lists three groups of attributes: the active ones (those indicating God's power to affect human fate); the relative ones (in which, for example, God's blessedness is set forth); and the negative (which include the essential attribute that can be expressed only negatively). Maimonides listed various kinds of positive attributes and concluded that none of them could legitimately be asserted of God, who can be described only negatively, that is, in terms not of what he is but of what he is not. Jewish thought down to the present day has shied away from definitive statements regarding the nature of God. See also THIRTEEN ATTRIBUTES.

GOD, NAMES OF, may be either conceptual (e.g., God, Creator) or proper. The latter sort predominates in ancient literature, but the original significance of such names is not always easily determined. The choice of one name rather than another generally depends on its significance, the occasion, and the specific traditions of the user. *Bible criticism has taken the two most important biblical names of God, YHVH and Elohim, as indicative of two distinct biblical traditions. Of the two names, the Tetragrammaton, consisting of the letters yud, heh, vav, heh, is the most frequent in the Bible, and rabbinic tradition considers it the essential name of God. The name seems to be connected with the phrase ehyeh asher ehyeh (translated as "I am that I am" [Ex. 3.14]). Interpreted as denoting eternal existence, the phrase became the symbol of *monotheism. The holiest of names was never pronounced ("the Ineffable Name" [Shem ha-Meforash]), except once a year by the high priest in the Holy of Holies on Yom Kippur. According to a rabbinic tradition, once (or twice) in seven years the sages entrusted to their disciples the pronunciation of the Tetragrammaton (Qid. 71a), but the original pronunciation is now unknown; it is read as Adonai (my Lord), which was already used in the second century BCE. The combination in the Hebrew Bible of the consonants y, h, v, h and the vocalization for Adonai gave rise to the misnomer Jehovah. Yah (cf. Halleluyah) is thought to be a shortened form of YHVH. Other names of God mentioned in the Bible, but classified by the rabbis as "secondary," although historically primary, are El, Eloha, Elohim (a plural form, although used as a singular when applied to the God of Israel) with various suffixes, Shaddai (chiefly in Jb.), and Zebaoth (although the Talmud opines that the last is not a name of God but refers to the hosts of Israel of which God is the Lord). The word elohim is also found in a secular sense, referring not only to heathen gods (e.g., Ex. 20.3) but also to human judges (e.g., Ex. 22.7). The rabbis, considering the names of God as symbols of his relationship to his creatures, held that YHWH expressed his attribute of mercy (see COMPASSION), and Elohim referred to his attribute of *justice. Both the essential and secondary names of God must be written "in holiness," and once written they must not be erased. To avoid "taking the name of the Lord in vain," the custom developed of pronouncing and sometimes writing even the substitute for the Tetragrammaton, Adonai, as ha-Shem (the Name)—and, for sake of assonance, as Adoshem—and Elohim as Eloqim. Adonai is usually printed in prayer books as two yuds; the prohibition against erasure does not apply to this abbreviation.

Other names of God, which are descriptive rather than personal names and express divine attributes (such as Raḥum [Merciful]; 'Elyon [the Most High]; Shaddai [the Mighty One]), do not fall under the prohibition against erasure as they can be applied to mortals as well (Shev. 35a). According to some authorities, however (cf. Sot. 10a), the word shalom (peace) can occur as a divine name, in which case it belongs to the former category. The sanctity attached to the divine names and the prohibition of the Third Commandment against taking the name of the Lord in vain resulted in a growing disinclination to use the biblical names of God, and in the Talmudic period a series of circumlocutions evolved. The most common one, used almost exclusively in Midrashic literature, is ha-Qadosh barukh hu', "the Holy One, blessed be he," and in Aramaic Qudsha' berikh hu', sometimes expanded into "The Supreme King of kings, the Holy One, blessed be he." Next in popularity and occurring mainly in invocations, is Ribbono shel 'Olam (Master of the Universe). Also frequent and possibly early is the name ha-Maqom (the Place), probably an abbreviation of "he who dwells in this place [the Temple]" but was later interpreted more theologically, explained as "He is the space of the world but the world is not his space" (Gn. Rab. 69.9) and translated as "the Omnipresent." Ha-Raḥaman (the All-Merciful) is a Mishnaic form of the biblical Raḥum (cf. in the Birkat ha-Mazon*). Another frequent Talmudic designation is the shekhinah* (divine presence). Philosophical and kabbalistic literature added further designations that, however, were technical terms and mystical symbols (e.g., First Cause, Ein Sof*) rather than names. The medieval poets, too, coined many terms and epithets designating God. Esoteric tradition contains references to divine names composed of twelve, forty-two, and seventy-two letters, and the kabbalists considered the whole Pentateuch as a series of mystical names of God. This doctrine lent itself to the use of various combinations of Hebrew letters as powerful names of God for magical purposes, for example, in amulets*.

GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF. The possibility, the necessity, and the desirability of providing rational proofs for the existence of *God have been permanent themes of theology. The Bible takes the existence of God for granted. The heavens declare his glory (Ps. 19.1), and only a spiritually deaf churl would say "there is no God" (Ps. 14.1, 53.2), an utterance that clearly expresses an irreligious disposition rather than a philosophical position. Contact with the philosophical culture of the Hellenistic age seems to have prompted *Philo to suggest that reflection on nature and on the human soul would provide evidence for the existence of God. In the Middle Ages, theological thinking was greatly stimulated and influenced by Arabic *philosophy, and the existence of God, reason versus faith, and rational insight versus revelation became central themes of investigation. The principle of causality asserted that since nothing can exist without a cause, there must be a first cause, and the created world must have a creator who could be shown to be all-wise and omnipotent. Only God is uncaused and self-existent. The theological argument emphasized the design of the cosmic order and of its workings: there cannot be a watch without a watchmaker. The Aristotelian philosophers, who held that God's existence could be rationally proved, taught that God was beyond human comprehension. Said *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on, "If I knew him I would be he." Moses *Maimonides was the most radical in his insistence that only God's existence could be proved; positive attributes and anthropomorphisms were heresies. Others, such as Ḥasda'i ben Avraham *Crescas, rejected philosophical proofs; belief in God rested on the authority of *revelation. Even opponents of rationalist philosophy such as *Yehudah ha-Levi agreed that belief in God, though not a matter of rational proof, was not contrary to reason, even though essentially its evidence lay in experience, especially the historical experience of Israel during the Exodus and at Mount Sinai.

The modern tone for the discussion was set by Kant's demolition of the traditional medieval "proofs," and Jewish thinkers, too, have adapted their discourse. Reform theologian Kaufmann *Kohler held that for the religious consciousness God was not demonstrated by argument but was a fact of inner and outer experience. For Hermann *Cohen, God was, in Kantian style, a postulate of reason linking together logic and ethics. Franz *Rosenzweig saw God as one of three aspects of reality (the other two being the human person and the world) that could not be reduced. God for him was the affirmation of being. For Martin *Buber, God was the ultimate "thou," upon which all of our "I-Thou" relations exist. For Mordecai Menahem *Kaplan, belief in God ultimately served as an affirmation that life had value. Since Kant, the existence of God is generally a basic assumption of religious life.

GODFATHER. See SANDAQ.

GOD FEARERS, a term applied to non-Jews in ancient times who observed some of the precepts of the Torah without fully converting to Judaism. In various Greco-Roman sources, reference is made to people who fear or worship God or heaven, but determining what exactly is implied by such references is extremely difficult, especially since the same words are also applied to devout Jews and to devout non-Jews worshipping their own gods. Nevertheless the convergence of evidence from many different sources—such as rabbinic literature (with references to yir'ei shamayim [fearers of heaven], that is, non-Jews who observe some Jewish precepts), *Josephus Flavius (who in several instances refers to non-Jews who adopt Jewish practices or join the Jews "in some way"), the *New Testament (where Paul is said to have preached to "Jews and God fearers" and to have been very successful among the latter), Roman writers (such as the satirist Juvenal, who ridicules Romans who "fear the Sabbath" and abstain from pork), and Roman-period inscriptions—clearly shows that both Jews and non-Jews were aware of the attraction that some non-Jews felt toward the Jewish way of life, an attraction that regularly fell short of full conversion. The extent of Jewish faith and practices adopted by such God fearers and their treatment by the local Jewish community may have varied greatly in different places and at different times. In some cases, however, such as in the city of Aphrodisias (in present-day Turkey), where a relevant inscription has recently been found, the synagogue seems to have consisted of two groups: born Jews and proselytes, on the one hand, and non-Jewish God fearers, on the other, so that the God fearers clearly were acknowledged by the Jewish community and partly incorporated into it.

GO'EL. See REDEMPTION.

GOG AND MAGOG, the satanic powers who wage the great eschatological battle against the host of the righteous. The concept is derived from Ezekiel 38.2, where "Gog, of the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal" is set to lead a savage horde of nations from the north against Israel. He and his army, the Bible says, will be defeated by the hand of the Lord on the mountains of Israel. Though Josephus (Antiquities of the Jews 1.6.1) identifies the Magog mentioned in the table of nations in Genesis 10.2 as the progenitor of the Scythians, it is possible that this figure reflects the historical Gyges, king of Lydia. Gog and Magog also appear in the Dead Sea Scrolls and are vividly portrayed in Talmudic literature, where the war against Gog and Magog is identified with the "messianic wars" preceding the advent of the Messiah. This idea of eschatological warfare against Gog and Magog is echoed in Christian (e.g., Rv. 20.7–9) and Islamic traditions. See also ESCHATOLOGY.

GOLAH. See EXILE.

GOLDEN CALF, molten image constructed by the Israelites at the foot of Mount Sinai after leaving Egypt. After the covenant was made, following the giving of the Law, *Moses was summoned by God to return to the mountaintop to receive the tablets of the Law (Ex. 24). However when Moses remained away for forty days, the impatient Israelites began to doubt that he would return. In response to their request for a visible god to lead them, Aaron gathered earrings and other gold ornaments (which the people willingly donated) and fashioned the calf. The people proclaimed, "This is your God, O Israel, who brought you out of the land of Egypt," thus directly transgressing the order of the Ten Commandments to have no other gods but the Lord. The Israelites worshiped the calf with sacrifice, feasting, and merriment, though they called the celebration "a festival for the Lord." Meanwhile on Mount Sinai, God revealed to Moses what had happened and announced his decision to destroy Israel. Moses implored him to forbear, came down from the mountain, and catching the people in the act of frenzied calf worship, smashed the tablets of the Law to the ground, thereby effectively canceling the covenant with God. (In the ancient Near East, legal agreements were symbolically canceled by the breaking of the tablets, clay or stone, upon which they were written.) He then ground down the calf, burnt it (suggesting that the calf was made of wood plated with gold), and mixed the dust with water, which he forced the people to drink, a form of trial by ordeal. Although Moses managed to forestall God's wrath, some three thousand Israelites were punished with death, after which a new covenant was made and new tablets inscribed (Ex. 32–34; Dt. 9–10). In rabbinic tradition the tribe of Levi did not participate in the worship of the golden calf, for which they were rewarded with the priesthood. The rabbis attempted to minimize Aaron's active role in the sin. Calf images were not unusual in ancient Canaanite worship. Calves were also installed by Jeroboam I at Dan and Bethel (1 Kgs. 12.28–30); these were condemned by Hosea (Hos. 8.6, 13.2). Thus, it does not seem that the golden calf was an imitation of Egyptian practice; rather, that the biblical account is a reflection of Canaanite forms of worship encountered by the Israelites. It has been suggested that the calf was not even a representation of the deity but instead symbolized the animal upon which the deity stood. This is supported by ancient Near Eastern iconography, which often pictures the deity standing erect upon the back of a bull. Miniature bronze calves have been discovered in archeological excavations in Israel.

An innovator in the evolution of the American Orthodox synagogue in the twentieth century, Goldstein was born on New York City's Lower East Side, attended the city's public schools and Columbia University, and was ordained an Orthodox rabbi by R. Sholom E. Jaffe in 1912 before graduating from the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1913. In 1917 Goldstein became the founding rabbi of Harlem's Institutional Synagogue. This was the first Orthodox congregation consciously to integrate religious, educational, and social activities into its synagogue's life. Goldstein continued in that pulpit for the next fifty-three years, even when the congregation relocated in the 1930s and became the West Side Institutional Synagogue. GOLEM. The word golem occurs once in the Bible (Ps. 139.16) and there refers to an embryo; in Medieval Hebrew the word was used to mean formless matter but later came to refer to a robot magically created. A man made of clay was brought to life by the insertion of a slip of paper with one of the mystic names of God under his tongue. The golem would then obey the behests of his creator. Ideas concerning the golem were variously associated with the magical interpretation of the Sefer Yetsirah* and its letter mysticism and with the mystico-symbolic rituals practiced by the Hasidei Ashkenaz*. Tsevi Hirsch Ashkenazi* of Amsterdam seriously discussed whether a golem might be counted in the religious quorum of ten (Resp. no. 93), adding that his grandfather, R. Eliyyahu of Chelm, had fashioned such a creature. There was considerable fear that a golem might get out of hand (there were parallels in non-Jewish legend and fiction, from Goethe's Sorcerer's Apprentice to Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley's Frankenstein). In one version of the legend, the kabbalist creator removed the name of God from the golem, but the lifeless mass of clay fell on its maker and killed him. The golem legend has come to be associated (without historical foundation) with the famous R. Yehudah Liva' ben Betsal'el* of Prague. In Hebrew and in colloquial Yiddish the word golem designates a stupid person.

GOMBINER, AVRAHAM ABELE (c.1637–1683), Polish Talmudist and yeshivah head in Kalisz, popularly known as the Magen Avraham (Shield of Abraham) after the title of his commentary to the Shulhan 'Arukh, Oraḥ Ḥayyim* (printed in standard editions).

Gombiner's work is more of a pure commentary on the Shulhan 'Arukh than is David ben Shemu'el ha-Levi's Turei Zahav*, which is often a discussion of Ya'aqov ben Asher's Arba'ah Turim*, and Gombiner seeks to uphold the Shulhan 'Arukh over the Turim and to harmonize discrepancies between the views of Yosef Karo* and Moshe Isserles*. Although its succinctness made it difficult to understand, Magen Avraham achieved great popularity in both eastern and western Europe, particularly among the leadership of the Hasidic movement.

Gombiner also wrote Zayit Ra'anani (Dessau, 1704), a commentary on the Yalqut Shim'oni*, which included sermonica on the first part of Genesis.

GOOD AND EVIL. Reflections on good and evil pervade Jewish literature from its inception to the present. Yet, as with other complex philosophical questions, Jewish tradition offers no systematic treatment of the topic, only a vast array of sources from which the general contours of Jewish thought may be discerned.

Genesis 1 asserts unequivocally that God considered his creation "very good" (Gr. 1.31). This view and its corollary, that life is a blessing rather than a curse, is never seriously challenged. Against this background, the problem of evil is inescapable and, some would argue, irresolvable. The problem is particularly pressing in a religion that holds that the one God is not only good and benevolent but also omnipotent. The evident facts that life includes much suffering and that humans have the capacity to harm both themselves and others require explanation. On the whole, moral evil (sin and its consequences) has received more sustained attention than natural evil (natural disasters, birth defects, etc.). With respect to the former, two central themes, both biblical in origin, dominate. First, the good is defined as God's will, which is communicated through revelation, prophets, and authoritative teachers. Second, humans are endowed with free will (in rabbinic terminology, a good inclination and an evil inclination) either to obey or disobey and must suffer the consequences of their choice. These two notions lead to the view that any evil that befalls humans, collectively or individually, is a divine punishment for evil committed by them. The doctrine that the one omnipotent and benevolent God is the source of both good and evil found striking expression in the rabbinic injunction that "one should bless God for the evil that occurs just as one blesses God for the good" (Ber. 33b).

The difficulties inherent in this view, however, lead to a number of strategies for reconciling both God's goodness with the existence of evil and God's justice with life's apparent injustices. These include, but are not limited to, claims that all things are for the good, though they may not appear so (Ber. 60b); that there is an evil force, sometimes personified as Satan, who, though subservient to God, causes people to do or to experience evil (Jb. 1–2; Ber. 6a; Gn. Rab. 84.3); that the unmerited good and evil experienced in this life will be rectified in the *afterlife (Ber. 4a; Ta'an. 11a); that divine punishment is an indication of God's love and concern for the transgressor (Am. 3.2); that God causes the righteous to suffer as an "affliction of love," so that they will more intensively pursue certain virtues (Ber. 5a; B. M. 85a); that humans inherit the merits or demerits of their ancestors, and God treats them accordingly (Ber. 7a); and that the ways of God are mysterious, and humans cannot understand why the righteous and wicked fare as they do (Hb. 1.2–4; Jb. 35–42).

Efforts to formulate an adequate theory of theodicy were made by all major medieval philosophers. Maimonides defends the Aristotelian position that evil has no positive substance but is the absence, namely, the "privation," of good. He was also the first to distinguish natural evil from moral evil. The kabbalists, on the other hand, developed a doctrine of evil as a demonic counterworld: the "left emanation" or the "other side" (see SITRA' AHRA'). In the modern period, in the aftermath of the Holocaust, the problem of evil has received new emphasis. See HOLOCAUST THEOLOGY.

GORDON, ELI'EZER (1840–1910), rabbi and scholar. At an early age, he was asked by R. Yisra'el *Salanter to succeed him in instructing young students in Kovno. In 1874 Gordon became rabbi of Kelme; ten years later he was appointed rabbi of *Tels and head of its prestigious yeshivah. An exponent of a rigorous logical and conceptual approach to the Talmud, Gordon was a pioneer of the *Musal movement. He played an active role in the creation of Keneset Yisra'el, an organization that sought to represent all Orthodox Jews. His responsa, Teshuvot Rabbi Eli'ezer, were published in two volumes (1912, 1940).

GOREN, SHLOMO (1917–1994), Israeli chief rabbi and halakhic authority. Born in Zambrów, Poland, he went as a child to Palestine to Kefar H̄asidim, which his father helped to found. A Torah prodigy, he published his first work, Netser ha-Qadosh, on Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, when he was seventeen. He served in the Haganah (the Jewish paramilitary force) and fought in Israel's War of Independence. After the establishment of the State of Israel, he was appointed the first chief chaplain of the Israeli Defense Forces. A flamboyant figure, he participated in parachute jumps and sounded the shofar at the *Western Wall immediately upon its capture in 1967. As chief chaplain, he introduced a unified liturgy, used by soldiers of all backgrounds. He also made significant halakhic decisions related to modern army life. He gave permission to remarry to the widows (see 'AGUNAH) of soldiers killed in action whose bodies had not been found (for example, those drowned in boats or in submarines lost at sea). From 1968 to 1972, he was Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Tel Aviv. From 1972 to 1983, he was Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel. His liberal interpretations solved many of the problems relating to converts, mamzerim (see MAMZER), and post-mortem examinations. He also ruled that there were certain sections of the Temple mount where it was permissible for Jews to enter and pray, and he founded the Idra Rabbah Yeshivah facing the Western Wall. After stepping down as chief rabbi, he spoke out against giving land for peace and the evacuation of Jewish settlements. He was the author of many works, including a commentary on the Talmud Yerushalmi.

GRACIAN, ZERAHYAH (13th cent.), philosopher. A member of the prominent Spanish Gracian family, Zerahyah (also known as Zerahyah Hen) was born in Barcelona. He studied Islamic and Jewish philosophy under Yonah ben Avraham Gerondi and was a physician by profession. In 1277 he immigrated to Rome, where he lived until 1290. His native language was probably Arabic, and he translated a number of works from Arabic into Hebrew, facilitating the spread of Jewish philosophy in Italy. In addition he wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch (or portions of it), Job, Proverbs, and parts of Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed. He was a devoted follower of Maimonides and a recognized authority on his teachings. His commentaries combine philological and philosophical interpretations.

GRAETZ, HEINRICH (1817-1891), historian. Born in eastern Prussia and given a traditional Jewish education, Graetz studied modern and classical languages and other subjects on his own. His crisis of faith was resolved with the help first of Samson Raphael Hirsch and then of Zacharias Frankel. In 1853 Graetz was appointed to the faculty of the Jewish Theological Seminary in Breslau. Graetz is best known for his erudite, dramatic, and highly opinionated eleven-volume History of the Jews, although he also published studies of biblical books and essays on the philosophy of Jewish history and Jewish ethics.

In his programmatic essay, "The Construction of Jewish History," which he wrote in 1846, Graetz asserted that the essence of Judaism originally took the form of a unique theoretical idea (a concept of deity in its transcendence totally opposed to paganism), but he sought to show that the concrete implications of the idea unfolded, in a somewhat Hegelian manner, in the various cycles of its historical experience. History of the Jews limned a vast panorama of the Jewish people as a living folk and not merely a religious association, as Graetz accused the Reform Jews of his day of advocating. His presentation emphasized Jewish achievements in literature, philosophy, and law, as well as the historic willingness of Jews to sacrifice life itself for the sake of Judaism's spiritual mission.

GRAGER (גי; גרָגֶר), rattle sounded in the synagogue on Purim at each mention of the name of *Haman in the course of the reading of the Book of Esther. The grager dates back to thirteenth-century France and Germany. The custom among Oriental Jews was to stamp the feet or knock two stones together at the mention of Haman's name, but this has generally been superseded by the grager (although not in Persia).

GREETINGS AND CONGRATULATIONS. The Bible contains a number of formal greetings. For example, Laban greets the servant of Abraham with the words "Come, blessed of the Lord" (Gn. 24.11); the Book of Ruth contains both the greeting "The Lord be with you" and the response "The Lord bless you" (Ru. 2.4); while the longest greeting is David's to Nabal, "All hail, and peace to you, and peace to your house, and peace to all that is yours" (1 Sm. 25.6). The word peace (shalom; cf. Gn. 43.27; Ex. 18.7; Jgs. 6.23) figures most frequently in Jewish greetings up to the present (shalom 'aleikhem, "peace to you"). The Talmud goes to great lengths in detailing the etiquette of greetings and appropriate responses—such as who has to greet whom first and the proper point at which to reply. Readiness to be first in greeting is an act of special piety (Avot 4.20), while "he who fails to return a greeting is like a robber" (Ber. 6b).

Formal greetings are customary on the Sabbath. At the beginning of the Sabbath, people greet one another with Shabbat shalom, "a peaceful Sabbath"; or, among Ashkenazim, with the Yiddish gut Shabes, "good Sabbath." At the conclusion of the Sabbath, people wish each other shavu'a tov (Heb.) or gut vokh (Yi.), "a good week." On festivals, hag sameah, "a joyful festival" is the standard greeting. Mo'adim le-simhah, "[may you have] festivals for rejoicing," was traditionally used by Sephardim, particularly on the Shalosh Regalim, and derives from the festival 'Amidah. Today it is commonly used in Israel; the traditional reply is haggim u-zemannim le-sason, "feasts and festal seasons for joy." Another (traditionally Ashkenazi) festival greeting is the Yiddish gut yontef, "good holiday." The specific Ro'sh ha-Shanah greeting is le-shanah tovah tikatev ve-tehatev, "may you be inscribed and sealed for a good year."

On performing a religious duty, it is customary to utter the greeting hazaq barukh*, "be strong, blessed"; among Ashkenazim, yishar kohakha (yashar koah), "may your strength increase" (Shab. 87a). Yishar kohakha derives from a passage in the Talmud (Shab. 87a) where Reish Laqish, by a play on the word asher in Exodus 34.1, has God say approvingly to Moses, "yishar kohakha" for smashing the tablets of the Law. These phrases are used as expressions of thanks to the preacher (after a sermon), priest (after the Birkat ha-Kohanim), or the performer of a mitsvah.

A customary welcome is barukh ha-ba', "blessed is he who comes" (cf. Ps. 118.26). No greetings are made on Tish'ah be-'Av or in a house of mourning, where the visitor consoles the mourner with the phrase ha-Maqom yena'hem etkhem tokh she'ar avelei Tsiyyon vi-Yerushalayim, "May the Almighty comfort you among the other mourners of Zion and Jerusalem." Among British Jews it is customary to wish mourners "long life."

The most frequent forms of congratulations have an astrological origin. In mazzal tov, "good luck," and mazzal u-verakhah, "luck and blessing," the word mazzal originally applied to a constellation of stars, while besiman tov, used among Sephardim, means "under a good sign." Among Sephardim, various congratulations are introduced with the word tizkeh ("may you be vouchsafed"—a long life, the performance of commandments, etc.). Le-hayyim, "to life," is said for a toast, and the birthday greeting is "may you live to 120 years" (cf. Gn. 6.3).

GRODZINSKI, HAYYIM 'OZER (1863–1940), Lithuanian rabbi and leader of Orthodox Jewry. Though he was appointed at age twenty-four one of the rabbinic judges of Vilna, his authority extended far and wide, both as an interpreter of Jewish law and as a spokesman for Russian-Polish Jewry. Grodzinski was a founder and major leader of Agudat Israel*. In Poland between the two world wars he helped to organize the Va'ad ha-Yeshivot in Vilna, an association devoted to raising funds for the financially strapped yeshivot. In the early 1930s, Grodzinski was officially named one of the rabbis of Vilna, after a prolonged public dispute over the nomination of Zionist leader R. Yits'haq Rubinstein to the post. Grodzinski's halakhic writings were collected in his still influential book of responsa on the Shulhan 'Arukh* entitled Ahi'ezer.

GUARDIAN (Heb. epitropos, from Gr. apotropos), an individual who may be appointed for minors, mentally defective adults, or absentees. The major focus of the halakhah in this area is the administration of the ward's property and finances. A father is the natural guardian of his minor children, but he may also appoint another person as their guardian (Git. 52a). A guardian may be appointed by a court by virtue of its authority as "the father of orphans" (Git. 37a), and it will use this power in relation to orphans, or in cases in which either the father, or the guardian appointed by him, fails to act in the best interests of the ward (B. Q. 37a; Rema', Hoshen Mishpat 285.8). A mother must either be specifically appointed as a guardian or may undertake the responsibility for dependent minors, by virtue of which they become members of her household for all legal purposes (Shulhan 'Arukh, Hoshen Mishpat 290.1). Although in principle in halakhah women are not appointed as guardians, later authorities agree that a woman who is "experienced in business matters and accustomed to going about in public" may be appointed by the court to act as a guardian if this would be in the best interests of the ward (Bayit Hadash, Hoshen Mishpat 290.3). The fiduciary powers of a guardian are limited to the prudent administration of the ward's estate, and all guardians, including the father of a minor, are subject to supervision by the court (Git. 52a). The court may set aside transactions entered into by a guardian in excess of his or her powers, and, in such a case, the guardian may be held personally liable for any loss suffered by the ward unless court approval was secured prior to the transactions in question (Rema', Hoshen Mishpat 290.13). A full report must be submitted at the termination of the guardianship, which ends automatically upon a minor achieving the age of majority. Guardians are not entitled to any remuneration for their services but may take compensation for limited personal expenses incurred in the course of the direct management of the ward's estate.

GUNZBERG, ARYEH LEIB BEN ASHER (c.1695–1785), Talmudist. In 1720 he moved to Minsk, where he founded and headed a yeshivah that attracted pupils from many parts of eastern Europe. Later he served as rabbi in Volozhin, and from 1765 he served as rabbi and head of a yeshivah in Metz. The most prominent of his disciples were Refa'el ha-Kohen of Altona and Hayyim ben Yits'haq Volozhiner. An outstanding casuist and eminent scholar, Gunzberg's classic halakhic work, Sha'agat Aryeh (Frankfurt an der Oder, 1755), and his novellae, Turei Even (Melz, 1781) and Gevurot Ari (Vilna, 1862), are essential links in the chain of analytic works that shaped the methodology that is the hallmark of Lithuanian Talmudic scholarship, and they are studied GUTTMACHER, ELIYYAHU (1795–1874), rabbinic forerunner of modern Zionism. His rejection of passive messianism combined with his mystical pietism earned him the title Tsaddiq of Grodzisk, a village in the province of Posen (Poznań), where he officiated as rabbi. Unwittingly, he attracted large numbers of believers from eastern Europe in the efficacy of his prayers and amulets. He collaborated with R. Tsevi Hirsch *Kalischer, who had studied with him at the yeshivah of their mentor R. 'Aqiva' *Eger, in supporting agricultural settlement in Erets Yisra'el, which Guttmacher saw as the spiritual antidote to the ills of the Diaspora, exemplified for him in Reform Judaism and secularization. Nevertheless he regarded Jewish emancipation as a sign of the approaching redemption. His numerous responsa were noted for their compassion for the less fortunate, their Talmudic erudition, and their uncompromising opposition to any change in traditional customs. Some of his novellae were included in the standard Romm edition of the Talmud. His responsa were collected in Adderet Eliyyahu (2 vols., 1984).

H

HABAD, an acronym formed from the Hebrew words for wisdom (hokhmah), understanding (binah), and knowledge (da'at); school of *Hasidism founded by R. *Shneur Zalman of Lyady. Its principal and most influential literary work, entitled Liqqutei Amarim, but better known as the Tanya, expounds the doctrine of Ḥabad. The work's basic thought follows the Hasidic themes of hitbonenut (contemplation of the nature of the divine entity constantly present in the world), devequt (constant communion with and cleaving to God), hitlahavut (intensity of feeling at times bordering on ecstasy), and kavvanah (devotion, meditation, intent). Ḥabad's principle that "there is no place empty of him" has more than once provoked the charge of pantheism. The element in Ḥabad that distinguishes it from other Hasidic schools is its emphasis on the importance of intellectual effort in religious striving. The powers of contemplation, analysis, and understanding—the upper sefirot—must rule and guide the lower, emotional impulses. The result of such intellectual effort ought to be the intensification of the emotional aspects of prayer and religious effort. Partly through its emphasis on systematizing religious work and partly due to a succession of gifted leaders, Ḥabad Hasidism (as expressed by the Lubavitch movement) continued to win adherents even when other Hasidic schools began to weaken. In order to disseminate Ḥabad thought, as demanded by Shneur Zalman's teachings, the movement has become active in many parts of the world, attempting to counter the slackening of Jewish life by founding schools and orphanages, distributing literature, and promoting study groups and the observance of religious festivals. These efforts provoked opponents to charge Ḥabad with overt missionary activity. In recent years, Ḥabad engendered a messianic arousal centered on the person of R. Menahem Mendel Schneerson (see SCHNEERSON FAMILY), who, as the seventh master of Ḥabad, was perceived by many members of the movement as the promised Messiah.

HABAKKUK (7th cent. BCE), prophet in the kingdom of Judah during the early period of Judah's submission to Babylonia. Little is known of Habakkuk's life or personal circumstances. In vivid language, he described the rise of the Chaldeans (Neo-Babylonians) to the position of the dominant world power, the ferocity of their military campaigns, and their unbridled cruelty. He probably prophesied after the collapse of the Assyrian empire between 614 and 609, and his utterances appear to reflect Nebuchadnezzar's defeat of Egypt in 605 BCE and subsequent invasion of Judah. Habakkuk's message focuses on the problem of theodicy: why does a righteous and at the same time omnipotent God allow evil (in this case the Neo-Babylonian empire) to rule the world? Habakkuk's dictum that "the righteous shall live by his faith" (2.4), implying that God would ultimately redeem the righteous, summarizes, according to the Talmud (Mak. 24a), the whole teaching of the Bible.

The Book of Habakkuk is the eighth book of the Minor Prophets. According to its superscriptions (1.1 and 3.1), it contains two major parts—"the oracle that Habakkuk the prophet saw" (chaps. 1–2) and the "prayer of Habakkuk the prophet." The oracle consists of five prophetic utterances: Habakkuk's initial complaint against violence and oppression, 1.1–4; God's answer—the Chaldeans are his instruments of punishment, 1.5–11; the prophet's second protest against the oppressor, 1.12–17; God's answer—the righteous shall live by his faith, whereas the wicked shall perish, 2.1–5; and five more oracles condemning the oppressors, 2.6–20. The "psalm" of Habakkuk (chap. 3) reinforces the message of the triumph of the righteous over evil with a theophanic description of God's defeat of oppressors, concluding with the prophet's statement of trust and faith in God. A commentary (called a pesher*) on Habakkuk 1–2 has been found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls. Habakkuk 3 is read in the Diaspora as the haftarah portion on the second day of Shavu'ot, which commemorates the revelation of the Torah at Sinai (Meg. 31a).

Since the destruction of the Temple and the suspension of the *omer offering, eating hadash has been forbidden through 16 Nisan, but the prohibition lapses automatically on the eve of 17 Nisan.

HADASSI, YEHUDAH BEN ELIYYAHU (12th cent.), *Karaite scholar who was active in Constantinople and who followed the ascetic practices of the *Avelei Tsiyyon. His greatest work, Eshkol ha-Kofer (Gozlva, 1836), begun in 1148, is an encyclopedia of Karaite theology and law. It is not an original work but an eclectic summary of Karaite knowledge, reflecting how the achievements of the golden period of Karaite creativity in the tenth and eleventh centuries were transferred to a new environment in Byzantium. It is written partly in verse, in Hadassi's own unique and awkward Hebrew, which frequently makes it difficult to understand. Eshkol ha-Kofer is arranged according to the Ten Commandments and explains the mitsvot and their reasons. In addition, Hadassi included much information on natural phenomena, biblical exegesis, grammar, and philosophy, as well as attacks on Christianity and Islam; the book reveals how Byzantine Jews saw the world. In addition to Eshkol ha-Kofer, Hadassi wrote a work explicating the commandments in order of their appearance in the Bible, of which only a manuscript fragment survives, as well as some religious hymns that were included in the Karaite prayer book.

HAD GADYA' (Aram.; ܗܕ ܓܕܝܐ; One Kid), Aramaic poem with ten stanzas recited at the close of the Pesah *Seder service. Resembling a German folk song and composed on the cumulative pattern known to English readers from "The House that Jack Built," it was written by an unknown author, probably in the fifteenth century, and may have been included in the *Haggadah in order to amuse the children who were kept up late. It is not found in the Sephardi or Yemenite traditions. Literally, its theme is the retribution meted out for evil deeds, and various allegorical interpretations have been advanced by commentators. According to some it symbolizes the fate of the Jewish people among the nations; others have suggested that it describes the experiences of the soul in the human body from birth to judgment day.

HAFQA'AT SHE'ARIM (הפקעת שערים; profiteering), charging prices deemed excessive relative to the norm. Profiteering is to be distinguished from the biblical prohibition against ona'ah (overreaching), which creates a framework for protecting the individual consumer against excessive prices charged by a deceitful vendor seeking to exploit the consumer's inferior knowledge of the true market value of the commodity being purchased. The sanctions applicable against the vendor in cases of overreaching are, therefore, designed to compensate the wronged consumer, by giving him the right to rescind the transaction (where the price paid was more than one-sixth in excess of market value) or to claim a refund of the excess (where the price paid was precisely one-sixth in excess).

The rabbinic prohibition against hafqa'at she'arim, on the other hand, represents a particular economic policy advocating conscious intervention in the markets as a whole, for the purpose of controlling prices of essential commodities. Such controls were deemed necessary for the protection of the weaker elements in society and were inspired by the general biblical injunction "... that your brother may live with you" (Lv. 25.36). Because the prohibition is an element of economic policy rather than a device for the protection of the individual consumer, it is applicable whether or not the purchaser protests.

Various opinions were expressed by the early sages as to the specific implementation of this policy, particularly with regard to whether the local authorities would actually fix permissible prices or merely make an objective determination as to what the current market prices were. The codes, following the position of Maimonides, decided in favor of active intervention: local authorities were empowered and obligated to fix the retail prices of essential commodities, such as flour, oil, wine, and the like, at amounts no more than one-sixth above the vendor's costs and were similarly empowered to apply sanctions against offenders as they saw fit.

Manipulative tactics that could result in artificial shortages and thus in unjustified higher prices, such as hoarding and excessive exports, were similarly prohibited.

HAFTARAH (הפטרה; conclusion [of the biblical lesson]), the reading from the prophetic books that follows qeri'at ha-Torah* in the Shaḥarit service on Sabbaths and festivals; on fast days a haftarah is read during the afternoon service in the Ashkenazi rite, while on Yom Kippur and Tish'ah be-'Av a haftarah is read in both the morning and afternoon services. The person called to read the haftarah (the maftir*) first reads a portion from the Torah (mostly a repetition of the last three verses of the day's reading). Unlike the reading of the Torah, which must be performed from a handwritten scroll, the haftarah may be read from a printed text; only a few congregations (mainly in Jerusalem) use scrolls of the prophetic books. The maftir usually reads the haftarah himself; in some congregations (including those in which the haftarah is read from a scroll), it is chanted by a reader. Before the readings a benediction is recited in praise of God "who has chosen true prophets"; another four benedictions follow the reading, one affirming faith in the eventual realization of the words of the prophets, two petitions of messianic content (for the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the coming of the Messiah), and one referring to the holiness and significance of the day (Sabbath or festival, respectively; this last blessing is omitted on fast days except on the morning of Yom Kippur). The custom of conducting regular public readings from the Prophets goes back to Second Temple times, possibly to the Hasmonean period. It has been suggested that it was introduced during the persecution of *Antiochus IV Epiphanes, when the public reading of the Torah was forbidden. Its purpose was to conclude the reading of the Torah—the main instrument for educating the people and strengthening their faith—with words of consolation and promises of messianic redemption. In later times the haftarah portion was no longer necessarily a prophecy of consolation but was instead suited to the occasion of its recitation. Thus on a festival, the haftarah is in some way connected with the day, while on Sabbaths it is chosen on the basis of its association with the Pentateuchal portion for that day. On Shabbat Sheqalim, Shabbat Zakhōr, Shabbat Parah, and Shabbat ha-Hōdesh (see SABBATHS, SPECIAL), the haftarah again refers to the specific occasion. On a Sabbath that is also the new moon, Isaiah 66, which refers to both the Sabbath and Ro'sh Hōdesh, is read. On the three Sabbaths preceding 9 Av, Jeremiah 1 and 2 and Isaiah 1 are read because of their prophecies of wrath, while on the seven following Sabbaths, prophecies of consolation (taken from Is. 40ff.) are chosen in most rites. The chief rabbinate of the State of Israel has ordained the reading of Isaiah 10.32 and 11.12 for the annual Yom ha-'Atsma'ut service. On those Sabbaths when two Pentateuchal portions are read, the haftarah recited is generally that for the second portion. The haftarah varies according to different rites; current haftarah portions do not correspond with those mentioned in the Mishnah (Meg. 4.1–10, 31a). In many congregations, it is considered a special honor to be called to read the haftarah, and it is given, for instance, to a boy celebrating his bar mitsvah (and in non-Orthodox congregations, to a girl celebrating her bat mitsvah) or a bridegroom; in others (including Sephardi and 'Adot ha-Mizrah), it is customary to call boys below the age of thirteen for maftir (but not for other parts of the reading). In the Talmudic period, a reading from the Hagiographa was incorporated into the Sabbath afternoon service. The haftarah is chanted to a special melody. In Reform congregations, it is often read rather than sung.

HAGAR, Egyptian handmaiden of *Sarah, concubine of *Abraham, and mother of *Ishmael. In accordance with common ancient Near Eastern family laws, Sarah offered Hagar to Abraham as a concubine when it became apparent that she herself was barren (Gn. 16). After Hagar became pregnant with Ishmael, she held her mistress in contempt, since her son would eventually receive the family inheritance. Sarah, in turn, forced Hagar to flee to the wilderness, where a messenger of God told her to return to her mistress and promised that her son would become the founder of a great nation. After the birth of Isaac (Gn. 21), Sarah demanded the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael, lest Ishmael inherit Abraham's estate together with Isaac. (Parallel texts from Mesopotamia indicate that Isaac, though born later, would still be legally considered the firstborn.) When Hagar found herself without water in the wilderness of Beersheba, a messenger of God appeared to her, proclaimed his promise concerning Ishmael, and provided a well of water to sustain her and Ishmael. Some scholars regard the two episodes (Gn. 16 and 21) as different versions of the same story.

HAGBAHAH (הַגְּבָהָה; elevating), the act of raising the open Torah scroll to display its text to the assembled congregation. Among Sephardim this act precedes the Torah reading and is performed by an honorary official or member of an honorary brotherhood (levantadores). Among Ashkenazim it follows the Torah reading and is followed by *Gelilah. Upon seeing the open Torah scroll, congregants say: "And this is the Torah that Moses placed before the children of Israel (Dt. 4.44) at the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses (Nm. 9.23)." Sephardim recite Deuteronomy 4.24 and 33.4, and Reform Jews recite Proverbs 3.18.

HAGGADAH. See AGGADAH.

HAGGADAH OF PESAḤ, literally, the "telling" of the Passover story, but by extension, the home liturgy for the first two nights of Pesah (in Israel, and among Reform Jews, the first night only; see PESAḤ) that accompanies the ritual meal called the Seder (Order). A multifaceted literary corpus that has evolved over time, the recitation of the liturgy fulfills the obligation to retell the tale of the *Exodus (Ex. 13.8). The Seder began as a rabbinic version of first-century Greco-Roman ritualized meals called symposia, and gradually developed a larger and larger narrative accompaniment, which became fixed in the Haggadah.

Originally, the meal (introduced by the standard *Qid-dush prayer and outfitted with standard blessings before and after eating) was followed by spontaneous questions to prompt discussion, a Midrashic recounting of the Exodus narrative, and a recitation of the ten plagues. The liturgy concluded with psalms of praise, called *Hallel, to observe the principle that the Seder progress in tone "from degradation to praise." By 200 CE, the meal had been postponed until the end of the liturgy, and set questions, called "the four questions" (*mah nishtannah), replaced the spontaneous ones. In the Middle Ages, the role of asking these questions was given to children, in keeping with the Bible's instructions that the Exodus be retold "when your children ask you on that day" (Ex. 13.14).

Over time, a third-century Talmudic discussion of "degradation" was recast as a preamble to the Midrash. *Avadim Hayinu (We Were Slaves) identified degradation as physical servitude, and Mi-Tehillah (In the Beginning [Our Ancestors Were Idolaters]) defined it as an inner spiritual matter. Already, R. Gamli'el's first-century interpretation of biblical food symbols (the pesah, or *paschal lamb, *matsah and *maror) had been appended, possibly to counter Christological interpretation by Jewish-Christians for whom the Seder recapitulated the Last Supper. The familiar song *Dayyenu has been variously dated but is sufficiently late as to have been considered optional in the tenth century.

The earliest extant written Haggadah text is a relatively complete fragment datable to eighth- or ninth-century Palestine. The version that became canonical for Jews worldwide is part of a ninth-century prayer book, Seder Rav Amram, by Amram Ga'on of Babylonia. Amram's text was expanded in Europe, following the Crusades. The concluding Hallel psalms had already been split with Psalm 113 and Psalm 114 preceding the meal and Psalm 115 through Psalm 118 following it, along with Psalm 136 (called the Great Hallel), which had been mandated in antiquity as a special psalm of thanksgiving for the night. This relatively spare after-dinner liturgy was now enhanced to reflect the millennial piety of the High Middle Ages, emphasizing an imminent messianic coming and the horror occasioned by the massacre of Rhineland Jewry in the First Crusade.

These factors led Jews on the Seder eve to expect the arrival of *Elijah to announce the Messiah. They would open the door for him, invoke revenge on their oppressors, and end by wishing one another "Next year in Jerusalem" (*la-shanah ha-ba'ah bi-Yerushalayim). A series of concluding folk songs was also added over the years, notably *Addir Hu', an alphabetic acrostic celebrating God's might, and *Hād Gadya', which plays with the hierarchy of power in the animal kingdom, over which death alone rules—but below God's ultimate sovereignty.

The ambience of the meal is central to the Haggadah, not only because the Bible commands special foods, but because ever since its symposium origins, it has invested common foodstuffs with symbolic value. Today's ritual thus includes also *haroset, a sweet paste usually made from wine, fruit and nuts, originally a symposium hors d'oeuvre but reinterpreted to symbolize the mortar from which Israelite slaves made bricks, and karpas, greens, dipped in salt water, another hors d'oeuvre, reinterpreted to symbolize the green of new life mixed with tears of slavery. Common also are eggs, originally signifying eternal life, and potatoes, harvested from the earth, like greens, and introduced in countries where spring was late and greens were unavailable. The paschal lamb offering ceased with the Temple's destruction (70 CE), but symbolic reminders of it and of another festival sacrifice, the *hagigah, remain arrayed, but uneaten, on the Seder tray in the form of a roasted shankbone and egg. A final piece of matsah, called the *afiqoman, concludes the meal, and *four cups of wine are consumed to indicate God's saving presence four times in Jewish history. A dispute as to whether a fifth cup was obligatory—to symbolize deliverance at the end of time—led to the custom of filling but not drinking still another cup, subsequently called "Elijah's cup."

Fifteenth- and sixteenth-century Haggadot were outfitted with lavish illustrations. Sephardi artists painted entire biblical epics as visual textual preambles; Ashkenazi (German and Italian) painters drew a running visual commentary to the liturgy. With printing, the artistic tradition continued with woodcuts and copper plate drawings, and modern artists, too, find the Haggadah a favorite medium of expression. Orthodox Haggadot today contain the entire text as tradition has preserved it, whereas liberal Jews, particularly Reform, adapt the Haggadah more freely, dispensing with old readings now deemed irrelevant, translating prayers into the vernacular, and adding material reflective of Haggadah themes. New Haggadot frequently reflect on the Holocaust and the wonder of Israel's revival as a modern Jewish state. Special Haggadot include an Israeli army Haggadah; Haggadot from otherwise socialist/secular kibbutzim; "Freedom Haggadot" from the cold war to strengthen solidarity with Soviet Jews unable to celebrate Pesah; and, more recently, women's Haggadot, marking the impact of *feminism in a Jewish context. With computer technology, more and more families compose their own Haggadot, altered annually to reflect the tradition that the Pesah message of liberation speaks freshly to every generation.

HAGGAHOT (הַגָּהוֹת; glosses), explanatory notes by Jewish scholars intended primarily to correct textual errors, provide short explanations and cross references, or call attention to difficulties in classical texts. Throughout Jewish history, scholars have written short glosses on books. This was especially the case with regard to works composed before the invention of printing, since they circulated in a variety of versions, and the one finally printed did not always represent the best possible text. Despite a series of warnings by such luminaries as Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam, these marginal corrections were often inserted into the actual text, either by the scholar himself or by later copyists. Current editions of the Talmud contain many comments and corrections of ge'onim, Rashi, and R. Shelomoh Luria, the fact of which many traditional commentators have often been unaware. Other important examples of glosses on the Talmud are the notes of R. Yo'el ben Shemu'el Sirses, R. Eliyyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna, and R. 'Aqiva' Eger. Even many of R. Avraham ben David of Posquières' famous hassagot (animadversions) on Maimonides' Mishneh Torah are explanatory or neutral in content and would be better categorized as haggahot.

Haggahot literature also comprises glosses that are intended to supplement a work in various ways. An outstanding example is the thirteenth-century Haggahot Maimuniyyot*, written by Me'ir ha-Kohen, which supplements Maimonides' code with the opinions of German and French scholars. The haggahot of R. Moshe Isserles to R. Yosef Karo's Shulhan 'Arukh are, historically speaking, the most significant haggahot ever written. Through his notes, Isserles incorporated the Ashkenazi tradition into Karo's code of Jewish law, enabling both Karo's work, together with Isserles's notes, to be accepted as the central work of Jewish law of the last few hundred years. Such widespread acceptance, by all segments of Jewry, illustrates the advantages of haggahot over full-fledged commentaries or codes, which are designed to be independent and which compete with one another rather than complement each other. Haggahot literature continues to be published today, including glosses on the Talmud, Mishneh Torah, and other Jewish classics. The popular Ashkenazi halakhic works, Kitsur Shulhan 'Arukh and Mishnah Berurah, have been published with glosses recording Sephardi practices, allowing these works, too, to achieve acceptance throughout Jewry.

HAGGAHOT MAIMUNIYYOT, a thirteenth-century halakhic work written by R. Me'ir ha-Kohen of Rothenburg, a student of R. *Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg, consisting of supplemental notes (haggahot) to Moses *Maimonides' Mishneh Torah. Rabbi Me'ir ha-Kohen's main objective was to attach rulings of German and northern French scholars to the code of Maimonides, whose own post-Talmudic sources were, for the most part, from Sephardi sources. Moreover, other students from the school of R. Me'ir ben Barukh of Rothenburg, including R. Me'ir ha-Kohen's brother-in-law, R. *Mordekhai ben Hillel, also sought to introduce in their writings the pillars of Sephardi halakhah, such as Maimonides and Alfasi. Haggahot Maimuniyyot is divided into two sections: notes that are attached to the Mishneh Torah itself, and Teshuvot Maimuniyyot, which are appended to the end of each book of the Mishneh Torah and contain relevant Ashkenazi responsa. The work as a whole constitutes an important source for twelfth- and thirteenth-century medieval rabbinic literature from Germany and France, containing a number of attributed formulations that appear nowhere else. Haggahot Maimuniyyot is included in standard editions of the Mishneh Torah (the first part appeared in the Constantinople edition of 1509). There are numerous manuscript versions that have not yet been investigated thoroughly. Manuscript evidence suggests that the comments were originally added as glosses in the margins of the Mishneh Torah.

HAGGAI (6th cent. BCE), prophet in the kingdom of Judah during the period of restoration after the Babylonian exile; contemporary of *Zechariah. Haggai delivered four addresses to the postexilic Jewish community in Jerusalem over the course of three months during the fall of 520 BCE in support of efforts to build the Second Temple. This was a period of widespread political chaos within the Persian empire, during which Darius I fought to establish his control. Haggai maintained that the time had come to rebuild the Temple, that the nations would stream to Jerusalem to recognize God's sovereignty, and that *Zerubbabel, the Jewish governor of Judah under Persian rule and grandson of King Jehoiachin, would rule in Jerusalem. Haggai's role in rebuilding the Temple is noted in Ezra 5.1 and 6.14.

The Book of Haggai is the tenth book of the Minor Prophets. Haggai's first prophecy (1.1–11) contains an exhortation to rebuild the Temple and blames the anger of God, who brought on a drought, on their failure to do so. It continues (1.12–15) with a short narrative relating how the entire community along with its leaders, Zerubbabel (the governor) and Joshua (the high priest), took up the task of rebuilding the Temple. In Haggai's second prophecy (2.1–9) God consoles the people, telling them that although the Temple now being built is much less impressive than Solomon's, it will become even more glorious than the first. In his third prophecy (2.10–19), Haggai reiterates the prophetic note of the primacy of morality and reminds the people that the Temple does not confer holiness on those whose deeds are impure. The prophecy concludes with a promise of prosperity. Finally, Haggai 2.20–23 maintains that Zerubbabel will be recognized as God's "signet ring" or ruler at a time when the power of the nations will be overthrown.

According to rabbinic tradition, the book was edited by the Men of the *Keneset ha-Gedolah (B. B. 21a).

HAGGIM (חגים; festivals). The Torah enumerates five festivals to be observed in the course of the year: the *Shalosh Regalim (the pilgrim festivals of *Pesah, *Shavu'ot, and *Sukkot), the "day of blowing the trumpets" (see RO'SH HA-SHANAH), and *Yom Kippur, which, although observed as a fast, is included among the festivals. Ro'sh ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur are celebrated as purely religious occasions of judgment, atonement, and reconciliation with God, unlike the Shalosh Regalim, whose origins are historical and agricultural. Each of the Shalosh Regalim also has a liturgical name that does not appear in the Bible: the Season of Our Freedom (Pesah), the Season of the Giving of Our Torah (Shavu'ot), and the Season of Our Rejoicing (Sukkot). Doubt is expressed in the Talmud about whether *Shemini 'Atseret, with which the festival of Sukkot concludes (Nm. 29.35), is to be regarded as a separate festival or as the concluding day of Sukkot. During the period of the First Temple, *Ro'sh Hodesh, the new moon, was celebrated as a semifestival, but it has since completely lost its festive character. Ro'sh ha-Shanah is now observed both in Israel and in the Diaspora for two days; Yom Kippur, for one. The celebration of the other biblical festivals (the first and last day of Pesah, Shavu'ot, the first day of Sukkot, Shemini 'Atseret) has been extended in the Diaspora to two days (see YOM TOV SHENI SHEL GALUYTOT). Although the original reason for the extension no longer existed even in Talmudic times, the custom was retained, except in Reform Judaism and in some Conservative circles. (Beits. 4b). On all these festivals (apart from the intermediate days; see HOL HA-MO'ED), abstention from work is obligatory. Yom Kippur, the "Sabbath of Sabbaths" (Lv. 23.32), is subject to the same prohibitions as the Sabbath. On the other festivals, unlike the Sabbath, carrying and the use of fire, both for cooking and other essential needs, are permitted. Shemini 'Atseret (in the Diaspora, its second day) has developed as the special festival of *Simhat Torah, on which the completion of the annual reading of the Torah in the synagogue is joyfully celebrated. To these major festivals a number of others have been added, to which the prohibition on work does not apply. These can be divided into full festivals, with their special ritual and liturgy, and semifestivals, which are little more than days commemorating events regarded as sufficiently significant to justify the omission of supplicatory prayers. To the former category belong *Hanukkah and *Purim (the latter, although its institution is recounted in the biblical Book of Esther, has the character of a post-biblical festival). The minor post-biblical festivals (some of them now of folkloristic rather than liturgical consequence) include *Tu bi-Shevat, the traditional date of the death of Moses (7 Adar), *Lag ba-'Omer, *Pesah Sheni, *Tu be-'Av, and *Hosha'na' Rabbah. In modern Israel, two further festivals have been added—*Yom ha-

*Atsma'ut and *Yom Yerushalayim, which have received religious recognition from the Israel chief rabbinate. See also FESTIVAL PRAYERS.

HAGIGAH (הַגִּיגָה; festival offering), name of a sacrifice and of a Mishnaic tractate.

Sacrifice. Every worshiper was obliged to bring an animal sacrifice to the Temple on each of the *Shalosh Regalim. It had to be not less in value than two silver pieces. The lame, blind, sick, aged, and those incapable of going up to Jerusalem on foot were exempt from the obligation to bring the hagigah. After the prescribed parts (Lv. 3.15) had been offered on the altar, the remainder was consumed by the person who had brought the sacrifice. In order that the paschal lamb, consumed on the first night of Pesah, be eaten to fulfill the religious commandment only and not to assuage hunger, a special hagigah was brought on the eve of Pesah and served as the main course of the evening meal before the paschal lamb was served.

Tractate. Hagigah is the last tractate of Mishnah order Mo'ed, consisting of three chapters, with related material in the Tosefta and in both Talmuds. The tractate deals with the laws of pilgrimage to the Temple and with the sacrificial offerings that accompany the pilgrimage, particularly the hagigah offering. The latter half of the tractate discusses degrees of ritual purity and their correspondence to degrees of sanctity. The meticulous observance of these standards of purity caused a division between the Pharisaic community and the common folk (see 'AM HA-'ARETS), yet these standards were relaxed on the festivals in order to enable all segments of the population to participate in the pilgrimage.

The laws of hagigah lacked a solid scriptural basis and served as a major source of halakhic controversy during Second Temple times. The sectarian overtones of this controversy serve as a point of departure for a discussion by the Mishnah and Talmud of the major ideas of early rabbinic mysticism.

The tractate in the Talmud Bavli was translated into English by Israel Abrahams in the Soncino Talmud (London, 1938).

HAGIOGRAPHIA, a term from Greek that refers to the third of the traditional tripartite divisions of the Bible, the Writings (Heb. Ketuvim), and the last to be canonized. It consists of Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 Chronicles, and 2 Chronicles.

HAGIOGRAPHIES. There is no authentic Hebrew term for hagiography, though the practice of telling stories about great scholars and sages is prevalent in Hebrew literature. Joseph Dan has suggested using the term shevaḥim literature, because Hebrew collections of such narratives have been often called shevaḥim (from the Hebrew word meaning praise), like those dedicated to Yitshaq Luria and the Ba'al Shem Tov. Talmudic literature abounds with biographical material, historical and legendary, about the great Talmudic sages, especially the tanna'im, such as Hillel, R. Yoḥanan ben Zakk'ai, R. 'Aqiva', R. Eli'ezer ben Hurqanos, and many others. Talmudic and Midrashic clusters of such stories mark the beginnings of an independent literary genre. The eighth-century midrash, Pirkei de-Rabbi Eli'ezer, begins with two chapters dedicated to a legendary, miraculous biography of R. Eli'ezer, to whom the midrash is attributed. Hagiographies concerning ten noted tanna'im were gathered to create the narrative of the *Ten Martyrs, which is closely connected to the literature of the ancient mystics of the Talmudic period, the yordei ha-merkavah. Talmudic hagiography combines miraculous biography with ethical teaching, often including examples within the framework of the narrative.

Hebrew literature of the Middle Ages continued to relate and elaborate on narratives about the Talmudic sages (as well as, of course, biblical figures, within the continuous process of the retelling of the biblical and Talmudic narratives). Hagiographies written between the eighth and fifteenth century concerning central figures of Jewish culture are brief and scattered showing a reluctance to attribute miraculous biographies to medieval leaders. The one clear exception is the evolution of a hagiographic cycle around the leaders of Ashkenazi Jewry in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, mainly around R. Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Ḥasid and his father, R. Shemu'el. In the sixteenth century hagiography became a central genre of literary and religious expression. Rabbi Gedalyah ben David ibn Yaḥya', who wrote the sixteenth-century historical-hagiographic work Shalshet ha-Qabbalah, was one of the first writers to present a cycle of stories about Rashi, Nahmanides, and others. Previously, stories about R. Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Ḥasid and his circle had been collected, and they were later translated into Yiddish and published in the Ma'aseh Book*. The best-known and most influential cycle was that around R. Yitshaq Luria, which evolved in the last years of the sixteenth century and was subsequently collected into Shivḥei ha-'Ari and Toledot ha-'Ari. A selection from the diary of Luria's disciple, R. Ḥayyim Vital, was published as Shivḥei ha-Raḥu. The Shabbatean movement of the seventeenth century created many narrative cycles around Shabbetai Tsevi and his prophet Nathan of Gaza. The Hasidic collection of narratives Shivḥei ha-Besht, about the Ba'al Shem Tov, the founder of Hasidism, is probably the most developed and influential Hebrew hagiographic work. Following the success of this work (which was published in 1815), many Hasidic and non-Hasidic hagiographic collections were published, their heroes ranging from R. Shneur Zalman of Lyady to Maimonides, Yehudah Liva' ben Betsal'el of Prague, and Avraham ibn Ezra. The period between 1865 and 1914 marks the peak of creativity in this field, but hagiography has continued throughout the twentieth century; several such collections devoted to the rabbi of the Lubavitcher Hasidim, Menahem Mendel Schneerson (died 1994) have been published.

HAGIZ FAMILY, family of Spanish origin that settled in Morocco and Erets Yisra'el, and in the sixteenth through the eighteenth century produced many rabbis and scholars.

Ya'aqov Hagiz (1620–1674), rabbinic scholar. Raised in the Sephardi rabbinic tradition, he migrated in 1645 from North Africa to Verona, Italy, where he established a Hebrew printing press. From there he traveled to Venice and Leghorn, where he continued to publish. His early works were intended to integrate former Marranos into the Jewish community. His commentary on the Mishnah, Ets ha-Ḥayyim (Verona, 1645), reflected the emphasis in Sephardi rabbinic circles on Mishnah study. In 1658 he established the yeshivah Beit Ya'aqov in Jerusalem, the most important Sephardi academy in Erets Yisra'el in the seventeenth century. His collection of responsa, Halakhot Qetanot (Venice, 1704), was one of the major halakhic works to emerge from his yeshivah. He hoped to ignite a spiritual revival of the Jewish community in Jerusalem, but his vision of building Jerusalem into a Jewish spiritual center turned into bitter disappointment at the eruption of the Shabbatean messianic movement, whose prophet, *Natan of Gaza, was his former disciple. He resolutely opposed the messianic movement from its inception. He translated Yitshaq Aboab's Menorat ha-Ma'or into Spanish (Leghorn, 1656).

Mosheh Hagiz (c.1671–1751), scholar and kabbalist; son of Ya'aqov. He was born in Jerusalem and migrated to western Europe, where he became an outspoken critic of the Sephardi communities for their lack of respect for rabbinic authority and their breaches in observance of the law. Author and editor of many halakhic and kabbalistic works, his chief renown derived from his relentless pursuit of suspected Shabbateans, against whom he orchestrated three major rabbinic campaigns: between 1713 and 1715, against Nehemyah *Ḥayon in Amsterdam; between 1725 and 1726 against Shabbatean emissaries in eastern Europe, including Yonatan *Eybeshuetz; and between 1730 and 1735 against the Italian writer and kabbalist Mosheh Ḥayyim *Luzzatto. Shever Posh'im (London/Amsterdam, 1714) is an example of Hagiz's virulent anti-Shabbatean polemics. His major work, Mishnat Hakhamim (Wandsbek, 1733), a compendium of rabbinic lore, appealed for restoration of rabbinic authority in Jewish society. He returned to Erets Yisra'el in 1738.

HA' I GA'ON (939–1038), ga'on of the Babylonian academy of *Pumbedita, which under his direction reached the zenith of its fame. A son of *Sherira' ben Ḥanina' Ga'on, Ha'i was appointed av beit din in 984 and succeeded to the office of ga'on upon his father's retirement in approximately 998. In addition to the traditional geonic activity of writing responsa, Ha'i followed a number of the precedents set by *Sa'adyah ben Yosef Ga'on; he wrote Judeo-Arabic monographs on selected legal topics, Hebrew liturgical poetry, and a Hebrew-Arabic dictionary entitled Kitab al-Hawi, covering Biblical and some Rabbinic Hebrew. Most of Ha'i's Arabic-language writings are still unpublished, but two of his major legal monographs were translated into Hebrew in his lifetime or shortly thereafter; these are Sefer ha-Meqaḥ veka-Memkar (on the law of sale; a Venice edition was published in 1602) and Sefer Mishpetei Shevu'ot (on judicial oaths; a Venice edition was published in 1602). At least one thousand of his responsa to queries from all parts of the Jewish world have been preserved. He was the author of prayers and piyyutim, notably five seliḥot for Tish'ah be-'Av. Ha'i was generally regarded as "the last of the ge'onim in time, but the first in eminence."

ḤAKHAM (חָכָם; wise man, sage), a term originally used in a general, descriptive sense (for example, in Proverbs) and applied to both Jews and non-Jews. Thus, the Talmud speaks repeatedly of ḥakhmei ummot ha-'olam, "the wise men of the nations of the world" (e.g., Pes. 93b). Subsequently ḥakham became a specific title in both Erets Yisra'el and Babylonia. In the tannaitic period, the office indicated by the title ḥakham was ranked third in the *Sanhedrin after the nasi' (president) and av beit din (head of the court of law) (Hor. 13b). The plural ḥakhamim is generally used in the Talmud to designate the majority of scholars as opposed to a single authority. In Sephardi communities, the title is given to fully ordained rabbis; in England, the chief Sephardi rabbi is called Haham. See also ḤAKHAM BASHI; ḤAZAL.

—SHMUEL HIMELSTEIN

ḤAKHAM BASHI (chief sage), under Turkish rule, the title accorded a chief rabbi who was recognized by the government as the representative of the Jewish community. The ḥakham bashi was originally granted wide powers (later curtailed) by the authorities, including the right to judge Jews, collect taxes, appoint rabbis, and even impose punishments. The term was also employed for leading provincial rabbis. This title was held by the chief rabbis of Turkey (who resided in Constantinople) and Egypt, as well as by the Sephardi chief rabbi of Erets Yisra'el until 1918. The Turkish ḥakham bashi wore special gold and silver garments, and Muslims as well as Jews were required to show him respect.

HAKHNASAT KALLAH (הַכְנָסַת כְּלָה; bringing in a bride [under the wedding canopy]), the provision of a dowry to a poor girl. According to a passage in the Talmud (Suk. 49b; see Rashi on Suk. 49b) the essential virtue of this good deed lay in the secret manner in which it was performed: the bride must not be put to shame. Hakhnasat kallah is one of the few good deeds that takes precedence even over the study of Torah (Meg. 3b). Since the Middle Ages special societies have existed for the purpose of hakhnasat kallah. The inclusion of this virtuous custom in the prayer-book version of Mishnah Pe'ah 1.2 as being one of those acts "the fruits of which a man enjoys in this world, while the stock remains for him in the world to come" has no basis in rabbinic literature but illustrates the great value attached to this act of charity.

ḤAKIM, SHEMU'EL HA-LEVI IBN (c.1480–1547), rabbinical scholar. He came from a family of Spanish origin that had settled in Cairo. Around 1527, he moved to Constantinople. Faced with problems caused by the arrival of Jewish and Marrano refugees from Spain, he issued rulings on the laws of personal status. He showed tolerance both to the Marranos and especially to the *Karaites. He classed the latter as "inadvertent sinners," allowing intermarriage with them and recognizing Karaite divorce.

HA' LAHMA' 'ANYA' (Aram.; הָאֵלֶּיךָ לֶחֶם אֲנִי; "This is the bread of affliction"), opening words of the introductory paragraph to the Seder service. The text is composite and varies slightly from rite to rite. In some rites, for example, it is preceded by the words "In haste did you go out of Egypt." Ha' Lahma' 'Anyah' is very old, though its exact date and provenance are the subject of debate. The invitation to all that are hungry to come and partake of the Pesah meal may presuppose that the Temple is no longer in existence, as does the conclusion to the passage, "Next year in Jerusalem . . . next year free."

• Joseph Elias, Passover Haggadah: With Translation and a New Commentary, 3d ed. (New York, 1994).

HALAKHAH (הלכה), a term that refers to the legal, as opposed to the nonlegal or aggadic (see AGGADAH), aspect of Judaism. It is also used to indicate a definitive ruling in any particular area of Jewish law. The Hebrew root of halakhah means "to go," and the Bible refers to the fulfillment of the Torah as the way in which the people "are to go" (Ex. 18.20). The use of the term halakhah may also serve as an indication of the dynamic quality of Jewish law.

The Written Law and Its Interpretation. The process of interpreting the written law begins in the Bible itself and reaches a high point with Ezra, who "interpreted the Torah" (Ezr. 7.10) in order to enable the people to "understand Scripture" (Neh. 8.1). The tanna'im continued this process, developing hermeneutical principles (see HERMENEUTICS) that were consolidated into the thirteen middot of R. Yishma'e'l ben Elisha' (Sifra, Introduction). The consensus among rabbinic authorities is that laws derived by means of these middot are biblical in nature (see I. Herzog, Main Institutions of Jewish Law [1965–1967]). A debate arose between the schools of R. Yishma'e'l and R. 'Aqiva' regarding the extent to which new laws could be legitimately derived from superfluous words in the biblical text. According to the school of R. Yishma'e'l, "the Torah speaks in the language of men"; hence not every apparent semantic redundancy should be used as the basis for deriving a new law. The school of R. 'Aqiva', however, rejected the idea that words in the Torah were there purely for literary effect and, as a result, derived halakhic rulings from particles such as and and if. Indeed, in a dramatic Talmudic passage, the view is recorded that the purpose of the decorative crowns attached to some of the letters in the Torah was to provide R. 'Aqiva' with grist for his hermeneutical mill (Men. 29b). The interpretation of the written law as a source for halakhah virtually ceased after the tannaitic period, and the focus of halakhic legal creativity shifted to the *Mishnah. This development is reflected in a significant change in the literary form of the *oral law. Prior to the redaction of the Mishnah, much of the rabbinic interpretation of scripture was recorded in the form of glosses to biblical passages, which are known by the generic term midrash halakhah. The Mishnah, however, sets out the oral law according to subject matter rather than biblical sources. Halakhic discussion since the Mishnah has, therefore, focused on the *Talmud rather than on the biblical text. There are two versions of the Talmud: the Talmud Yerushalmi and the Talmud Bavli. The latter became the more authoritative and is regarded as the final and overriding exposition of the oral law. The most powerful statement of the halakhic authority of the Talmud is found in Maimonides' introductory remarks to his Mishneh Torah: "All Israel is obliged to follow the matters stated in the Babylonian Talmud. Every city and every province are to be coerced to follow all the customs that the sages of the Talmud followed and to obey their decisions and follow their enactments since all the matters in the Talmud have been accepted by all Israel. And those sages who made the enactments or introduced the decrees or ordained the customs or decided the laws, teaching that the decision was so, were all the sages of Israel or the majority of them. And they heard by tradition the main principles of the whole Torah generation after generation reaching back to the generation of Moses our teacher."

Rules for deciding the halakhah in a Talmudic dispute are found in the Talmud itself and were refined and expanded by the savara'im, ge'onim, and ri'shonim. Of special significance is the principle of hilkhata' ke-vatrai, according to which the halakhah follows the rulings of the later authorities.

Rabbinic Legislation. The biblical source for the power of the rabbis to enact legislation is discussed in the Talmud (Shab. 21b), and Maimonides is of the view that it lies in the biblical charge to "act in accordance with the instructions given to you [by the Court]" and "not to deviate from that which they will tell you" (Dt. 17.10–11; Hilkhot Mamrim 1.1–2). Nahmanides opts for the less weighty verse: "Ask your father, he will inform you; your elders, they will tell you" (Dt. 32.7; Nahmanides' Glosses to Maimonides' Sefer ha-Mitsvot, Shores 1). A useful rule of thumb is that preventive enactments, such as muqtseh and not blowing the shofar on Ro'sh ha-Shanah when it falls on Shabbat, are called gezerot (see GEZERAH), whereas positive legislation, such as the ketubbah and Hillel's perozbol, is referred to by the term taqqanah*. In general, rabbinic legislation may not come into conflict with a negative biblical commandment, although exceptions are made in the cases of 'agunot and in cases where the maintenance of communal religious values are at stake (Yev. 16.17, 90b). The apparent contradiction between the power of the rabbis to legislate and the scriptural prohibition against adding to and subtracting from the Torah (Dt. 4.2, 13.1) is resolved, according to Maimonides, if it is made clear that the enactment is of rabbinic status only and that it is for the purpose of protecting or enhancing Torah law (Hilkhot Mamrim 2.9). In general, enactments must be accepted by the public before they become fully binding, but once they are widely accepted, they may not be overturned by a later court unless "it is greater in wisdom and numbers" than the enacting tribunal ('Eduy. 1.5; Hilkhot Mamrim 2.9). A significant body of medieval halakhah is devoted to communal enactments (taqqanot ha-qahal*), which regulated much of the public and administrative affairs of Jewish communities in the Middle Ages and at the dawn of modernity. The creation of the chief rabbinate under the British Mandate in Palestine in 1921 prompted R. Avraham Kook, the Ashkenazi chief rabbi, to suggest the taqqanah as the means by which the gap between halakhah and modernity might be resolved. To this end, a number of taqqanot were passed, including the establishment of a Rabbinical Appeals Court and the raising of the legal age of marriage. After this early period, however, the Israeli chief rabbinate virtually ceased to enact tagqanot, with the sole exception of R. Isaac Herzog, who prepared detailed tagqanot on matters of inheritance in the early years of the State.

Custom. In the Talmud, custom (minhag*) constitutes a means of resolving halakhic disputes in ritual matters (Ber. 45a; Pes. 66a) and is a source of halakhah in commercial and civil law (B. M. 74a). The principle that "custom overrides halakhah" is found only in the Jerusalem Talmud and is restricted to civil law. Customs in the ritual sphere that have no basis in halakhah ought, nevertheless, to be respected, provided that they do not conflict with any halakhic norm. Among the medieval authorities, R. Ya'aqov ben Me'ir Tam stands out as a principled opponent of non-halakhic customs (Tosafot, Ber. 48a, s.v. velet; B. B. 2a, s.v. bigvil), and his attitude is echoed by the eighteenth-century authority R. Yehezqel Landau of Prague (Noda' bi-Yehudah, Yoreh De'ah, Hilkhot Niddah no. 54). Custom played an important role in the development of Orthodoxy, which regarded the maintenance of stringent customs as a prerequisite for the preservation of Jewish life in the post-Emancipation period.

Precedent. Notwithstanding any doctrine of binding precedent (ma'aseh*) in the halakhah, the Talmud emphasizes the binding nature of decided cases (Yev. 46b) and the persuasive authority of practice (R. ha-Sh. 29b). The need to distinguish a precedent in terms of the facts of the case is a well-developed concept in Talmudic law (B. B. 130b; B. M. 36a). The importance of practical halakhah is an established principle in Jewish law and provides the basis for the significant normative authority enjoyed by responsa* in halakhic literature.

Rational Principles. The principle that one life may not be preferred over another is derived from a sevarah* (San. 74a), as is the procedural rule that in civil suits the burden of proof lies with the plaintiff (B. Q. 46b). Laws derived on the basis of sevarah possess biblical status.

Literary Sources of Halakhah. The two major sources of halakhah in post-Talmudic times are halakhic codes and rabbinic responsa. The most influential codes are the Sefer ha-Halakhah by R. Yitshaq Alfasi; the Mishneh Torah by Maimonides; Pisqei ha-Ro'sh by R. Asher ben Yehiel; Arba'ah Turim by R. Ya'aqov ben Asher; and the Shulhan 'Arukh by R. Yosef Karo, together with R. Moshe Isserles's Mappah. The Shulhan 'Arukh was chosen as the major code for expansion and development by later authorities, and this has remained the pattern in Orthodox circles. Rabbinic responsa constitute the dynamic side of halakhic literature and are the main source for the application of halakhah to the problems posed by modernity.

Halakhah and Ethics. The emancipation of European Jewry created a situation in which halakhah fell into disrepute in the eyes of many Jews eager to adapt to the ways of their non-Jewish environment. As a result, it was totally rejected as a way of life by the Reform movement. The Conservative movement maintains the belief that halakhah is central to Jewish life but seeks ways of bringing it into line with modern values. Orthodox Judaism strives to maintain its strong commitment to halakhah but recognizes the need to avoid falling into the trap of halakhic formalism. Modern Reform Judaism has developed a new interest in halakhah and has produced responsa on halakhic subjects from a Reform perspective. See also JEWISH LAW; MIDRASH.

HALAKHAH LE-MOSHEH MI-SINAI (הלכה למשה מסיני; a law [transmitted orally] to Moses from [Mount] Sinai), laws regarded by the Talmud, while never stated explicitly in scripture or derived from it, as having biblical authority. Since a number of these laws were clearly post-Mosaic, some medieval commentators noted that the term was also used to describe laws that were beyond any doubt, as if they had been given to Moses at Sinai. Shemu'el Safrai has shown that early rabbinic literature did not recognize a special category of laws given to Moses at Sinai and that the term is nothing more than a rabbinic flourish that originally was not meant to be taken literally. However, over time these laws were regarded as being in a class by themselves, irrefutable.

HALAKHOT GEDOLOT, a compilation of legal decisions from the geonic period. This ninth-century work is attributed by reliable authorities, including the last ge'onim (see GA'ON), to R. Shim'on Qayyara', of whom almost nothing is known. (Many medieval authors, especially in the Franco-German sphere, mistakenly attributed it to the better-known *Yehuda'i ben Nahman Ga'on.) The work incorporates a wide range of sources, most prominently the responsa of Aha' of Shabha and Halakhot Pesuqot, large sections of which are copied verbatim. Halakhot Gedolot was widely cited by medieval authors and probably constituted their most important source for the teachings of the geonic period. It was first published in Venice in 1548 and, most recently, edited by E. Hildesheimer (Berlin, 1888–1892; repr. Jerusalem, 1971–1987).

HALAKHOT PESUQOT, halakhic work from the geonic period. It was attributed to *Yehuda'i ben Nahman Ga'on, but this attribution is problematic.

Written in a mixture of Hebrew and Aramaic, it was soon translated both into Hebrew (Hilkhot Re'u) and into Arabic and served as the basis of the slightly later Halakhot Gedolot*. Halakhot Pesuqot represents the earliest known attempt to present a comprehensive digest of practical halakhah and combines abridged Talmudic passages with post-Talmudic formulations. Although the book was often quoted, it was not until 1911 that a partial manuscript was found in Yemen. It was published by Solomon Sassoon in 1950 (Sefer Halakhot Pesuqot le-Rav Yehuda'i Ga'on). The section "Hilkhot Terefot" was published by Mordecai Margalio in Talpioth 8 (1963): 307–330.

HALAKHOT QETSUVOT, an anonymous medieval halakhic code written in Hebrew, erroneously attributed to *Yehuda'i ben Naḥman Ga'on. It is topically arranged and treats selected subjects (largely related to the Sabbath and holidays) briefly, without citing Talmudic sources. It presents an amalgamation of Babylonian and Palestinian halakhic traditions but also contains a number of egregious errors. The work is thought to have originated in Italy in the ninth century, but supporting evidence is weak. It was first published by C. M. Horowitz in 1881 and then by Mordecai Margalio in Sefer Halakhot Qetsuvot Meyuhas le-Rav Yehuda'i Ga'on (1942).

HALBERSTAM, HAYYIM (1797–1876), Hasidic master. While serving as rabbi in Rudnik (from 1817), Halberstam became a disciple of R. Naftali of Ropczyce. After 1830, when Halberstam was appointed communal rabbi of Nowy Sącz in Western Galicia, he began to conduct himself as a Hasidic master as well. His renown as a Talmudic scholar served to advance the growing acceptance of Hasidism among the Galician learned elite. Beginning in 1869, Halberstam conducted a campaign against the luxurious lifestyles of the Friedmann dynasty of Ruzhin. This controversy lasted some thirty years and caused great consternation and internal division within Hasidism. Halberstam's teachings are contained in Divrei Hayyim (Mukachevo, 1887–1888). He was the progenitor of an important Hasidic dynasty, the descendants of which include the rabbis of Sieniawa, Klausenburg, and Bobowa.

journed in Frankfurt, London, Paris, Pressburg, and Homburg, but in 1902 he settled in Hamburg, where he was appointed rabbi. An outspoken advocate of Orthodox Judaism, Halevy helped establish the *Agudat Israel in 1912, as well as the Frankfurt Jüdisch-Literarisch Gesellschaft in 1901. Halevy's contribution to scholarship, Dorot ha-Ri'shonim (6 vols. [1897–1964]), attempted to reestablish the centrality of tradition to Jewish scholarship and challenged the various nineteenth-century critical, historical conceptualizations of the rabbinic tradition (Naḥman Krochmal, Shelomoh Yehudah Leib Rapoport, Zacharias Frankel, Heinrich Graetz).

HALLAH (חֻלָּה), name of a dough offering and of a Mishnaic tractate.

Dough Offering. Hallah is the part of the dough separated out as a gift for the priest (Nm. 15.7–21). Any dough made from the flour of wheat, barley, spelt, rye, or oats (Hal. 1.1), and no less in volume than approximately three pounds, twelve ounces, was subject to the laws of hallah. The amount to be separated out was one twenty-fourth of the "dough of the householder" or one forty-eighth of the "dough of the baker." Hallah had the same ritual status as the heave offering (terumah*) and was originally obligatory in Erets Yisra'el only. In order that the precept should not be forgotten, however, the rabbis ordained its observance throughout the Diaspora. After the destruction of the Temple the separated portion could no longer be given to the priest; it was therefore burnt. Since it is usually the woman who bakes in the home, the dictate of hallah is enjoined particularly upon her (Shab. 2.7): she takes a tiny quantity of the dough (the size of an olive), as a symbolic reminder, throws it into the oven or fire to be burned, and recites a special blessing. The loaves baked for Sabbath and festival meals are called hallot, since their preparation provides one with the opportunity to perform the duty of separating out the hallah portion.

Tractate. The tractate Hallah is in Mishnah order Zera'im and consists of four chapters, with related material in the Tosefta' and in the Talmud Yerushalmi. It deals with the biblical command to separate hallah from "the first of your kneading trough" (Nm. 15.20) as a heave offering to God. Even though the taking of hallah is biblically mandated only "when you come into the land" (Nm. 15.18), the Mishnah requires its separation for dough produced in Erets Yisra'el from grain grown elsewhere. There is some controversy regarding dough produced outside Erets Yisra'el from Israel-grown grain. Hallah is an important source for the halakhic definition of the boundaries of the land of Israel, as well as the halakhic definition of bread.

The Mishnah tractate was translated into English by Herbert Danby in The Mishnah (Oxford, 1933).

HALLEL (הלל; praise), a generic term for "praise with psalms," of which there are three known varieties: the Egyptian, the Great, and the Daily Hallel. The most widely known is the Egyptian Hallel (Ps. 113–118), so named because of the reference to the Exodus in Psalms 114.1. The Daily Hallel (Ps. 145–150) is recited every morning as part of the synagogue service, and the Great Hallel (Ps. 136) is featured as part of the Pesah Seder along with the Egyptian Hallel (see Pes. 118a). The Egyptian Hallel is recited in the synagogue after the morning service on the *Shalosh Regalim and on Hanukkah. The custom originated in Temple times when Hallel was recited during the offering of the pilgrims' sacrifices on Pesah eve, while the paschal lambs were being slaughtered, and again that night when they were eaten during the Seder (Pes. 5.7; 10.5–7; see HAGGADAH OF PESAḤ). Talmudic sources indicate different manners of reciting the Hallel, either antiphonally, with the reader and congregation chanting alternate verses, or by the reader reciting aloud the entire Hallel with the congregation responding "hallelujah" after each verse, as is still the practice in the Yemenite rite. Among Ashkenazi Jews, it is usual for the congregation to recite each chapter silently and for the reader to repeat the conclusions aloud, but some passages are sung jointly. The latter verses of Psalm 118 are read twice to preserve the symmetry that marks the first part of the psalm. In some congregations, the Hallel is also recited on Pesah eve in the synagogue. From the second day of Pesah on (outside Erets Yisra'el, from the third day), an abbreviated Hallel, omitting the first parts of Psalm 115 and Psalm 116, is used. This shorter version (known as Half Hallel) is also recited on Ro'sh Hodesh; Hallel was not read in ancient Israel on this occasion and is hence not obligatory. A benediction is recited before the reading of Hallel (though not on Pesah eve) and after it; authorities differ as to whether the blessing should be recited or omitted on Ro'sh Hodesh. On Purim no Hallel is read because according to the Talmud the reading of Esther takes its place. It is also recited each day during Hanukkah. In most synagogues in the State of Israel today, Hallel is read on Yom ha-'Atsma'ut, although the recitation of the benediction on this occasion is disputed. On Sukkot the worshipers hold the lulav and etrog in their hand during Hallel and shake them while reciting Psalms 118.1–4, 25, and 29. It is customary for the congregation to stand during the recitation of Hallel. Genizah discoveries have shown that alternative psalms were used in the past. Alternative forms, especially in the Daily Hallel, are also to be found in modern usage.

HALLELUJAH ("Praise [ye] the Lord"), liturgical exclamation occurring at the beginning and end of many psalms; in the Talmudic period it served as a congregational response during the recitation of the Great *Hallel (Suk. 3.10). The word also has become an inseparable part of the Christian tradition of praise and worship.

HALUQQAḤ (הלוקק; distribution), financial support given from the end of the eighteenth century onward to pious Ashkenazi Jews in the four holy cities of Jerusalem, Hebron, Safed, and Tiberias. From the beginning of Second Temple times, Diaspora Jewry sent assistance to Jerusalem (Ezr. 1.6) and the custom endured in all periods of Jewish settlement in the *Holy Land. This was regarded as the continuation of the *shekel tax sent to the Temple. Thus in the Mishnaic period, leading rabbis traveled extensively to collect money for the Palestinian academies; shelihei Tsiyyon (emissaries of Zion) were sent abroad with a similar object in amoraic and geonic times. In 1623 Yesha'yahu Horowitz, chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Jerusalem, organized fixed help from communities in central Europe (see ME'ER BA'AL HA-NES). The modern concept of haluqqah dates from the Hasidic immigration of 1777. The nineteenth century saw the proliferation in the four cities of small communities (kolelim) that distributed the money collected abroad. Special emissaries (see MESHULLAḤ; also known as shadar [shaliah de-rabbanan]), many of them distinguished Torah scholars, were sent to Jewish communities throughout the world to solicit funds for the support of scholars, pious Torah students, and the poor of the Holy Land. By 1913, 80 percent of the Ashkenazi communities in Jerusalem lived on haluqqah, and there were twenty-nine kolelim; for example, Kolel Austria-Galicia, Kolel Holland-Germany, and Kolel Pinsk. Support from Europe came to an end with World War II, but Orthodox Jews in the United States still contribute considerable funds to maintain pious Jews in Erets Yisra'el who devote themselves to rabbinical studies.

HAMA' BAR HANINA' (3d cent.), Palestinian amora'. He resided in Sepphoris, where his father, the more prominent R. *Hanina' bar Hama', headed an academy. Both of them were wealthy, a subject sometimes alluded to in Talmudic anecdotes (Y., Pe'ah 8.9, 21b). Hama' is known especially for his aggadic interpretations (frequently transmitted by R. Levi, most notably in Tanḥuma'-Yelammedenu); his halakhic teachings are less common (e.g., Shab. 147b). The saying "Great is repentance, for it brings healing to the world" (Yoma 86a) is attributed to him.

HAMAN, chief minister of King Ahasuerus of Persia and Media. As related in the Book of Esther, Haman secured a royal decree for the destruction of the Jews, ultimately based on *Mordecai's refusal to bow down before him, but his scheme was frustrated by *Esther. Haman and his sons were hanged on the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai. Haman is the central object of scorn in the celebration of the holiday of Purim, and his name is traditionally greeted with derisive interruptions during the synagogal reading of the Book of Esther. Haman is identified as a descendant of Agag the Amalekite, and his name has become a term for Jew-baiters.

HA-MAVDIL (הַמַּבְדִּיל; He Who Separates), piyyut* recited at the end of the *Havdalah ceremony. It alludes to the opening formula of the Birkat ha-Mavdil and to themes of the Yom Kippur *Ne'ilah service. It includes a request for God's forgiveness for wrongdoing and for a manifold progeny. It may have been originally intended for the Ne'ilah service, where it is recited in the Algerian rite. Following the acrostic, it has been attributed to Yitshaq ben Ghayyat (Spain, 11th cent.), but this is by no means certain, and there are other versions or elaborations in the various rites.

HAMESH MEGILLOT (הַחֲמִשָּׁה מִגִּלּוֹת; Five Scrolls), the biblical books Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther (see also BIBLE). In ancient times, all biblical books were written on scrolls; these five (as well as the *Torah) are regularly written on scrolls even today. The reason for their special designation is that they are read aloud, annually, in the synagogue, on fixed occasions. The most important of the five is Esther (known simply as the Megillah), read on Purim evening and morning; according to the sages, this practice was ordained by Mordecai and Esther themselves. Almost as ancient is the mournful, public reading of Lamentations on the eve of Tish'ah be-'Av (and in some congregations also on the morning), in commemoration of the destruction of the Temple. The custom of reading the other three scrolls in the synagogue is not universal and developed gradually. The Song of Songs, traditionally viewed as an allegory of God's "marriage" to Israel, which commenced with the Exodus from Egypt, is read on the Sabbath during Pesah; Ruth is read on Shavu'ot, in light of its connection with the barley harvest and also because of its association with David, who traditionally was born and died on this date; Ecclesiastes is read on the Sabbath of Sukkot because of the book's preoccupation, however cynical, with joy and gladness. Only Esther is required to be read from an actual scroll; the other four often are read from scrolls (particularly in Ashkenazi congregations in Israel) but are just as likely to be read from a printed Bible. Today, most printed Bibles arrange these five books according to the order of the occasions on which they are read, beginning with Song of Songs.

HAMETS (חָמֵץ; leaven), an agent of fermentation and the subject of biblical prohibitions of a ritual nature. The halakhah defines hamets as dough that has been kneaded from flour and water and allowed to stand until it has soured. In commemoration of the *Exodus, when the Israelites in leaving Egypt could not wait until their dough leavened (Ex. 12.39), only unleavened foods are permitted during *Pesah; for, "whosoever shall consume leaven, that soul shall be cut off from the congregation of Israel" (Ex. 15.19). Hamets was also barred in the Temple meal offering (cf. Lv. 2.11). For a dough to be considered hamets, it must have stood for approximately eighteen minutes, after which time it is presumed to have begun fermenting. According to biblical law, only dough made from the five kinds of grain (hamesh minim), wheat, barley, spelt, rye, and oats, is considered hamets. Ashkenazim prohibit rice, corn, and millet and also forbid a range of legumes, including beans and peas. Whisky and other alcoholic beverages made from the fermentation of any of the five species of grain are also prohibited on Pesah. All hamets is to be removed before Pesah; food prepared for Pesah is rendered unfit for consumption if even the smallest amount of hamets falls into it. Shortly before Pesah, a thorough search of one's premises is undertaken in order to ensure that no hamets remains there (see BEDIQAT HAMETS). Any hamets found is burned the following morning (see BI'UR HAMETS), after which no benefit may be derived from hamets until after the festival. Hamets that may unknowingly have remained is declared ownerless. Where there was a large amount of hamets, it was feared that the owner might not wholeheartedly nullify his possession of it or destroy it. The custom, therefore, arose of selling the hamets to a non-Jew for a nominal sum and repurchasing it after Pesah.

HAMMURABI (r. 1792–1750), one of the eleven kings of the first dynasty of Babylon and one of the most celebrated of all ancient Mesopotamian monarchs. Like the other kings of this dynasty, he was of Amorite origin. The main historicopolitical achievement of Hammurabi and his dynasty was the elevation of the previously little known city-state of Babylon to the status of capital city and cultural metropolis of southern Mesopotamia (which eventually came to be known as Babylonia, while northern Mesopotamia was designated Assyria). The period of Hammurabi's reign is the best documented of any Babylonian king, and his numerous letters and the Code of Hammurabi have become standard texts for learning the classic Old Babylonian dialect of the Akkadian (Assyro-Babylonian) language. The Code of Hammurabi, written toward the end of his reign and the single most famous Old Babylonian document (one of the most important sources for comparative studies in biblical and ancient Near Eastern literature), is not a comprehensive law code, but a collection of almost exclusively casuistic laws on various subjects, one of twelve such collections written in Sumerian, Akkadian, and Hittite from approximately the end of the third millennium until the end of the eighth century BCE. In the epilogue to this text, Hammurabi claimed to have written the laws ("my precious words") in order to merit the title "the king of justice," thereby justifying his selection by the gods "so that the mighty not wrong the weak." The canonical nature of this text is evidenced by its having been recopied for use in the Mesopotamian scribal schools for more than a thousand years after Hammurabi's death.

HANAN'EL BEN HUSHI'EL (c.990–1055), rabbinic scholar and commentator. He was born in Kairouan, North Africa, where he succeeded his father as head of the academy. His concise and lucid commentary on the Talmud, one of the first such works to be written, became a classic of Jewish literature and was much used by later commentators. He concentrated on summarizing the text and finding the halakhah without further commentary, a method that was copied by later North African and Spanish scholars. He paid careful attention to the text of the Talmud, studying all of the available manuscripts. Of his commentary on the Bible, only citations in other works have been preserved. Like his father (who may have been of Italian origin), he wrote and spoke Hebrew, not Arabic. Both wrote succinctly, and Hushi'el was able to summarize a whole page of the Talmud in a few sentences. Hanan'el often compared the Talmud Bavli and Talmud Yerushalmi, which was unusual for that time. Later generations called him ga'on, and Yitshaq Alfasi regarded himself as a disciple of Hanan'el, who lived at the end of the geonic period and is regarded as one of the first of the ri'shonim*. While Hanan'el's commentaries on the Talmud were very influential, they were only rediscovered in the nineteenth century, and the first selections were incorporated in the 1880 Vilna edition of the Talmud.

HANANIAH, MISHAEL, AND AZARIAH, *Daniel's three companions at Nebuchadnezzar's court (who were given the Babylonian names Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego), who underwent a three-year preparatory course before entering the king's service. At the termination of this period, during which they strictly abided by the dietary laws, eating only legumes, they were found to be ten times more skilled than all the king's magicians and soothsayers (Dn. 1). According to the narrative tale in Daniel 3, they were thrown into a fiery furnace when they refused the king's order to worship his image, but they were miraculously saved, totally unharmed. Two other tales, The Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Young Men, which appear in the Apocrypha, have been preserved in the Catholic Bible.

HANINA' BAR HAMA' (2d–3d cent.), Babylonian and Palestinian amora'. Born to a priestly family in Babylonia, he prospered as a honey trader (and also practiced medicine) before settling in Erets Yisra'el with his son *Hama' bar Hanina'. There he studied with R. Yehudah ha-Nasi', adhering to his teachings with such carefulness (Y., Nid. 2.7, 50b) that he once boasted that if the entire Torah were forgotten, he could recover it all through his sharpness (Ket. 103b). He was ordained by R. Hiyya' ben Abba', eventually succeeding R. Afes as the head of the Sepphoris academy. The academy was built through the generosity of Hanina'. He is mentioned hundreds of times in both Talmuds, and nearly sixty sages pass on teachings in his name. His foremost students include R. Yohanan bar Nappaha' (whom Hanina' claimed to have taught aggadot for the entire Bible, with the exception of only Proverbs and Ecclesiastes; Y., Hor. 3.4, 48b), Shim'on ben Laqish, and R. El'azar ben Pedat. He was blessed with exceptional longevity but lost a son and daughter at young ages. In one extraordinary instance he is credited with resurrecting the slain slave of the emperor ('A. Z. 10b), but he is not otherwise prominent as a miracle worker. His devotion to Erets Yisra'el was such that he was strongly opposed to anyone, especially a priest, leaving the land, even to perform a meritorious deed (Y., Mo'ed Q. 3.1, 81a). Although he emphasized the role of providence, he taught that piety was an individual choice, albeit influenced by divine destiny (Ber. 33b). He believed that Jerusalem was destroyed in 70 CE because the people failed to rebuke each other (Shab. 119b), a practice from which he did not shrink, occasionally angering the people of Sepphoris. He welcomed the Sabbath with the words "Let us go to greet the Queen Sabbath" (Shab. 119a) and he taught an interpretation of Isaiah 54.13, reading bonayikh (your builders) for banayikh (your sons), to mean that Torah scholars increase peace in the world (Ber. 64a), a saying that has been incorporated into the prayer book.

HANINA' BEN DOSA' (1st cent.), Palestinian *tanna' known for his asceticism and for his saintliness. Many miracles were ascribed to him, and his prayer and intercession (especially for the sick, cf. Ber. 34b) were considered to be of particular efficacy. Thus when the son of R. *Yohanan ben Zakk'ai became sick, Yohanan turned to his friend Hanina' ben Dosa' and requested that he pray for him. Hanina' ben Dosa' put his hand between his knees, prayed briefly, and the lad was healed. Virtually no halakhic traditions have come down in the name of Hanina' ben Dosa', only moral and ethical statements. One of his most famous ones, which characterizes his personality, is "He in whom the spirit of mankind finds pleasure, the spirit of God finds pleasure; but he in whom the spirit of mankind finds no pleasure, in him the spirit of God finds no pleasure" (Avot 3.13).

HANINA' BEN TERADYON (2d cent.), Palestinian *tanna'; head of the academy at Sikhnin in Upper Galilee. A man of scrupulous honesty, he was entrusted with the allocation of charitable funds. He never stopped teaching the Torah, even after it had been forbidden by the Romans. Forewarned by his colleague R. Yosei ben Qisma', he nonetheless continued his educational activities until the Romans arrested him. As punishment, he was wrapped in a Torah scroll and burned alive. His daughter *Beruryah was the wife of R. *Me'ir.

HANINA' SEGAN HA-KOHANIM (c.50–90), tanna' who, from his title, would appear to have served as deputy *high priest. He himself explained this position as referring to the priest who would take over from the high priest should he become unfit for Temple service (Yoma 39a). After the destruction of the Temple (70 CE), Hanina' cited several testimonies concerning priestly ritual and Temple service (e.g., 'Eduy. 2.1–2.3; Zev. 12.4; Men. 10.1). Having seen the internal strife in Jerusalem prior to its destruction, he declared: "Great is peace, which may be weighed against all the works of creation" (Sifrei on Nm. 42). He further declared that one should pray for the peace of the authorities, for without respect for authority "man devours his neighbor" (Avot 3.2). The most important pursuit, according to Hanina, is study of Torah, which protects a person from all manner of dangers (Avot de-Rabbi Natan 20).

HANNAH, mother of *Samuel; along with Peninnah, one of the two wives of Elkanah. She was barren and was constantly tormented by Peninnah, who was able to bear children. As a result, Hannah made a pilgrimage to the shrine at Shiloh, vowing that, were she to give birth, she would dedicate her son as a *Nazirite to the worship of God. *Eli, the priest of Shiloh, at first thought that the prayer she silently uttered was that of a drunken woman. Upon realizing her intent, he assured her that her prayer would be answered. She subsequently gave birth to Samuel and fulfilled her vow by bringing the child to the sanctuary at Shiloh when he was three years old (I Sm. 1) and gave expression to her thankfulness by uttering a moving hymn to God (I Sm. 2.1–10). Later she bore three more sons and two daughters (I Sm. 2.21).

HANNAH AND HER SEVEN SONS, a story originating in 2 Maccabees and elaborated upon by the author of 4 Maccabees, about a woman (her name is never mentioned) who, together with her seven sons, chose to die at the hands of *Antiochus IV Epiphanes (in c.167 BCE) rather than abandon the Jewish way of life. While the books of the Maccabees were preserved only by Christian copyists, the story of the mother and her seven sons appears several times in rabbinic literature. The nameless mother of 2 Maccabees was given a name, Miriam, and the story of the family's martyrdom was transposed from the second century BCE to the Hadrianic persecutions of the second century CE. It is clear that the author of the tenth-century Book of Yosippon was familiar with the Latin translation of 2 Maccabees, since the story appears within its original Maccabean context, and the woman's name is given as Hannah. Yosippon's great popularity, as well as the story's appeal for subsequent generations of persecuted Jews, guaranteed the story of Hannah and her seven sons a wide diffusion in later Jewish literature and lore. Both the Western church and the Eastern church adopted Hannah and her sons as the "Maccabean saints," to whom an annual commemoration day was dedicated.

HANNOVER, NATAN NETA' (died 1683), chronicler of the 1648 Cossack massacres of Polish Jews. Born in Volhynia, he studied at the Ostróg Yeshivah before settling in Zaslav. He fled the Chmielnicki rebellion in the Ukraine in 1648, going to Germany, Holland, and, in 1653, Italy, where he studied Kabbalah. There he published his Hebrew chronicle, Yeven Metsulah, in which he described the sufferings of the Jews in the first two years of the rebellion. He felt that these events were heralding the messianic era. He later published a Hebrew-

German-Latin-Italian phrase book, Safah Berurah (1660), and a kabbalistic prayer book, Sha'arei Tsiyyon (1662). In 1662 he was appointed rabbi of Jassy, Walachia, later moving to Ungarisch-Brod in Moravia, where he was killed by Turkish soldiers. His three major works greatly influenced Ashkenazi society, his prayer book serving as a conduit for the introduction of Lurianic prayers into the daily service. Yeven Metsulah remained popular for generations. There have been numerous editions of the text, the most recent one by Israel Halpern (Tel Aviv, 1966), and the book has often been translated into Yiddish (the best edition being that of Shatzky [Vilna, 1938]) and a number of other languages, including English (Abyss of Despair, translated by A. Mesch [1950]).

HANOKH BEN MOSHEH (died 1014), Spanish rabbinical scholar; son of *Mosheh ben Hanokh. He succeeded his father as rabbi of Cordova (c.965) and, in essence, as the chief rabbi of Muslim Spain. The appointment was a subject of competition, and the Umayyad ruler appears to have intervened to secure his appointment as nasi' and head of the yeshivah. He continued his father's efforts to establish a Torah center in Spain, which would be independent of the Babylonian authorities. In view of his great scholarship he was given the title ga'on. HA-NOTEN TESHU'AH LA-MELAKHIM (הַנּוֹתֵן תְּשׁוּעָה לַמְּלָכִים; "He who gives salvation to kings" [Ps. 144.10]), the customary formula for prayers for the government, which probably originated in Spain. The duty to pray for the welfare of the authorities in whatever land Jews happened to live was first stated by the prophet Jeremiah ("Seek the peace of the city whither I have caused you to be carried captive, and pray for it unto the Lord" [29.7]) and reinforced by the Mishnah ("pray for the welfare of the government" [Avot 3.2]). Prayer for the government as a regular feature of the synagogue service is first attested in the fourteenth century, but an earlier version is known from the eleventh-century Rhineland. Various changes have been introduced into the wording of the prayer as a result of political and other circumstances, such as the change from monarchies to republican forms of government. In many congregations the prayer, or part of it, is said in the vernacular (in the Spanish and Portuguese synagogue in Amsterdam, it is still recited in Portuguese). In the United States, the Orthodox retain the traditional form, but the non-Orthodox have adapted original versions (see TEFILLAH LI-SHELOM HA-MEDINAH). It is usually recited on Sabbaths and festivals after the reading of the Torah.

HANUKKAH (הַנּוֹכַח; dedication), festival (also known as Hag ha-Urim [the Festival of Lights]) commemorating the rededication of the Second Temple by *Judah the Maccabee on 25 Kislev 165 BCE, the third anniversary of its desecration by *Antiochus IV Epiphanes. The historical source for the festival is found in 1 Maccabees. The concluding sentence of the special prayer for Hanukkah (*Al ha-Nissim) inserted in the Amidah and Birkat ha-Mazon, "And thereupon your children came into the shrine of your house . . . and did light lamps in your holy courts, and appointed these eight days to be kept with praise and thanksgiving . . . and we thank your great name," accords with the statement in 1 Maccabees 4.49: "and Judah and his brethren and the whole congregation of Israel ordained that the days of the dedication of the altar should be kept in their seasons from year to year for eight days from the 25th day of Kislev." Talmudic legend (Shab. 21b), in a poetic embellishment of the historical reason, states that the festival was instituted for eight days because the pure oil found in the Temple, though sufficient for one day only, miraculously burned for eight days until new supplies could be provided; in fact, the length of the festival was probably determined by analogy to the eight-day festival of Sukkot (1 Mac. 10). The emphasis placed by the rabbis on Zechariah 2.14-4.7 (the prophetic portion for the first Sabbath of Hanukkah, which includes the penultimate verse, "Not by might nor by power, but by my spirit, says the Lord of Hosts") is one example of the pronounced tendency on their part (possibly against the background of the dispute between the Pharisees and the Hasmonians) to diminish the military aspect of the festival and concentrate instead on the aspect of the survival of religious values in the face of pagan and idolatrous opposition. In modern times, especially in the State of Israel, the opposite tendency is to be noted. The festival may also have been influenced by the eight-day dedication by *Solomon of the First Temple. The main feature of the celebration is the kindling of the eight-branched menorah (Mod. Heb. hanukkiyah) from a light placed in a ninth socket (shammash), followed almost everywhere by the singing of the *Ma'oz Tsur hymn (originally in the Ashkenazi rite only). Sephardim also recite Psalm 30. The lights are inserted on successive nights incrementally from right to left, but the actual lighting is from left to right; that is, beginning with the most recent addition.

The view of the school of Hillel that one light is kindled the first night and one successively added every following night prevailed over the opinion of the school of Shamm'ai that eight candles are lit on the first night and are thereafter decreased by one each night. Halakhically, in the absence of any males, the obligation to kindle the Hanukkah lights falls on females. The candlelabrum should be kindled in a prominently visible place "to advertise the miracle" (cf. Shab. 23b). Hanukkah is the only nonbiblical festival on which the full *Hallel (Ps. 113–18) is recited, and the special scriptural reading consists of the passage that describes the gifts brought by the princes for the dedication of the Sanctuary in the wilderness (Nm. 7). Work is permitted during the festival, but not while the candles are burning. A number of children's games became popular (notably spinning the Hanukkah top—dreidl or trendl in Yiddish; sevivon in Hebrew), and the custom also developed of giving children monetary gifts (Hanukkah gelt) and presents. In the United States, the festival has become one of the most observed of Jewish holidays, especially for children, partly to present a parallel to Christmas, which falls in the same period of the year.

HAQDAMAH (הקדמה; introduction). Jewish works began to carry introductions during the geonic period; the first known haqdamah appeared in Halakhot Gedolot. Introductions were very popular in medieval times, and there is even a famous introduction to the Talmud that was composed during this period and falsely attributed to Shemu'el ha-Nagid. Authors often discussed important methodological issues in introductions and explained what motivated them to compose their works. Some of these introductions are so significant that they are works in themselves. Especially notable are those introductions written by Maimonides. The haqdamah to his Sefer ha-Mitsvot provides a detailed explanation of his method of enumerating the commandments, without which the work as a whole would be incomprehensible. This introduction became the starting point for all later discussions of enumeration of the mitsvot. Maimonides' haqdamah to the tenth chapter of tractate Sanhedrin is of great theological significance. It is here that his famed *Thirteen Principles of Faith are found. The introductions of Yosef Karo and Moshe Isserles to the Shulhan 'Arukh, however, have been omitted in almost all editions of this work that have appeared in the last few hundred years. In modern times introductions continue to serve a valuable literary aid, and hardly any traditional works are published without them.

HAQHEL (הקהל; assemble), ceremony observed in Biblical times every seven years in the year following the shemittah*. This is based on Deuteronomy 31.10–13: "And Moses commanded them saying, 'At the end of every seven years, at the set time of the year of release, at the feast of booths . . . Assemble the people, . . . so they may hear and learn to fear the Lord your God, and be careful to do all the words of this law . . .'" The Mishnah (Sot. 7.8) connects this assembly with Deuteronomy 17.14–20 and describes a ceremony on the second day of Sukkot in which the king read selected verses of Deuteronomy from a Torah scroll and then blessed the people gathered in the Temple courtyard. In recent years, there has been an attempt to revive a symbolic form of this practice at the Western Wall.

HAQQAFOT (חֲקָפוֹת; circuits), three types of processional circuits made on various ceremonial occasions.

Circuits around the Bimah in the Synagogue. During Sukkot*, a single circuit is made daily (except on the Sabbath); worshipers carry the four species and are accompanied by the singing of the day's hosh'anut, in commemoration of the daily festival circuit around the altar in the Temple (Suk. 4.5). On Hosh'ana* Rabbah, there are seven such haqqafot recalling a similar custom in the Temple. On Simhat Torah* (Hasidim outside Israel commence on Shemini 'Atseret), members (among the Orthodox, only male) of the congregation, led by children carrying flags, participate in carrying all the Torah scrolls from the ark in seven (or more) haqqafot. These are held both on the eve and morning (among most Reform congregations, only on the eve) of Simhat Torah. In Israel it is customary to have additional haqqafot, often in the open and to musical accompaniment, on the evening following Simhat Torah. At the dedication of a new synagogue, seven haqqafot are made with the Torah scrolls.

Circuits at the Cemetery. In consecrating a new cemetery, an extension to an existing one, or a cemetery wall, seven haqqafot are made to the recitation of appropriate biblical passages. Sephardim make seven haqqafot around the grave prior to burial. In the past it was the custom to pray for the sick while circumambulating the cemetery.

Circuits at a Wedding. In many Orthodox Ashkenazi communities the bride is led around the bridegroom three (or seven) times during the wedding ceremony.

HAREDIM (חֲרֵדִים; awestruck [at God's Word] ones [cf. Ezr. 10.3; Is. 66.5]), a term commonly reserved for those Orthodox Jews who claim not to make any compromises with contemporary secular culture or essential changes in the way they practice their Judaism from what tradition and halakhah have sanctified. Although Haredim, constituting about 250,000 of Israel's Jews and about 105,000 of America's, appear to constitute a single group, they are subdivided into Hasidim, who follow particular charismatic rabbis (rebbe's), and Benei Yeshivah, who identify with particular academies of Jewish learning and an academy's leading scholar (ro'sh yeshivah), students, and interpretive traditions. Sustaining their values and lifestyle, Haredim believe, requires them to maintain a social solidarity among themselves and a cultural distance from (and often a hostility toward) the surrounding larger secular society. They use relatively simple mechanisms to accomplish this. These include dressing in ways that make them clearly stand apart from surrounding culture. For men, this means wearing beards and ear locks, as well as caftans and black hats; for women, it means modest clothing that covers most of their bodies and, for the married among them, a head covering that may range from a kerchief over a shorn head for the most extreme to a wig for those less so (variations are determined by sectarian affiliation). Haredim also distinguish themselves by living in relatively insular communities and by speaking *Yiddish. They send their children to private Jewish schools, most often arrange their marriages, and are overwhelmingly endogamous.

HAROSET (חֲרֹסֶת), traditionally a mixture of ground apples, walnuts, almonds, cinnamon, and other spices combined into a thick paste with wine, but various recipes are used in different communities. Haroset is one of the ingredients on the *Seder plate on Pesah eve, serving as a dip for the bitter herbs. In ancient times haroset was used as a vegetable dressing. The Talmud (Pes. 116a) states that the clay-like appearance of haroset recalls the mortar used by the Israelite slaves in Egypt.

HARVEST FESTIVALS. In biblical times the occasion of the harvest was one of merrymaking and dancing, as at the grape harvest (Jgs. 9.27; Is. 16.10; Jer. 48.33). All the *Shalosh Regalim are specifically referred to in the Bible as harvest festivals, and it has been suggested that this was their original significance among the ancient Canaanites. *Pesah is the occasion for bringing "a sheaf of the first fruits of your harvest to the priest" (Lv. 23.10). Also called the Festival of the *Omer, Pesah is when the offering of barley was brought to the Temple. The holiday of *Shavu'ot marks the time when "you reap the harvest of your land" (Lv. 23.22), and the solemn ceremony of thanksgiving (Dt. 26) took place when the wheat ripened and the *first fruits were brought to Jerusalem. *Sukkot is referred to as "the harvest festival" and "the feast of ingathering, which is the end of the year, when you have gathered in your labors from the field" (Ex. 23.16; see also Ex. 34.22). In the Diaspora, the agricultural aspects of these festivals were overshadowed by the historical significance. In modern Israel, they have been revived, especially in rural settlements. HASHKAMAH (הַשְׁכָּמָה; early rising), term used to denote an early morning service, ending before the commencement of the official morning prayers. The expression hashkamat beit ha-midrash signifies "timely attendance" at services (Shab. 127a).

HASHKAHAH. See ASHKAVAHA.

HASHKIVENU (הַשְׁכִּיבֵנוּ; "Cause us [O Lord our God] to lie down [in peace]"), opening words of the second benediction following the evening *Shema' (the first being the *Ge'ullah); a prayer for divine protection and peace during the night. The wording differs slightly in various rites, and there are certain differences between the weekday and the Sabbath and festival versions of the prayer, the latter being a Palestinian version (cf. Y., Ber. 4.5) and the former of Babylonian origin (cf. Ber. 4b, 9b). Hashkivenu has also been incorporated in the night prayers (see QERI'AT SHEMA' 'AL HA-MITTAH).

HASID (חֲסִיד; pious man), a term occasionally applied to God, who loves righteousness and kindness (Jer. 3.12; Ps. 145.17). As a designation of a social group, the term first appears in the Second Temple period. The First Book of the Maccabees 2.42 mentions *Hasideans (Gr. Asidaioi [Pietists]), who opposed the Hellenizers and supported the Hasmonean Revolt. There are a variety of meanings for the word hasid as used in Talmudic literature. In legal contexts, a hasid is one who forgoes his rights and acts beyond the requirements of halakhah. Frequently, it refers to the pious and God-fearing without further qualification. At the end of the twelfth century and during the thirteenth century the term was applied in the Rhineland to pietistic groups known for their ascetic and penitential zeal. The *Hasidei Ashkenaz also cultivated esoteric doctrines that later emerged with kabbalistic currents. At the beginning of the eighteenth century, the followers of R. Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer Ba'al Shem Tov, who initiated a mystical revival reaching out beyond a spiritual elite and directed toward instilling piety into the life of the masses, were designated as Hasidim (see HASIDISM). This has become its common contemporary usage.

HASID, YEHUDAH HE-. See YEHUDAH BEN SHEMU'EL HE- HASID.

HASIDEANS, an obscure Jewish group mentioned three times in 1 and 2 Maccabees. Their name is derived from the Greek transliteration of the Hebrew word hasidim (pious ones). They are first referred to as having joined Mattathias and his followers in the rebellion against the religious persecution of *Antiochus IV Epiphanes (1 Mc. 2.41). The next references (1 Mc. 7; 2 Mc. 14) relate that sixty of the Hasideans were treacherously murdered by *Alcimus, who considered them in the same camp as *Judah the Maccabee, which probably was not entirely accurate. In addition to these meager bits of evidence, Talmudic and Midrashic literature sometimes refer to the hasidim ri'shonim (the early pietists) and their strict obedience to the Torah, such as their refusal to kill even snakes or scorpions on the Sabbath and their practice of meditating for one hour before and after prayer (Ber. 5.1), which they would not interrupt "even if a serpent were to wind itself around their ankle" (T., Ber. 3.20; Ber. 32b). Modern scholarship has tended to conflate all these disparate data and reconstruct an early Jewish sect, thought by some to be the forerunner of the *Pharisees and the *Essenes, but it is equally possible that the term hasidim was loosely used to describe various groups of Jewish pietists, without any organizational or ideological links between them.

HASIDEI ASHKENAZ (חסידים אשכנזים; the pious ones of Ashkenaz), a term that refers to the various circles of Jewish mystics and pietists in Ashkenaz—that is, Germany (mainly the Rhineland) and northern France—in the second half of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The term refers to several schools, most of them independent of each other, which developed different theologies and world views; many of their ideas and symbols were later absorbed by the *Kabbalah.

Among the main groups is the Kalonimos school, centered around Shemu'el ben Kalonimos (c.1130–1190), known as he-Hasid, ha-Qadosh, veba-Navi' (the Pious, the Saint, and the Prophet; see KALONIMOS FAMILY), his son *Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Hasid (c.1150–1217), and their relative El'azar ben Yehudah of Worms (c.1160–1230). This school produced the earliest commentaries on the prayers, a significant body of esoteric works, and a particular form of Hasidic ethics, expressed mainly in R. Yehudah's Sefer Hasidim. El'azar's work was continued by his disciples, among them *Avraham ben 'Azri'el of Bohemia, author of the encyclopedic commentary on the piyyutim, 'Arugat ha-Bosem (completed c.1234), and *Yits'haq ben Mosheh of Vienna, author of the halakhic work Or Zaru'a. In the second half of the thirteenth century, writers of the Kalonimos school integrated their teachings with those of the Kabbalah; among them was R. Mosheh ben Eli'ezer, the great-grandson of Yehudah ben Shemu'el he-Hasid, who wrote a mystical commentary on the Shi'ur Qomah*.

The Unique Cherub circle based its teachings on a pseudopigraphous treatise, Baraiyta' de-Yosef ben 'Uz-zil'el, the author of which was said to be the grandson of Ben Sira, son of the prophet Jeremiah. Other authoritative texts produced by members of the Unique Cherub school were the commentary on the Sefer Yetsirah by Pseudo-Sa'adyah and the writings of Elhanan ben Yaqar of London, as well as two additional commentaries on the Sefer Yetsirah and a theological treatise, Sod ha-Sodot. This circle is distinguished from the other schools by its doctrine of the unique cherub, the power by which God is said to reveal himself to the prophets.

A third Hasidei Ashkenaz circle produced several anonymous mystical and ethical treatises, the most important being Sefer ha-Hayyim, written in approximately 1200, and Sefer ha-Navon, a commentary on the Shema' and Shi'ur Qomah written in approximately 1230.

These schools believed in intermediary divine powers that emanated from the supreme Godhead, the Creator, and served as subjects of divine revelation. This is in contrast to the beliefs of Talmudic scholars, such as Mosheh ben Hisdai Taqu, who opposed theological speculation of any kind. The Hasidei Ashkenaz developed sophisticated concepts of divine immanence in the created world, while insisting on the complete transcendence of the supreme Godhead. They introduced new methodologies in biblical exegesis and the interpretation of prayers and piyyutim and used them to create diverse esoteric theologies concerning the divine world, the human soul, cosmology and cosmogony, and the ways by which an individual can approach God. Their ethical teachings are characterized by the demand of extreme devotion to every detail of the commandments and ethical precepts as a preparation for the ultimate religious experience, qiddush ha-Shem.

HASIDEI UMMOT HA-'OLAM (הַסִּידִי אֲמוֹת הָעוֹלָם; pious of the nations of the world), a term of rabbinic origin referring to righteous non-Jews. According to the To-sefta (San. 13.2), such individuals do have a share in the world to come. Maimonides (Hilkhot Melakhim 8.11) defined the pious gentiles as those who adhere to the seven *Noahic laws which are binding on all humanity, provided they are motivated by faith in God and his revelation. Since World War II, the term has been applied to non-Jews who endangered themselves by helping Jews under Nazi rule.

HASIDISM, a religious renewal movement among eastern European Jews that began in approximately 1750. Started by a small group that gathered around R. Yisra'el ben Eli'ezer *Ba'al Shem Tov in an obscure corner of southeastern Poland, by the early nineteenth century Hasidism had conquered most of eastern European Jewry outside Lithuania and continues to be influential today. The movement's history may be divided into four periods.

1750–1815. Hasidism began as a mystical revival movement among Jews of Podolia and Volhynia who were critical of both the remote and elitist culture of Talmudic learning and the obscure, equally elitist, and highly ascetic kabbalistic traditions practiced in their day. Seeking an alternative, but without wholly rejecting the values of either, they were attracted to the message of the Ba'al Shem Tov. He taught of a God who was present throughout the universe, even, and perhaps especially, in the most unlikely of places. A person needed only to train his awareness to see everywhere the sparks of divine light that in each moment seek out the Jew to redeem them. The Jew's task is not to turn away from the world but to embrace all that surrounds him and encompass it in his devotional life, so that the sparks in all things might find in him a channel through which to reunite with their source in God. The same is true of fallen souls; they seek their tiqqun* (redemption) through the prayers of others, so that they might be uplifted. These acts of reuniting the world with God constituted a typically revivalist simplification of complex kabbalistic doctrine, which Hasidism made accessible to ordinary and even unlettered Jews. The Ba'al Shem Tov taught that "God needs to be served in all ways," not only through the prescribed commandments but also in every act that a person performs and every word that he speaks. Among the Ba'al Shem Tov's disciples were some much more educated than he, including R. *Ya'aqov Yosef ha-Kohen of Polonnoye, an important early theoretician of Hasidism, and R. *Dov Ber of Mezhyrech, who became leader of the movement following the Ba'al Shem Tov's death in 1760. Dov Ber, or the Maggid as he is often called, extended the Ba'al Shem

Tov's teachings into a cosmic philosophy, in which God and the divine word were the only true reality, corporeality serving as a veil that keeps us from fully knowing God's truth. The cultivation of da'at (mindfulness), the chief goal of religious training, leads to the ability to see through that veil and to redeem oneself from the prison of falsehood. This mindfulness is most fully realized by the tsaddiqim (see TSADDIQ), a network of spiritual illuminati who are the rulers of each generation on the spiritual plane. Other Jews may seek intimacy with God through them, each Jew finding the particular tsaddiq to whose spiritual root his own soul belongs by its very nature. Thus Hasidism, which stood on one level for equalization, on another level insinuated a claim for a new elite, the tsaddiq, who stood on the highest rung and held the keys to divine blessing. Dov Ber was the great movement builder of Hasidism; he scattered his group of remarkable disciples throughout the Polish-Jewish world. By the time of his death in 1772, Hasidism had entered the public arena as a new religious movement, challenging the complacent authority of the wealthy and learned oligarchy that dominated Jewish life and calling forth a wave of bitter denunciation and opposition. The bans against Hasidism, mostly emanating from *Eliyahu ben Shelomoh Zalman of Vilna (the Vilna Ga'on) and his disciples, first pronounced in 1772 and renewed throughout the closing decades of the eighteenth century, accused the Hasidim of being religious innovators, destroyers of tradition, madmen, fomenters of civic strife, and revolutionaries. While specific violations of law, either civil or religious, were hard to find, Hasidic disregard for venerable local custom was very much at issue. Hasidim had adopted certain practices as distinguishing badges of special piety. These, including the use of the Sephardi prayer rite, disregard for precise times of prayer, and the extra sharpening of knives for ritual slaughter, now became battle cries in the struggle against the new movement. In some places, especially in Lithuania, Hasidism was utterly defeated, but in most areas it was Hasidim who won the day, and by the opening decade of the nineteenth century Hasidism had taken deep root in the Ukraine, Belorussia, and Galicia. Large numbers of Jews were praying in the many Hasidic prayer rooms that had sprung up, traveling to obtain the blessings of Hasidic masters, and listening to the teachings and tales that were starting to constitute the growing body of Hasidic literature. The third generation of Hasidic leaders lived into the Napoleonic era. Hasidism by this time had taken on varied hues because of regional differences and because of the different personalities and emphases of the various masters. From the time of the Maggid's death in 1772, there was no central authority in the movement. Special mention should be made of the emergence of the *Habad and Bratslav (see NAHMAN OF BRATSLAV) schools, both of which took shape in this period.

1816–1881. As Hasidic leadership passed to the fourth generation, the movement neared the height of its powers. The *Mitnaggedim had at least formally ended their war on Hasidism, and the movement was free to grow and move into such new areas as Congress Poland and northeastern Hungary without organized opposition. The pattern of dynastic succession was firmly in place, ensuring some regularity in the passing of authority. The tsaddiqim were widely venerated, and their books were being published in increasing numbers. But the Maskilim (Enlighteners; see MASKIL) began their own war against Hasidism, which they depicted as backward, superstitious, and the source of Polish Jews' resistance to attempts to ameliorate their conditions through education or westernization. Rulers and government agencies supported most of these claims, and this set Hasidism and its leaders on a course of direct opposition to various governmental policies. As the Haskalah's influence began to be felt in Hasidic areas, a new conservatism and concern with support for both study and punctilious observance of the law became more commonplace in Hasidic circles. Leaders such as Tsevi Elimelekh of Dynów (1786–1841) and Menaḥem Mendel Schneersohn (see SCHNEERSOHN FAMILY) of Lubavich (1789–1866) wrote mystical justifications of the commandments, something that seemed unnecessary in earlier times. As Hasidic communities built and supported yeshivot, there appeared on the scene masters such as Ḥayyim *Halberstam of Sanz (1797–1876) and Yitsḥaq Me'ir Rothenberg Alter of *Ger (1799–1866), who were better known for their halakhic writings than for their Hasidic teachings. In some areas, Hasidism assumed a militant posture in defense of orthodoxy; such was the position of the *Maḥzike ha-Das, organized by the *Belz Ḥasidim in Galicia, and the tsaddiqim of Hungary in the battle against Reform. Varieties of Hasidism continued to grow and flourish, such as the intellectualist camp of Polish Hasidism, defined by the elitist circles of Przysucha and Kotsk and their later offshoots in Ger and *Izbica. The Ḥasidim of Zhidachov and Komarno made an attempt to appropriate kabbalistic learning that earlier Ḥasidim had ignored.

1882–1945. This was the period of Hasidism's decline and near obliteration. The pogroms of 1881 and the following years, economic changes, and finally war destroyed the shtetl, which had been the natural home of Hasidic piety. Immigration to the West as well as urbanization, industrialization, and secularization within eastern Europe placed masses of Jews in new and unfamiliar situations. New ideologies, including those of organized labor, socialist idealism, and Zionism spoke to the children of Ḥasidim more powerfully than did the rebbeis. Still, there remained some important and creative figures on the Hasidic scene, particularly in Poland; for example, R. Yehudah Leib Alter of Ger (1847–1904) and R. *Tsadoq ha-Kohen of Lublin (1823–1900). Developments following World War I, including the pogroms in the Ukraine, and the establishment of Soviet rule, had destructive effects on Hasidic life. During the interwar period, much of the remaining energy within the movement was focused on politics, centering on *Agudat Israel in Poland and on opposition to Zionism both in Europe and in Erets Yisra'el, where Hasidism had established an important presence. The Holocaust destroyed the remains of Hasidism almost completely, including thousands of Hasidic masters and their faithful disciples.
